OF
MOST Special and Memorable, Happening in the CHURCH: WITH AN Universal HISTORY
Of the same.

Wherein is set forth at Large, the whole Race and Course of the CHURCH, from the Primitive Age to these later Times of Ours, with the Bloody Times, Horrible Troubles, and Great Persecutions against the true MARTYRS of Christ, Sought and Wrought as well by Heathen Emperors, as now lately practised by Romish Prelates, especially in this Realm of England and Scotland.

Now again, as it was Recognized, Perused, and Recommended to the Studious Reader, by the Author,

Mr. JOHN FOX.

Whereunto are annexed certain Additions of like PERSECUTIONS which have happened in these Later Times.

To which also is added the LIFE of the AUTHOR both in Latine and English.

The Ninth Edition.

DOMINUM

Jesum Christum

SERVATOREM CLEMENTISSIMUM,

Eucharisticon

JOHANNIS FOXI.

COnfecto nunc opere, quod tuis primùm auspiciis ac voluntate aggressus (summe & adorande Jesu, idemque Servator clementissime) inchoavi, quodq; demum beneficio ac favore exegi atque absolvi, præter omnem certam opinionem & vires meas: supereſt itaque pro officio meo, ut animula hæc, ceu pro votiva tabula, gratias, ſi non quantas debeat (utinam enim id poſſit) at quantas queat maxime, munificentiſſimæ tuæ perſolvat Majeſtati; quæ tam miſerum homuncionem, vel ſyphar potius hominis, in laboribus tot tantiſque iſtis, qui vel aſellum quemvis ἀχθοφόρον poſſent conficere, tumultuantem, benigno ſucceſſu ac ſolatio tam clementer ſuſtulerit. Quanquam autem de operis difficultate nihil hic cauſari attinet, quæ vix æſtimari à multis poterit; tua tamen non ignorat omnipotens Majeſtas, hujus, qualecunque ſit, negotii confectio, quibus quamque non ferendis curis, vigiliis, moleſtiis conſtitit; quibus nullo modo pares futuri eſſemus, niſi faventis gratiæ tuæ numen affulſiſſet, ac ſeſe quodam modo admiſciſſet operi. Quid ni enim fatear ac teſter ingenuè, quod re ipſa experti ſumus? Perſenſimus enim, peneque oculis ipſis conſpeximus, ſingularem excellæ dextræ tuæ ὑπερβολὴν non modo in ſucceſſu negotii provehendo, ſed in vita etiam ſpirituque inter labores conſervando. Tui igitur muneris eſt (clementiſſime Jeſu) quòd opus tuis ſuſceptum auſpiciis huc uſque provectum ſit. Nos viciſſim, quod noſtri ſit officii, gratias clementiæ tuæ, cum noſtro privatim, tum publico quodammodo Eccleſiæ tuæ nomine, agimus. Vel hinc enim cernimus quanti cauſam Martyrum tuorum æſtimes, quando eorum illuſtrando nomini tantâ faveas propenſione. Quanquam verò ſi nulla hic extaret eorum recordatio, non poſſent non omnibus modis eſſe illuſtriſſimi, quorum ſint nomina vitæ tuæ libro inſcripta. Et tamen voluit hoc modo tua declarare Majeſtas, nobiſque innoteſcere hominibus, quàm honorificum ſit pro tui nominis gloria fortiter dimicantes occumbere, quorum tu vitam à cinere ac rogo ſic vindicas, ſic cauſam tueris, ſic dignitatem illuſtras, ut eandem cum gloriæ ſcenore abs te recipiant clariorem, quàm ſi ipſi nunquam alioqui perdidiſſent. Habet ſiquidem peculiare hoc ſibi militiæ tuæ ratio, longè à mundo hoc diverſum, quod in caſtris tuis militantes ſive vivant, ſive moriantur, multò clareſcant à funere fœlicius, quam ſi vixiſſent maximè.

Davidium Christo in sanctificando hoc opere.

Sic Cranmerum videmus, Ridleum, Latimerum, Johannem Hooperum, Bradfordum, cæteróſque ejuſdem decuriæ pugiles, quanto majore occubuiſſe cum gloria in acie tua depugnantes, quam ſi, relicta ſtatione in qua erant collocati, ſaluti ipſi ſuæ cauſam tuam poſtpoſuiſſent. Quæ enim gens, quæ natio, quæ temporum vetuſtas, quæ hominum poſteritas eorum non cantabit laudes, non virtutem agnoſcet, non magnitudinem admirabitur? Quis Wicleuum unquam, aut Cobhamum natum fuiſſe exiſtimaſſet, niſi tua in cauſa tam egiſſent ſtrenuè? Quanto honori illud Huſſio Bohemenſi, noſtróque Tindalo fuit, quòd vitam in Evangelii tui cauſa perditam, magis abs te recipere, quàm ipſi retinere maluerint? Speſtemus è diverſa parte adverſarios tuos, quorum tam multas eſſe conſtat cædes, injurias, crudelitates adverſus tuos, multaq; item occultè & ſceleſtè ab iiſdem perpetrata, quæ nunquam ſperabant fore palam: & tamen quid unquam in angulis & tenebris ab illis eſt deſignatum tam occultè adverſus Eccleſiam, quod non in apricum produxit tua providentia? Atq; ita produxit, ut unde ipſi laudis ſibi conceperunt animo opinionem, inde ſummum ſibiipſis dedecus pepererint & contumeliam, quam nec vita effugere, nec morte unquam finire poterint. Quis Guiſos, Boneros, Storios, Gardineros, tanquam execranda hominum nomina nunc non novit? non exhorret? quis eorum facinora obliterebit dies, aut ſepeliet memoria? Etquid hos in tanta multitudine hoſtium tuorum recenſeo? Cui unquam proſperè ceſſit tuo rebellare numini, aut hoſtium ſe Eccleſiæ tuæ profiteri? Papæ nomen quàm erat aliquando in his terris celebre & glorioſum? Nunc quid putidius, quid probroſius? Cardinalitium faſtigium cœperunt primò admirari homines, multáq; proſequi reverentia: Sic Monachorum & Nonnarum Collegia ſuum quondam habebant plauſum apud plebem ſimplicem & credulam. At poſtquam ſpreta veritate tua cœperunt graſſari contra te, tuorúmque homicidæ fieri, eò tandem ſunt prolapſi (exceptis paucis paucis quos tua exemit gratia) ut reliqua sex nihil aliud jam esse præter vocabula quædam ad ignominia relicta videatur.

Fulin ac plerisque pro Christo martyrii ſpe potiti.

Hæc nimirum (sanctissime Domine ac Deus noster) justissimi judicii tui sunt præludia, ex quo haud difficile æstimare sit, quidnam in altero illo expectaturi sint, quos in hoc ipso seculo, hoc est, in suo ipsorum Regno, tanta accumules infamia & dedecore. Sed omissis his, ad sanctos tuos redeamus Martyres, quorum nomine merito à nobis perenne velut sacrificium laudis & gratiarum tuæ debetur, simul & habetur, benitati. Primùm, quòd in Ecclesiæ tuæ causa dimicantibus tam fortem & alacrem spiritum omnibusque tormentis majorem adversus parricidas Papistas submini-strasti. Deinde quòd & nobis in illorum defudantibus historia propitius adeò clementiæ tuæ favor affuerit. Debetur & hoc privatim meo quoque nomine singulari tuæ pietati, quòd vitam toties alioqui nutantem, in hac tanta, quantum tu solus novisti, laboris immensitate conservatam tuo volueris beneficio. Verum illud imprimis omnes debemus pariter effusissimo tuo in nos amori, quòd beatorum Martyrum tuorum, quos mundi hujus ad flammas & cineres adegerit perversitas, causam & innocentiam, velut è cinere recollectam, in lucem denuò notitiámque Ecclesiæ tuæ revocare ac patefacere dignatus sit. Etsi enim dubium non est, quin in supremo illo judicio tuo, quum virtutes cœlorum movebuntur, omnis eorum ad amussim excutietur causa ante tribunal tuum, est tamen aliquid hic quoque in Ecclesia tua, causam ipsorum, facta, vitæque virtutes cæteras non ignorari. Tunc autem ad illos uberior gloria, ad nos interea major redundabit fructus, quando ex ipsorum rectè factis, integritate, innocentia, fide ac patientia constare poterit, non quid ipsi solum fecerint, sed quid & nobis eorum sit exemplo faciendum.

Dolentatis nostrorum historiis & temporum.

Sed hic rursus (dulcissime Jesu) opus est benigno favoris tui præsidio. Nos enim qui filii Martyrum tuorum sumus, quosque maximè majores nostros imitari convenitebat, nunc nihil ferè parentum tenemus, præter vitæ solam hanc, quam suo partam sanguine relinquerunt, libertatem: Qua etiam ipsa nimium abutimur intemperanter, ut jam periculum sit, ne non filii modò Martyrum, sed ne fratres quidem ipsorum haberi mereamur. Quantum enim interfit discriminis, quamque prorsus disconvenit ordine toto nostra Consuetudo ab illorum vestigiis & Disciplina, pudet profectò referre. Sed quid ego tibi referam, cujus nihil non perspicit Majestas ac intuetur? Quanto illis studio ac curæ fuit amore tui cætera quæque, adeoque seipsos ad vitæ etiam contemptum abdicare, mundum cum omnibus desideriis flocci facere, voluptates tanquam nugas spernere? Nec sinebant pericula undique imminentia opibus congerendis, multoque minus honoribus cumulandis vacare. Contrà verò, nostra nunc vita, studium, omnisque adeo contentio, quid nisi mundum spirat, quid aliud quàm perpetuum quoddam fluxarum rerum, opum, ac honorum aucupium videtur & ambitus? Ac illi quam præclarè secum actum putassent, si vel vivere modò licuisset. Ideoque multi fuere eorum, qui Mariæ Reginæ facultates & possessiones omnes adusque extremum assem obtulerunt, dummodo solam ipsis remitteret conscientiam. Et quæ nos tanta hæc habendi intemperies exagitat, quibus nec unus nec mediocris victus possit esse satis? Sine modo, sine fine, opibus, Sacerdotis, censuique dilatando inhiamus. Quanto ambitu amicos fatigamus & inimicos, non ut vivamus solùm, verùm ut sublimes vivamus & honorati? De fide, de mansuetudine eorum, tolerantia, simplicitate, ac patentia incredibili, quid dici satis potest? Quanta constantia, qua animi alacritate perpessi sunt quicquid infligebatur, vindictam, omnem Deo remittentes, cui & causam commendabant? Nulla vis eos adversariorum dejicere, nec minæ frangere, non fudibria movere, non pericula, non tormenta ulla consternere, nec delinire blanditia potuerunt.

Quanta desiderantia nostrorum nunc hominum ab exemplis fortissimorum Martyrum.

Componamus nunc nostram cum his mollitiem. Sed pudor prohibet. Nam quæ tam levis nos tentationis aura afflare possit, quæ non illico præcipitates ac transversos rapiat in avaritiam, in fastum, voluptates, turpitudinem, vindictam, & in quid non malorum? Quæ tam levis objici poterit injuriola, pro qua non cœlum terræ miscemus, mariaque turbamus ab imo? ex quo in promptu est colligere, quantum ab eo absumus, ut mortem simus unquam tua causa subituri, si quando res Martyrum flagitet, quum nec affectus quidem istos tuo amputare jussu velimus. Quapropter ut Martyrum quidem illorum causa gratias agimus nomini tuo sancto; ita nostra vicissim causa deprecamur, ut qui largitus sit ipsis vincendi facultatem, nobis itidem pia eorundem exempla imitandi felicitatem aspires; sicque Ecclesiæ tuæ affulgeat tua gratia, nec ubi seducti hujus mundi illecebris, socordiores ipsi in retinenda Evangelii tui victoria, quàm illi in comparanda ærenui, videamur. Postremò quoniam historiam hanc tuo nutu ac voluntate aggressi, in ea re operam studiúmque posuimus, quo facta gestáque sanctorum tuorum (sanctissime Jesu) ad nominis tui gloriam, & in commodum Ecclesiæ publicum emergerent, adde nunc labori fructum, simulque historiæ tutelam in te recipias magnopere petimus; cui & opus ipsum totumque me ipsum, quem tot modis tuæ misericordiæ debeo, toto corpore & anima totisque viribus commendo, dedico, consecroq; cui omne cadat genu, omnisque vox & lingua confessionis gloriam per omnes Ecclesias tribuat personetque. Amen.

Necessaria Præsatio.

TO

TO THE

RIGHT VERTUOUS,

Most Excellent and Noble Princess,

Queen ELIZABETH,

OUR

Dread Lady, By the Grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of Christs Faith and Gospel, and Principal Governor both of the Realm, and also over the said Church of England and Ireland, under Christ the Supream Head of the same, &c. JOHN FOX, Her humble Subject, wisheth daily increase of GODS Holy Spirit and Grace, with long Reign, perfect Health, and joyful Peace to Govern His Flock committed to Her Charge; To the Example of all good Princes, The Comfort of his Church, And Glory of his blessed Name.

CHRIST the Prince of all Princes, who hath placed you in your Throne of Majesty, under Him to Govern the Church and Realm of England, give your Royal Highness long to sit, and many years to Reign over Us, in all flourishing Felicity, to his gracious Pleasure, and long lasting joy of all your Subjects. Amen.

When I first presented these Acts and Monuments unto your Majesty (most dear Sovereign, Queen ELIZABETH our peaceable Salome*) which your Majesties rare Clemency received in such gentle part; I well hoped that these my Travels in this kind of writing had been well at an end, whereby I might have returned my Studies again to other purposes after mine own desire, more fit than to write Histories, especially in the* English*-Tongue. But certain evil disposed Persons, of intemperate Tongues, Adversaries to good proceedings, would not suffer me so to rest, fuming and fretting, and raising up such miserable Exclamations at the first appearing of the Book, as was wonderful to hear. A man would have thought Christ to have been new-born again, and that* Herod, with all the City of Jerusalem had been in an uproar. Such blustring and striving was then against that poor Book through all Quarters of England, even to the Gates of Lovain, so that no English Papist almost in all the Realm thought himself a perfect Catholick, unless he had cast out some word or other to give that Book a blow.

Whereupon, considering with my self what should move them thus to rage, first I began with more circumspect diligence to overlook again that I had done. In searching whereof I found the fault, both what it was, and where it lay; which was indeed not so much in the Book it self (to say the truth) as in another certain privy mystery and working of some; of whom Joan. Avent. shall tell us in his own words, and shew us who they be, Quibus (inquit) audiendi quæ fecerint pudor est; nullus faciendi, quæ audire erubescunt. Illic, ubi opus, nihil verentur; hic, ubi nihil opus est, ibi verentur, &c. Who, being ashamed belike to hear their worthy stratagems like to come to light, sought by what means they might the stopping of the same. And because they could not work it per brachium seculare, by publick Authority (the Lord of Heaven long preserve your Noble Majesty) they renewed again an old wonted practise of theirs; doing in like sort herein, as they did sometimes with the holy Bible in the days of your renowned Father of famous Memory, King Henry the Eighth; who when they neither by manifest reason could gain-say the matter contained in the Book, nor yet abide the coming out thereof, then sought they by a subtil devised train to deprave the Translation, Notes, and Prologues thereof, bearing the King in hand, and all the people, that there were in it a thousand lyes, and I cannot tell how many more. Not that there were in it such lyes in very deed; but that the coming of that Book should not bewray their lying falshood, therefore they thought best to begin first to make Exceptions themselves against it; playing in their stage like as Phormio did in the old Comedy, who, being in all the faults his self, began first to quarrel with Demipho, when Demipho rather had good right to lay Phormio by the heels.

With like facing brags these Catholick Phormiones think now to dash out all good Books, and amongst others also these Monuments of Martyrs. Which godly Martyrs as they could not abide being alive, so neither can they now suffer their memories to live after their death, lest the Acts of them being known might bring perhaps their wicked Acts and cruel Murthers to detestation; and therefore spurn they so vehemently against this Book of Histories, with all kind of Contumelies and Uproars, railing and wondering upon it; much like as I have heard of a Company of Thieves, who in robbing a certain true man by the highways-side, when they had found a piece of Gold or two about him more than he would be known of, they cried out of the falsehood of the world, marveling and complaining what little truth was to be found in men.

Even so these men deal also with me; for when they themselves altogether delight in untruths, and have replenished the whole Church of Christ with feigned Fables, lying Miracles, false Visions, and miserable Errors contained in their Missals, Portuses, Breviars, and Summaries, and almost no true tale in all their Saints Lives and Festivals, as now also no great truths in our Lovanian Books, &c. Yet notwithstanding, as though they were a people of much truth, and that the world did not perceive them, they pretend a face and zeal of great Verity; and as though there were no Histories else in all the world corrupted, but only this History of Acts and Monuments, with Tragical Voices they exclaim and wonder upon it, sparing no cost of hyperbolical phrases to make it appear as full of lyes as lines, &c. Much after the like sort of impudency as Sophisters use sometimes in their Sophisms to do (and sometimes is used also in Rhetorick) that when an argument cometh against them which they cannot well resolve indeed, they have a rule to shift off the matter with stout words and tragical admiration, whereby to dash the Opponent out of countenance, bearing the hearers in hand the same to be the weakest and slenderest argument that ever was heard, not worthy to be answered, but utterly to be hissed out of the Schools.

With like sophistration these also fare with me, who when they neither can abide to hear their own doings declared, nor yet deny the same, which they hear, to be true, for three or four escapes in the Book committed (and yet some of them in the Book amended) they neither reading the whole, nor rightly understanding that they read, inveigh and malign so perversly the setting out thereof, as though neither any word in all that story were true, nor any other story false in all the world besides. And yet in accusing these my Accusers I do not so excuse my self, nor defend my Book, as though nothing in it were to be sponged or amended. Therefore I have taken these pains, and reiterated my Labours in traveling out this story again; doing herein as Penelope did with her web, untwisting that she had done before: Or as Builders do sometimes, which build and take down again, either to transpose the fashion, or to make the foundation larger. So in recognising this History I have employed a little more labour, partly to enlarge the argument which I took in hand, partly also to assay, whether by any pains taking I might pacifie the stomachs, or to satisfie the judgments of these importune Quarrelers: which nevertheless I fear I shall not do, when I have done all I can. For well I know, that all the heads of this hissing Hydra will never be cut off, though I were as strong as Hercules. And if Apelles the skilful Painter, when he had bestowed all his cunning upon a piece of work, which no good Artificer would or could greatly reprove, yet was not without some controuling Sutor, which took upon him ultra crepidam, much more may I look for the like in these controuling days.

Ne sutor ultra crepidam.

Nevertheless committing the success thereof unto the Lord, I have adventured again upon this story of the Church, and have spent not only my pains, but also almost my health therein, to bring it to this. Which now being finished, like as before I did, so again I exhibit and present the same unto your Princely Majesty, blessing my Lord my God with all my heart; first for this liberty of peace and time which through your peaceable Government he hath lent unto us for the gathering both of this and other like Books, Tractations and Monuments requisite to the behoof of his Church, which hitherto by iniquity of time could not be contrived in any Kings Reign since the Conquest, before these Halcyon days of yours.

Secondly, As we are all bound with publick Voices to magnifie our God for this happy preservation of your Royal Estate; so privately for my own part, I also acknowledge my self bound to my God and to my Saviour, who so graciously in such weak health hath let me time, both to finish this Work, and also to offer the second Dedication thereof to your Majesty; desiring the same to accept in good worth the donation thereof, if not for the worthiness of the thing given, yet as a testification of the bounden service and good will of one, which by this he here presenteth, declareth what he would, if he had better to give.

And though the story being written in the Popular-Tongue serveth not so greatly for your own peculiar reading, nor for such as be learned; yet I shall desire both you and them to consider in it the necessity of the ignorant Flock of Christ committed to your Government in this Realm of England. Who as they have been long led in ignorance, and wrapt in blindness for lack especially of Gods Word, and partly also for wanting the light of History, I thought pity but that such should be helped, their ignorance relieved, and simplicity instructed. I considered they were the Flock of Christ, and your Subjects, belonging to your account and charge, bought with the same price, and having as dear Souls to the Lord as other. And though they be but simple and unlearned, yet not unapt to be taught if they were applied. Furthermore, what inconvenience groweth of ignorance where knowledge lacketh, both I considered and experience daily teacheth.

And therefore bearing of the vertuous Inclination of your Majesty, what a provident zeal full of solicitude you have, minding (speedily I trust) to furnish all Quarters and Countries of this your Realm with the Voice of Christs Gospel, and faithful preaching of his Word, I thought it also not unprofitable to adjoyn unto this your godly proceedings, and to the Office of the Ministry, the knowledge also of Ecclesiastical History, which in my mind ought not to be separate from the same; that like as by the one the people may learn the Rules and Precepts of Doctrine, so by the other they may have Examples of Gods mighty working in his Church, to the confirmation of their Faith, and the edification of Christian life. For as we see what light and profit cometh to the Church by Histories in old times set forth of the Judges, Kings, Maccabees, and the Acts of the Apostles after Christs time; so likewise may it redound to no small use in the Church, to know the Acts of Christs Martyrs now since the time of the Apostles.

Profit to be taken by Examples of Christian Martyrs.

Gods Works to be observed in Histories.

What use cometh by reading of Histories.

Besides other manifold Examples and Experiments of Gods great Mercies and Judgments in preserving his Church, in overthrowing Tyrants, in confounding Pride, in altering States and Kingdoms, in conserving Religion against Errors and Dissensions, in relieving the Godly, in bridling the Wicked, loosing and tying up again of Satan the Disturber of Common-weals, in punishing Transgressions, as well against the first Table as the second; wherein is to be seen Idolatry punished, Blasphemy plagued, Contempt of Gods holy Name and Religion revenged, Murther with Murther rewarded, Adulterers and Wedlock-breakers destroyed, Perjuries, Extortions, covetous Oppression, and fraudulent Counsels come to nought, with other excellent Works of the Lord: the observing and noting whereof in Histories minister to the Readers thereof wholsome admonitions of life, with experience and wisdom both to know God in his Works, and to work the thing that is godly; especially to seek unto the Son of God for their Salvation, and in his Faith only to find that they seek for, and in no other means. The continuance and constancy of which Faith the Lord of his Grace and goodness grant to your Noble Majesty, and to his whole beloved Church, and all the Members of the same to everlasting life. Amen.

Ad

Ad Doctum Lectorem

JOHANNES FOXUS.

Cogitanti mihi, versantique mecum in animo, quàm periculosæ res aleæ sit, emittere nunc aliquid in publicum, quod in manus oculósque multo cum subeat, his præsertim tam exulceratis moribus temporibúsque, ubi tot hominum difficilis, tot fluxilis puritum, tot morosis captibus, tam rigidis censuris, & Criticorum fannis fervent fere omnia, ut difficillimum sit quicquam tam circumspecte scribere, quod non in aliquam calumniandi materiam rapiatur; perbenè profectò feliciéque videntur ii, quibus eum vitæ curfum tenere licuit, ut in otio viventes cum dignitate, fic alienis frui queant laboribus, velut in Theatro otiosi sedentes spectatores, ut nihil interim ipsis vel ex actione tædium, vel ex labore periculum metuendum sit. Me verò nescio quo pacto, longè diversa quidem hactenus exercuit vitæ ratio; quippe cui nec fortunæ illam felicitatem, in cujus complexibus tam multos suaviter foveri video, nec otii amœnitatem experiri, vix etiam per omnem vitam degustare in continuo laborum ac negotiorum fervore ac contentione contigerit. Quanquam de fortuna parum queror quam semper contempsi, quin neque de laboribus multum dicturus, si modò labores ii tantum vel prodesse vel placere caeteris possent hominibus, quantum me privatim aretarunt incommoditatesque. Nunc ad meæ infelicitatis curas alias accedit in super, quòd in eo argumenti genere laborandum fuit, quod præter hujusmodi rerum ipsarum materiam, præter linguæ insamenitatem, præter tractandi difficultatem, quæ vix nitroem recipiat orationis, eò porro Autorem ipsum redigit Angustiæ, ut neque falsa narrare fine injuria Historiæ, nec verum dicere fine magna fua invidia odióque multorum liceat. Nam cum in eo Historiæ argumento mihi versandum fuit, quod non ad superiorum modò temporum res gestas altéque repetitas pertineat, fed hanc ipsam ætatem nostram, noftræque gentis nunc homines etiamnum præsentes, vivósque sic attingat, sic perficet, sic defigneat, quemadmodum in hoc materiæ genere neceffariò faciendum fuit: queso, quid hîc mihi aliud expectandum fit, nifi poftquam fruftra me defatigando valetudinem attriverim, oculos pecciderim, ipsum acciverim, corpus exhauserim demum ut poft hæc omnia multorum me hominum odiis, fibilis, invidiæ ac calumniæ exponam? In tot itiis afperitatibus cum nihil me tutum præftare poterit, non Cæsar, non Monarchæ, non Rex, non Regina, non ulla hujus mundi præfidia, præter folam Divini numinis protentem dextram; principio igitur, atque ante omnia huc ceu ad tutiffimum afylum me recepi, huic me librúmque commendavi & commendo. Tum vero inſuper in eodem Domino tuum illum eandorem (docte piéque Lector) eamque tuam humanitatem appellare volui, qua ex humanioribus literis ftudiifque te ſcio præditum, quo noftris his ſudoribus tuæ approbationis accedat calculus; aut ſi approbationem non mereamur, ſaltem ne favoris defit benignitas: cui ſi approbatum iri hanc Hiſtoriæ noſtræ farraginem ſenſerimus, cæterorum judicia obtrectatorum, levius ferremus.

Nam aliquòi non defuturos ſat ſcio qui variis modis nobis faceſſent moleſtiam. Habebit hîc Momus ſuos morſus, Sycophanta ſuos ſibilos, nec deerit Calumniatori ſua lingua & aculeus, quem intigat. Hic ſidem detrahet Hiſtoriæ; ille artificium in trancando, alter diligentiam, vel in excutiendis rebus judicium deliderabit. Illi forſan operis diſpliceat moles, vel minus diſpoſita ſervatáque temporum ratio. Et ſi nihil horum fuerit, attamen in tanta Religionis pugna, in tanta judiciorum, capitum, ſenſuum varietate, ubi ſuæ quiſque favet ac blanditur factioni, quid tam affabre, aut circumſpectè enarrari poteſt, quod placeat univerſis? Quin & jam nunc muſſitari etjam audio a nonnullis qui longa ſefe tenere dicant expectatione, quoad hæc tandem Legenda noſtra, ut appellant, Aurea evulganda fit: qui ſi noſtram patriam in ea tandiutem reprehenſam velint, ne ego ſuaves illos hominum viciſſim rogatos velim, ut ipſi primùm videndis ſuis ſe præbeant expeditos, quam alienam inceſſant lentitudinem.

Deinde, ſi tardius exeat ipſorum opinione volumen, meminerit, proverbiali præcepto, Lentam eſſe feſtinationem oportere; & bos dicitur laſſus fortiùs pedem figere. Egimus in hac quidem re pro virili noſtra; Egimus ſpero & pro officio, ſi non fatis pro temporis modo expeditè, at egimus certè pro valetudine; addam porro, egimus ſupra valetudinem. Quin & illud ipſorum venia adjicere liceat, egiſſe nos maturiùs quàm ipſis forſan expediet qui in hunc nugantur modum: certè maturatiùs egimus quam tanti momenti & magnitudinis negotio conveniebat, quod accuratiorem in digerendis rebus moram curamque poſtulabat, cùm à nobis vix integros datos eſſe menſes octodecim præparandæ materiæ, comportandis componendiſque rebus, conferendis exemplaribus, lectiandis codicibus, refcribendis his quæ ſcripto mandata erant, caſtigandis formulis, concinnandæ Hiſtoriæ, & in ordinem redigendæ, &c. noverint ii qui teſtes adfuerint, & temporis conſcii, & laboris ſocii. Quod ſi autem Aureæ ſuæ Legendæ titulum hunc eò accommodant, quod illius exemplo hanc ſimiliter fabuloſam putent Hiſtoriam, hincque odioſo vocabulo ejus præjudicent veritati, quid his reſpondeam aliud quam quòd ingenuè fuam ipſi prodant calumniam, quam ne editione quidem libri differre queant, prius de rebus dijudicantes quam noverint. Atque interim quidem illud bene habet, quod ipſos tandem aliquando Legendæ ſuæ legendæ podeat tam fabuloſæ. Et tamen fabulis illis non puduit munduin tam diu ludificare, periculum etiam intentantes his, ſi qui Legendæ illæ; hoc eſt, mendaciſſimis illorum nugis auderent detrahere. Quare nihil magis eſſe poſſit impium, quàm ſacroſanctam Eccleſiæ fidem fabulamentis hujuſmodi confictiſque præterea omnem veri fidem delituis contumaciare; tamen inepti ſſimi illi nugatores, ex ſuo ingenio cæteros quoſque ſcriptores metientes, nec ipſi verum adferre fatagunt, nec afferentibus aliis fidem habendam putant, cuncta videlicet ſuis aureis ſomniis ſimilia exiſtimantes? Quin apage cum Aurea tua Legenda, nugator impudens; quem ego librum, cum omnes eum ſcimus, nec ipſe ignoras prodigioſis mendaciorum portentis & vaniſſimis undique commentis ſcatere, ne cum Homeri quidem fabulis conferre velim; tantum abeſt ut cum veræ ſerias gravibúsque Eccleſiæ Hiſtoriis quicquam commune habeat. Quid? An quia Papiſtis illis tuis & impuris Monachis ſic libuit in ridiculis miraculorum ſuorum portentis ineptire, tu protinus nullam gravem Hiſtoriæ authoritatem putas in Eccleſia admittendam? Quin eorum tam lege & de Paſchali Eccleſiaſtica, & tripartita Sozomeni & Socratis cæterorúmque Hiſtoriis judicemus. Sunt præter hæc & alia quædam de ſanctis & Divis conſcripta miracula, quæ propius ad Legendam hanc accedunt, & tamen nequaquam eo loco apud nos habentur, ut Legendæ illæ Papiſticæ annumerentur, etiam quæ ſuſpectiſſimæ ſunt fidei. Quanquam de ſcriptoribus cæteris mea nihil intereſt cenſuram ferre. Quòd ad hanc verò noſtram ἀκρίβειαν ἱστορικὴν, attinet, teſtatum id velim univerſis, datam eſſe à nobis operam ſeduló ne quid uſquam ineſſet operi fabuloſum, aut ejuſmodi quod vel a nobis fictum, vel quod Legendæ illæ Aureæ (magis dicam plumbeæ) tam undique foret diſſimillimum. Id quod res ipſa & nativa Hiſtoriæ facies teſtari poterit, cujus tota textura ex ipſis Epiſcoporum Archivis atque Regiſtris, partimque ex propriis Martyrum ipſorum literis hauſta ac conflata videri poterit. In qua Hiſtoria etſi neque id exigam ut ſingula hîc pro oraculis habeantur; si ad dedimus tamen pro virili operam, ut ſi non plenè aſſequeremus, accederemur tamen quàm proximè ad veterem illam Hiſtoriæ legem, ut duas res, præcipuas Hiſtoriæ peſtes, vitaremur, timorem videlicet & aſſentationem; quarum altera ſæpe minus dicit, altera ſemper plus addit, quàm par eſt, narrationi. Sed hujus rei fidem ex ipſo magis opere, quam ex meo commendatione aſtrui honeſtius eſt. hendere. Sed vereor ne hîc quoque, quemadmodum cæteris in rebus, locum habeat veteris proverbii experientia; Faciunt quippe mendaces ut ne veri etiam dicenti fides habeatur. Cum hactenus in Martyrologicis sanctorum legendis vitiosque describendis mendacia, ac nugacissimæ somniorum fictiones pro veris legantur narrationibus, fit ut cæteræ ejusdem argumenti materiæ eandem pariter suspicionem subeant, ut vix jam quicquam legi dicive in Ecclesia cum fide queat. Verùm huic malo cùm mederi nequeamus, satis erit, quod nostrarum erat virium id nos præstitisse. Quod superest, Divinæ curandum providentiæ relinquamus. Atque de certitudine veritatéque Historiæ hæc hactenus: quæ utinam ne tam vera quidem certáque esset, quam isti videri volunt, at falsa potius, confimilique huic, quam dicunt, Aureæ ipsorum Legendæ, aut Viris patrum, aut Festivali, aut Dormi-secure, cæteríque Papisticis istis τοῦτ τῶν λοιπῶν λήρων foret. Nunc verò Martyrum horum non à nobis ficta, fed inflicta à vobis fupplicia, atroxque cædes veriorem hanc comprobant hiſtoriam, plurésque fuæ veritatis teſtes habent quam vellemus ipſi qui hiſtoriam ſcripſimus. Venio jam ad alteram criminationis partem, quæ de Calendario fortaſſis objicietur. Audio enim & hîc mihi obtrepere non tacitas modò ſententias, ſed apertas Papiſtarum quorundam voces, quibus iniquè à me factum videbitur, quòd antiquatis atque ex Calendario explofis veteris Eccleſiæ Divis, Martyribus, Confeſſoribus, Virginibuſque, novos eorum loco Martyres ac Confeſſores inſuſciam. Primùm, nulli ego veterum Divorum hoc facto præjudicatum velim. Neque verò ideo inter Divos à me referuntur iſti, quòd inferuntur in Calendarium. Hanc ego Apotheoſin mihi nunquam ſumpſi, quam ſibi tam conſidenter ſumpſit Gregorius nonus. Porro, neque eò ſpectat hoc Calendarium, ut novam aliquam feſtorum dierum legem præſcribam Eccleſiæ; tum multò minus cultum ſancti alicujus inſtituo. Feſtorum dierum jam plus ſatis erat in mundo. Utinam Dominicum ſolum Sabbatum dignè, atque ut par eſt, tranſigeremus. Habeant per me ſuum Papiſtæ Calendarium. Habeat & Eccleſia ſuos ſanctos, tum recentes tum veteranos, modò probatos, modò interim iidem ne colantur, modo quàm ſint veteſti tàm veré etiam ſancti ſint.

Verùm enimvero cum non dubitavit ſua etiam ætate Hieronymus multos exiſtimare eorum gehennæ ignibus cruciari, quos multi paſſim pro ſanctis haberent in Eccleſia; quid hîc tum diceret Hieronymus, ſi modo ſuperſtes Papiſticam hanc ſanctorum colluviem & Calendaria, tot Papis, tot Epiſcopis, & Abbatibus oblita cerneret?

Quanquam à me quidem non Calendarium hoc inſtitutum eſt, niſi ut pro indice duntaxat, ſuum cujuſque Martyris menſem & annum deſignante, ad privatum Lectoris ſeviret uſum. Et tamen ſi in Templis etiam ſas ſit ſingulorum Menſium dies propriis ſanctorum nomenclaturis conſignare, qui minus liceat id mihi in veris iſtis facere Martyribus, quod ipſi in ſuis pſeudomartyribus, tanta ſibi licentia, ne dicam impudentia, permiſerunt? Si non perms, ſed cau. Martyrem faciat, cur non unum Cranmerum ſexcentis Becketis Cantuarienſibus non conferam, ſed prætulerim? Quid in Nicolao Ridleo videtur cum quovis divo Nicolao non conferendum? Qua in re Latimerus, Hiperus, Marſhæus, Simpſonus, cæteríque Chriſtiani Martyrii Candidati, inferiores ſummis maximiſque illis Papiſtici Calendarii Divis, imo multis etiam nominibus non præponendi videantur? Interim nullius ego boni ſanctíque viri (modò qui verè ſanctus ſit) cauſam lædo, nec memoriam extinguo, nec gloriam minuo. Et ſi cui hoc diſpliceat Calendarium, trieminerit, non in Templis collocari, ſed domeſticæ tantum lectioni præparari.

Sed miſſis hiſce adverſariorum calumniis, ad te, docte candidéque Lector (quoniam hæc ad te inſtituta eſt Epiſtola) tempus eſt ut recurrat Oratio, cujus in his rebus judicium ut pluris æſtimo, ita ego magis hîc quoque Patrocinio. Scio enim, in vaſta hac congerie reperies nonnulla ad quæ merito corruges frontem. Neque vero fieri facile potuit, præſertim in tanta operis præcipitatione, ut cuncta ad amuſſim atque ad unguem perfectè adeo elimarentur, quin alicubi vel ex laſſitudine dormitaret ſcriptor, vel per incuriam excideret Authori aliquid, vel ex feſtinatione eveniret, quod cani ſolet in proverbiis nimium præ ſtudio properanti, Cæcos nimirum producenti catulos. In quibus quidem excutiendis rebus magis nobis venia tua quam cenſura imploranda eſt. Quamobrem paucis hæc apud te, docte ſimul & humaniſſime Lector, ante operis ingreſſum libuit σωγγνώμην ut ſi quid inter evolvendum occurrerit, non omnibus perfectum numeris, non ad Ciceronis lucernam elucubratum, non ad exquiſitum Theologorum acumen expreſſum, aut minus alicqui acutiſſimis tuis dignum naribus, cogites hæc non tuis auribus data eſſe, ſed meis; hoc eſt, craſſioris turbæ hominibus, a quibus facilius leguntur libri quam judicantur. Aut ſi ne id quidem graviſſimæ tuæ ſententiæ fecerit ſatis, liceat illa mihi uti lege, qua ſemper permiſſum eſt, opere in magno, ſcriptori obrepere ſomnum. Quod ſi verò tuam hac in re facilitatem impetravero, minus laborabo quid cæteri obtrepant, Græci memor Proverbii, cujus & ipſos commeminiſſe velim, μωμόσονται πόλυκαιον ἢ μωμήσονται.

To

To the True and Faithful Congregation of CHRISTS Univerſal CHURCH, with all and ſingular the Members thereof, whereſoever congregated or diſperſed through the Realm of England, a Proteſtation or Petition of the Author, wiſhing to the ſame abundance of all Peace and Tranquillity, with the ſpeedy coming of CHRIST the Spouſe, to make an end of all Mortal Miſery.

SOLOMON the peaceable Prince of Iſrael, as we read in the third of Kings, after he had finiſhed the Building of the Lords Temple (which he had ſeven years in hand) made his Petition to the Lord for all that ſhould pray in the ſaid Temple, or turn their face toward it; and his Requeſt was granted, the Lord anſwering him, as we read in the ſaid Book, Chap. 6. I have heard (ſaith he) thy Prayer, and have ſanctified this Place, &c. Albeit the infinite Majeſty of God is not to be compaſſed in any material Walls, yet it ſo pleaſed his Goodneſs to reſpect this Prayer of the King, that not only he promiſed to hear them which there prayed, but alſo repleniſhed the ſame with his own Glory. For ſo we read again in the Book aforeſaid, Et non poterant miniſtrare propter nebulam, quia replevit Gloria Domini domum Domini, 3 Reg. 7.

Upon the like truſt in Gods gracious goodneſs if I ſinful Wretch, not comparing with the building of that Temple, but following the zeal of the Builder, might either be ſo bold to aſk, or ſo happy to ſpeed, after my ſeven years travel about this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, I would moſt humbly crave of Almighty God to beſtow his bleſſing upon the ſame; that as the Prayers of them which prayed in the outward Temple were heard, ſo all true diſpoſed minds which ſhall reſort to the reading of this preſent Hiſtory, containing the Acts of Gods holy Martyrs, and Monuments of his Church, may by example of their Life, Faith, and Doctrine, receive ſome ſuch ſpiritual fruit to their Soule, through the operation of his Grace, that it may be to the advancement of his Glory, and profit of his Church, through Chriſt Jeſus our Lord. Amen.

But as it happened in that Temple of Solomon, that all which came thither came not to pray, but many to prate, ſome to gaze and ſee News, other to talk and walk, ſome to buy and ſell, ſome to carp and find fault, and finally ſome alſo at the laſt to deſtroy and pull down, as they did indeed; (For what is in this World ſo ſtrong, but it will be impugned? what ſo perfect, but it will be abuſed? ſo true, that will not be contraried? or ſo circumſpectly done, wherein wrangling Theon will not ſet in his tooth?) Even ſo neither do I look for any other in this preſent Hiſtory, but that amongſt many well diſpoſed Readers, ſome Waſpes Neſt or other will be ſtirred up to buz about mine ears. So dangerous a thing it is now adays to write or do any good, but either by flattering a man muſt offend the Godly, or by true ſpeaking procure hatred of the Wicked. Of ſuch ſtinging Waſpes and buzzing Drones I had ſufficient trial in my former Edition before; who if they had found in my Book any juſt cauſe to carp, or upon any true zeal of truth had proceeded againſt the untruths of my ſtory, and had brought juſt proofs for the ſame, I could right well have abide it. For God forbid but that faults, whereſoever they be, ſhould be detected and accuſed. And therefore Accuſers in a Commonwealth, after my mind, do ſerve to no ſmall ſtead.

But then ſuch Accuſers muſt beware they play not the dog, of whom Cicero in his Oration ſpeaketh, which being ſent in Capitolio to fray away Thieves by night, left the Thieves, and fell to bark at true men walking in the day. Where true faults be, there to bay and bark is not amiſs. But to carp where no cauſe is; to ſpie in other ſtraws, and leap over their own blocks, to ſwallow Camels, and to ſtrain at Gnats; to oppreſs truth with lyes, and to ſet up lyes for truth; to blaſpheme the dear Martyrs of Chriſt, and to Canonize for Saints, whom Scripture would ſcarce allow for good Subjects; that is intolerable. Such barking Currs, if they were well ſerved, would be made a while to ſtoop. But with theſe brawling ſpirits I intend not at this time much to wraſtle.

Wherefore to leave them a while, till further leiſure ſerve me to attend upon them, thus much I thought in the mean ſeaſon, by way of Proteſtation or Petition, to write unto you, both in general and particular, the true Members and faithful Congregation of Chriſts Church, whereſoever either congregated together, or diſperſed through the whole Realm of England, that forſomuch as all the ſeeking of theſe Adverſaries is to do what they can, by diſcrediting of this Hiſtory with ſlanders and ſiniſter ſurmiſes, to withdraw the Readers from it: this therefore ſhall be in few words to premoniſh and deſire of all and ſingular of you (all well minded Lovers and Partakers of Chriſts Goſpel) not to ſuffer your ſelves to be deceived with the big Brags, and Hyperbolical Speeches of thoſe ſlandering Tongues, whatſoever they have or ſhall hereafter exclaim againſt the ſame; but indifferently ſtaying your judgment till truth be tried, you will firſt peruſe, and then refuſe; meaſuring the untruths of this Hiſtory, not by the ſcoring up of their hundreds and thouſands of lyes which they give out, but wiſely weighing the purpoſe of their doings according as you find, and ſo to judge of the matter.

To read my Books I allure neither one nor other. Every man as he feeth cauſe, ſo let him like as he liſteth. If any ſhall think his labour too much in reading this ſtory, his choice is free either to read this, or any other which he more mindeth. But if the fruit thereof ſhall recompence the Readers travel, then would I wish no man so light eared, to be carried away for any sinister clamor of Adversaries, who many times deprave good doings, not for the faults they find, but therefore find faults because they would deprave. As for me and my History, as my will was to profit all and displease none; so if skill in any part wanted to will, yet hath my purpose been simple, and certes the cause no less urgent also, which moved me to take this Enterprise in hand.

The partial dealing of Story-writers.

For first to see the simple Flock of Christ, especially the unlearned sort, so miserably abused, and all for ignorance of History, not knowing the course of Times, and true descent of the Church, it pitied me that part of diligence so long to have been unsupplied in this my Country Church of England. Again, considering the multitude of Chronicles and Story-Writers, both in England, and out of England, of whom the most part have been either Monks or Clients to the See of Rome, it grieved me to behold how partially they handled their stories. Whose painful travel albeit I cannot but commend, in committing divers things to writing, not unfruitful to be known, nor unpleasant to be read; yet it lamented me to see in their Monuments the principal Points, which chiefly concerned the state of Christs Church, and were most necessary of all Christian people to be known, either altogether pretermitted, or if any mention thereof were inserted, yet were all things drawn to the honour specially of the Church of Rome, or else to the favour of their own Sect of Religion. Whereby the vulgar sort, hearing and reading in their Writings no other Church mentioned or magnified, but only that Church which here flourished in this World in riches and jollity, were drawn also to the same persuasion, to think no other Church to have stood in all the Earth but only the Church of Rome.

In the number of this sort of Writers, besides our Monks of England (for every Monastery almost had his Chronicler) I might also also recite both Italian and other Country Authors, as Platina, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, Martinus, Antonius, Vincentius, Onuphrius, Laziardus, Georgius Lilius, Polyd. Virgilius, with many more, who taking upon them to entermeddle with matters of the Church, although in part they express some truth in matters concerning the Bishops and See of Rome; yet in suppressing another part they play with us, as Ananias and Saphyra did with their money, or as Apelles did in Pliny, who, painting the one half of Venus coming out of the Sea, left the other half unperfect. So these Writers, while they shew us one half of the Bishop of Rome, the other half of him they leave unperfect, and utterly untold. For as they paint him out on the one part glistering in Wealth and Glory, in shewing what succession the Popes had from the Chair of Saint Peter, when they first began and how long they sate, what Churches, and what famous Buildings they erected, how far their Possessions reached, what Laws they made, what Councils they called, what Honour they received of Kings and Emperors, what Princes and Countries they brought under their Authority, with other like stratagems of great Pomp and Royalty; so on the other side, what Vices these Popes brought with them to their Seat, what Abominations they practised, what Superstition they maintained, what Idolatry they procured, what wicked Doctrine they defended contrary to the express Word of God, what Heresies they fell, into what division of Sects they cut the unity of Christian Religion, how some practised by Simony, some by Necromancy and Sorcery, some by poysoning, some indenting with the Devil to come by their Papacy, what Hypocrisie was in their Lives, what Corruption in their Doctrine, what Wars they raised, what Bloodshed they caused, what Treachery they traversed against their Lords and Emperors, imprisoning some, betraying some to the Templaries and Saracens, in bringing other under their Feet, also in beheading some, as they did with Fredericus and Conradinus, the Heirs and Off-spring of the House of Fredericus Barbarossa, in the Year, 1269. Furthermore, how mightily Almighty God hath stood against them, how their Wars never prospered against the Turk, how the judgments of the godly learned from time to time have ever repugned against their Errors, &c. Of these and a thousand other more not one word hath been touched, but all kept as under Benedicite, in auricular Confession.

This partial dealing and corrupt handling of Histories when I considered, I thought with my self nothing more lacking in the Church than a full and a compleat story, which, being faithfully collected out of all our Monastical Writers, and written Monuments, should contain neither every vain written Fable, for that would be too much, nor yet leave out any thing necessary, for that would be too little; but with a moderate discretion taking the best of every one should both ease the labour of the Reader from turning over such a number of Writers, and also should open the plain truth of Times lying long hid in obscure darkness of Antiquity. Whereby all studious Readers, beholding as in a Glass the stay, course, and alteration of Religion, decay of Doctrine, and the Controversies of the Church, might discern the better between Antiquity and Novelty. For if the things which be first (after the Rule of Tertullian) are to be preferred before those that be later, then is the reading of Histories much necessary in the Church, to know what went before, and what followed after; and therefore not without cause Historia, in old Authors, is called the Witness of Times, the Light of Verity, the Life of Memory, Teacher of Life, and Shewer of Antiquity, &c. Without the knowledge whereof many life is blind, and soon may fall into any kind of error, as by manifest experience we have to see in these desolate later Times of the Church, when as the Bishops of Rome under colour of Antiquity have turned Truth into Heresie, and brought such new-found Devises of strange Doctrine and Religion, as in the former Age of the Church were never heard of before, and all through ignorance of Times, and for lack of true History.

Primum quodque verissimum est. Tertul.

For to say the truth, if times had been well searched, or if they which wrote Histories had without partiality gone upright between God and Baal, halting on neither side, it might well have been found, the most part of all this Catholick corruption intruded into the Church by the Bishops of Rome, as Transubstantiation, Elevation and Adoration of the Sacrament, Auricular Confession, forced Vows of Priests not to marry, Veneration of Images, private and satisfactory Masses, the Order of Gregories Mass now used, the usurped Authority and Summa potestas of the See of Rome, with all the rout of

of their Ceremonies and Weeds of Superstition overgrowing now the Church; all these (I say) to be New-nothings lately coined in the Mint of Rome, without any stamp of Antiquity, as by reading of this present History shall sufficiently (I trust) appear. Which History therefore I have here taken in hand, that as other Story-Writers heretofore have employed their travel to magnifie the Church of Rome, so in this History might appear to all Christian Readers the Image of both Churches, as well of the one as of the other; especially of the poor oppressed and persecuted Church of Christ. Which persecuted Church though it hath been of long season trodden under foot by Enemies, neglected in the World, not regarded in Histories, and almost scarce visible or known to worldly eyes, yet hath it been the true Church only of God, wherein he hath mightily wrought hitherto, in preserving the same in all extream Distresses, continually stirring up from time to time faithful Ministers, by whom always have been kept some sparks of his true Doctrine and Religion.

Image of both Churches.

Now forasmuch as the true Church of God goeth not lightly alone, but is accompanied with some other Church or Chappel of the Devil to deface and malign the same, necessary it is therefore the difference between them to be seen, and the descent of the right Church to be described from the Apostles time. Which hitherto in most part of Histories hath been lacking, partly for fear, that men durst not, partly for ignorance, that men could not discern rightly between the one and the other. Who beholding the Church of Rome to be so visible and glorious in the eyes of all the world, so shining in outward beauty, to bear such a Port, to carry such a Train and Multitude, and to stand in such high Authority, supposed the same to be the only right Catholick Mother. The other, because it was not so visibly known in the world, they thought therefore it could not be the true Church of Christ. Wherein they were far deceived: for although the right Church of God be not so invisible in the world that none can see it, yet neither is it so visible again that every worldly eye may perceive it. For like as is the nature of Truth; so is the proper condition of the true Church, that commonly none seeth it, but such only as be the Members and Partakers thereof. And therefore they, which require that Gods holy Church should be evident and visible to the whole World, seem to define the great Synagogue of the World, rather than the true Spiritual Church of God.

The descent of Christs Church from the Apostles time described.

Shew the true Church of Christ is visible and not visible

In Christs time who would have thought but the Congregations and Councils of the Pharisees had been the right Church? and yet had Christ another Church in Earth besides that; which albeit it was not so manifest in the sight of the World, yet was it the only true Church in the sight of God. Of this Church meant Christ, speaking of the Temple which he would raise again the third day. And yet after that the Lord was risen, he shewed not himself to the World, but only to his Elect, which were but few. The same Church after that encreased and multiplied mightily among the Jews, yet had not the Jews eyes to see Gods Church, but did persecute it, till at length all their whole Nation was destroyed.

After the Jews, then came the Heathen Emperors of Rome, who, having the whole Power of the World in their hands, did what the World could do, to extinguish the Name and Church of Christ. Whose violence continued the space of three hundred years. All which while the true Church of Christ was not greatly in sight of the World, but rather was abhorred every where, and ye notwithstanding the same small silly Flock so despised in the World, the Lord highly regarded and mightily preserved. For although many then of the Christians did suffer death, yet was their death neither loss to them, nor detriment to the Church, but the more they suffered, the more of their blood increased.

In the time of these Emperors God raised up then in this Realm of Britain divers worthy Preachers and Witnesses, as Elnanus, Meduinus, Meltivianus, Amphibolus, Albanus, Aaron, Julius, and other more. In whose time the Doctrine of Faith without mens traditions was sincerely preached. After their death and Martyrdom it pleased the Lord to provide a general quietness to his Church, whereby the number of his Flock began more to encrease.

The Antiquity of the Church here in England, with the descent of the same.

In this Age then followed here in the said Land of Britain, Fastidius, Nivianus, Patricius, Bachiarius, Dubricius, Congellus, Kentigernus, Helmotus, David, Daniel, Sampson, Elnodugus, Asaphus, Gildas, Henlanus, Elbodus, Dinothus, Samuel, Nivius, and a great fort more, which governed the Church of Britain by Christian Doctrine a long season; albeit the Civil Governors for the time were then dissolute and careless, as Gildas very sharply doth lay to their Charge, and so at length were subdued by the Saxons.

All this while about the space of four hundred years Religion remained in Britain uncorrupt, and the Word of Christ truly preached, till about the coming of Augustine and of his Companions from Rome, many of the said Britain-Preachers were slain by the Saxons. After that began Christian Faith to enter and spring among the Saxons, after a certain Romish sort, yet notwithstanding somewhat more tolerable than were the times which after followed, through the diligent industry of some godly Teachers which then lived amongst them, as Aidanus, Finianus, Coleman Archbishop of York, Beda, John of Beverly, Alcuinus, Noetus, Huchurius, Serlo, Achardus, Ealtedus, Alexander, Neckham, Negellus, Fenallus, Alfricus, Sygeferthus, and such other; who though they erred in some few things, yet neither so grossly, nor so greatly to be complained of in respect of the abuses that followed. For as yet all this while the Error of Transubstantiation and Elevation, with Auricular Confession, was not crept in for a publick Doctrine in Christs Church, as by their own Saxon Sermon made by Ælfricus, and set out in the second Volume of this present History may appear. During the which mean time, although the Bishops of Rome were had here in some reverence with the Clergy, yet had they nothing as yet to do in making Laws touching matters of the Church of England; but that only appertained to the Kings and Governors of the Land, as is in this story to be seen.

Transubstantiation not yet received for a publick Doctrine.

The Church began to fall from God.

Æneas Sylvius saith, That Matilda made the Pope Heir of those Lands which are called the Patrimony of Saint Peter. Ex Aven. lib. 6.

And thus the Church of Rome, albeit it began then to decline apace from God, yet during all this while it remained hitherto in some reasonable order, till at length, after that, the said Bishops began to shoot up in the world through the liberality of good Princes, and especially of Mathilda a noble Dutchess of Italy, who at her death made the Pope Heir of all her Lands, and endued his See with great Revenues. Then Riches begat Ambition, Ambition destroyed Religion, so that all came to ruine. Out of this Corruption sprang forth here in England (as did in other places more) another Romish kind of Monkery, worse than the other before, being much more drowned in Superstition and Ceremonies, which was about the year of our Lord, 980. Of this Swarm was Egbertus, Aigelbert, Egwine, Boniface, Wilfrede, Agathon, James, Romain, Cedda, Dunstan, Ofwold, Athelwold, Althelwine Duke of Eastangles, Lanfrac, Anselme, and such other.

Monkery when it began to reign in England.

And yet in this time also, through Gods Providence, the Church lacked not some of better knowledge and judgment, to weigh with the darkness of those days. For although King Edgar with Edward his base Son, being seduced by Dunstan, Ofwold, and other Monkish Clerks, was then a great Author and Fautor of much Superstition, erecting as many Monasteries as were Sundays in the year; yet notwithstanding, this continued not long. For eftsoons after the death of Edgar came King Ethelrede and Queen Elfthred his Mother, with Alferus Duke of Merceland, and other Peers and Nobles of the Realm, who displaced the Monks again, and restored the married Priests to their old Possessions and Livings. Moreover, after that followed also the Danes, which overthrew those Monkish Foundations as fast as King Edgar had set them up before.

And thus hitherto stood the condition of the true Church of Christ, albeit not without some repugnance and difficulty, yet in some mean state of the truth and verity, till the time of Pope Hildebrand called Gregory the Seventh, which was near about the year One thousand and eighty, and of Pope Innocentius the Third, in the year One thousand two hundred and fifteen. By whom all together was turned upside down, all Order broken, Discipline dissolved, true Doctrine defaced, Christian Faith extinguished. In stead whereof was set up preaching of mens Decrees, Dreams and idle Traditions. And whereas before Truth was free to be disputed amongst learned men, now Liberty was turned into Law, Argument into Authority. Whatsoever the Bishop of Rome denounced, that stood for an Oracle of all men to be received without Opposition or Contradiction; whatsoever was contrary ipso facto it was Heresie, to be punished with Faggot and flaming fire. Then began the sincere Faith of this English Church, which held out so long, to quail. Then was the clear Sunshine of Gods Word overshadowed with Mists and Darkness, appearing like Sackcloth to the people, which neither could understand what they read, nor yet were permitted to read what they could understand. In these miserable days, as the true Visible Church began now to shrink and keep in for fear: So up start a new sort of Players, to furnish the Stage, as School-Doctors, Canonists, and four Orders of Friers. Besides other Monastical Sects and Fraternities of infinite variety. Which ever since have kept such a stir in the Church, that none for them almost durst rout, neither Cæsar, King, nor Subject. What they defined, stood; what they approved, was Catholick; what they condemned, was Heresie; whomsoever they accused, none almost could save. And thus have these hitherto continued or reigned rather in the Church, the space now of 400 years and odd. During which space the true Church of Christ, although it durst not openly appear in the face of the world, oppressed by Tyranny; yet neither was it so invisible or unknown, but by the Providence of the Lord some Remnant always remained from time to time, which not only shewed secret good affection to sincere Doctrine, but also stood in open defence of Truth against the disordered Church of Rome.

The true Church when it began first to decay.

The true Church continueth in the midst of their Enemies.

In which Catalogue, first, to pretermit Bertramus and Berengarius, which were before Pope Innocent the Third, a learned multitude of sufficient Witnesses here might be produced, whose Names neither are obscure nor Doctrine unknown; as Joachim Abbot of Calabria, Almericus a learned Bishop, who was judged an Heretick for holding against Images in the time of the said Innocentius. Besides the Martyrs of Alsatia, of whom we read an hundred to be burned by the said Innocentius in one day, as writeth Hermanus Mucius. Add likewise to these the Waldenses or Albingenses, which to a great number segregated themselves from the Church of Rome. To this number also belonged Reymondus de Tholouse, Marsilius Patavius, * Gulielmus de S. Amore, Simon Tornacensis, Arnoldus de nova Villa, Johannes Semeca, besides divers other Preachers in Suevia standing against the Pope. One thousand four hundred and forty. Ex Crantz. I do but recite the principal Writers and Preachers in those days. How many thousands there were which never bowed their knees to Baal, that is known to God alone. Of whom we find in the writings of one * Brulhius, that six and thirty Citizens of Maguntia were burned, Anno, One thousand three hundred and ninety. Who, following the Doctrine of the Waldenses, affirmed the Pope to be the Great Antichrist. Also Massæus recordeth of one hundred and forty, which in the Province of Narbon were put to the fire, for not receiving the Decretals of Rome, besides them that suffered at Paris to the number of four and twenty at one time, Anno 1210. and the next year after were four hundred burnt under the name of Hereticks; besides also a certain good Heremit, an Englishman, of whom mention is made in John Bacon, Dist. 2. Quæst. 1. who was committed for disputing in Pauls Church against certain Sacraments of the Church of Rome, Anno 1306.

To descend now somewhat lower in drawing out the Descent of the Church. What a multitude here cometh of faithful Witnesses in the time of John Wickliff, as Ocliff, Wickliff, Anno 1379. William Thorp, White, Purvey, Fatfhal, Pain, Gower, Chaucer, Gascoin, Will. Swinderby, Walter Brute, Roger Dexter, William Sautry, about the year, 1400. John Badby, Anno 1410. Nicholas Tailer, Richard Wagstaff, Michael Scrivener, William Smith, John Henry, William Parchmenar, Roger Goldsmith, with an Anchoresse called Mathilde in the City of Leicester, Lord Cobham, Sir Roger Acton Knight, John Beverley Preacher, John Husse, Jerome of Prague, a Schoolmaster, with a number of faithful Bohemians, and Thaborites not to be told; with whom I might also adjoyn Laurentius Valla, and Joannes Picus, the learned Earl of Mirandula. But what do I stand upon recital of Names, which almost are infinite?

Whereforе, if any be so far beguiled in his Opinion to think the Doctrine of the Church of Rome (as it now standeth) to be of such Antiquity, and that the same was never impugned before the time of Luther and Zuinglius now of late, let them read these Histories: or if he think, the said History not to be of sufficient credit to alter his Perswasion, let him peruse the Acts and Statutes of Parliaments, passed in this Realm of ancient time, and therein consider and confer the course of times; where he may find and read, Anno 5. Regis Richardi 2. in the year of our Lord, 1380. of a great number (which there be called evil persons) going about from Town to Town in Freeze Gowns, preaching unto the people, &c. Which Preachers although the words of the Statute do term there to be dissembling persons, preaching divers Sermons containing Heresies and notorious Errors, to the enablishment of Christian Faith, and of holy Church, &c. as the words do there pretend; yet notwithstanding every true Christian Reader may conceive of those Preachers to teach no other Doctrine, than now they bear their own Preachers in Pulpits preach against the Bishop of Rome, and the corrupt Heresies of his Church.

Statut. in An. 5 Rich. 2. Anno Dom. 1380

Furthermore, he shall find likewise in Statut. Anno 2 Hen. 4. cap. 15. in the year of our Lord, 1402. another like company of good Preachers and faithful Defenders of true Doctrine against blind Heresie and Error. Whom albeit the words of the Statute there, through corruption of that time, do falsly term to be false and perverse Preachers, under dissembled Holiness, teaching in those days openly and privily new Doctrines and heretical Opinions, contrary to the Faith and determination of holy Church, &c. yet notwithstanding whosoever readeth Histories, and conferreth the order and descent of times, shall understand these to be no false Teachers, but faithful Witnesses of the Truth, not teaching any new Doctrines contrary to the determination of holy Church; but rather shall find that Church to be unholy which they preached against, teaching rather it self heretical Opinions, contrary both to Antiquity, and Verity of Christs true Catholick Church.

Ex Stat. In Anno 2 H. 4. cap. 15. Anno Dom. 1402

Of the like number also, or greater, of like faithful Favourers and Followers of Gods holy Word, we find in the year, 1422. specified in a Letter sent from Henry Chichelly Archbishop of Canterbury, to Pope Martin the Fifth, in the fifth year of his Popedom, where mention is made of some many here in England infected (as he said) with the Heresies of Wickliff and Husse, that without force of an Army they could not be suppressed, &c. Whereupon the Pope sent two Cardinals to the Archbishop, to cause a tenth to be gathered of all spiritual and religious men, and the money to be laid in the Chamber Apostolik; and if that were not sufficient, the residue to be made up of Chalices, Candlesticks, and other Implements of the Church, &c.

Ex literis Archiepisc. Cant. ad Martin. 5. Anno Dom. 1422

What shall need then any more Witnesses to prove this matter, when you see so many years ago whole Armies and Multitudes thus standing against the Pope? who though they be termed here for Heresticks and Schismaticks, yet in that which they call Heresie served they the living Lord within the Ark of his true Spiritual and visible Church.

And where is then the frivolous brag of the Papists, which make so much of their painted sheath, and would weeds bear us down, that this Government of the Church of Rome, which now is, hath been of such an old standing, time out of mind, even from the Primitive Antiquity, and that never was any other Church demonstrable here in Earth for men to follow, besides the said only Catholick Mother Church of Rome? when as we have sufficiently proved before, by the continual descent of the Church

till this present time, that the said Church, after the Doctrine which is now reformed, is no new begun matter, but even the old continued Church, by the providence and promise of Christ still standing, which albeit it hath been of late years repressed by the tyranny of Roman Bishops more than before, yet notwithstanding it was never so oppressed, but God hath ever maintained in it the truth of his Gospel, against Heresies and Errors of the Church of Rome, as in this History more at full is to be seen.

Let us now proceed further as we began, deducing this descent of the Church unto the 1501 year.

Bloody Marks of Christs Passion seen on mens garments in Germany. An. 1501.

In which year the Lord began to shew in the parts of Germany wonderful Tokens, and bloody Marks of his Passion, as the bloody-Cross, his Nails, Spear, and Crown of Thornes, which fell from Heaven upon the Garments and Caps of Men, and Rocks of Women, as you may further read in this Book. By the which Tokens Almighty God, no doubt, presignified, what grievous Afflictions and bloody Persecutions should then begin to ensue upon his Church for his Gospel-sake, according as in this History is described; wherein is to be seen what Christian-blood hath been spilt, what Persecutions raised, what Tyranny exercised, what Torments devised, what Treachery used against the poor Flock and Church of Christ; in such sort as since Christs time greater hath not been seen.

Seventy years of Captivity well near expired.

And now by revolution of years we are come from that time of 1501, to the year now present 1570. In which the full seventy years of the Babylonish-Captivity draweth now well to an end, if we count from the first appearing of these bloody Marks above mentioned. Or if we reckon from the beginning of Luther and his Persecution, then lacketh yet sixteen years. Now what the Lord will do with this wicked World, or what rest he will give to his Church after these long Sorrows, he is our Father in Heaven, his Will be done in Earth as seemeth best to his divine Majesty.

Exhortation to the Church of England.

In the mean time let us for our parts with all patient Obedience wait upon his Graces leisure, and glorifie his holy Name, and edifie one another with all humility. And if there cannot be an end of our disputing and contending one against another, yet let there be a moderation in our affections. And forasmuch as it is the good Will of our God, that Satan thus should be let loose amongst us for a short time; yet let us strive in the mean while what we can to amend the malice of the time with mutual humanity. They that be in Error let them not disdain to learn. They which have greater Talents of Knowledge committed, instruct in simplicity them that be simple. No man liveth in that Commonwealth where nothing is amiss; but yet because God hath so placed us Englishmen here in one Commonwealth, also in one Church, as in one Ship together; let us not wrangle or divide the Ship, which being divided perisheth; but every man serve with diligence and discretion in his Order, wherein he is called. They that sit at the Helm keep well the point of the Needle, to know how the Ship goeth, and whither it should. Whatsoever weather betideth, the Needle well touched with the Stone of Gods Word, will never fail. Such as labour at the Oars start for no Tempest, but do what they can to keep from the Rocks. Likewise they which be in inferior Rooms take heed they move no Sedition nor Disturbance against the Rowers and Mariners. No Storm so dangerous to a Ship on the Sea, as is discord and disorder in a Weal publick. What Countries and Nations, what Kingdoms and Empires, what Cities, Towns and Houses discord hath dissolved, in Stories is manifest; I need not spend time in rehearsing Examples. The God of Peace, who hath Power both of Land and Sea, reach forth his merciful hand to help them up that sink, to keep up them that stand, to still these Winds and surging Seas of Discord and Contention among us; that we professing one Christ, may in one Unity of Doctrine gather our selves into one Ark of the true Church together, where we continuing stedfast in Faith, may at the last luckily be conducted to the joyful Port of our desired landing-place, by his heavenly Grace. To whom both in Heaven and Earth, be all Power and Glory, with his Father and the Holy Spirit for ever. Amen.

The

The Utility of this STORY.

Multitude of Books lamented.

THe World being replenished with such an infinite multitude of Books of all kind of matters, I may seem, perhaps, to take a matter in hand superfluous and needless, at this present to set out such Volumes, especially of Histories, considering now adays the World is so greatly pestered, not only with superfluous plenty thereof, but of all other Treatises, so that Books now seem rather to lack Readers, than Readers to lack Books. In the which multitude of Books, I doubt not but many do both perceive, and inwardly bewail this insatiable boldness of many now adays both in Writing and Printing; which, to say the truth, for my part I do as much lament as any man else beside; and would therefore no man should think that unadvisedly or with rashness I have attempted this Enterprise, as one being not only doubtful, but also both bashful and fearful within my self for setting the same abroad. And why? First, I perceived how learned this Age of ours is in reading of Books, neither could I tell what the secret judgments of Readers would conceive, to see so weak a thing to set upon such a weighty Enterprise, not sufficiently furnished with such Ornaments able to satisfie the perfection of so great a story, or sufficient to serve the Utility of the Studious, and the delight of the Learned. Which ability the more I perceived to be wanting in me, the less I durst be bold to become a Writer.

But again on the other side, when I weighed with my self what memorable Acts and famous Doings this later Age of the Church hath ministred to us by the patient Sufferings of the worthy Martyrs, I thought it not to be neglected, that so precious Monuments of so many matters, meet to be recorded and registred in Books, should be buried by my default, under darkness of Oblivion. Me thought somewhat was to be said of them for their well deserving, and something again of our parts for benefit by them received. But above all other things, nothing did so stir me forward hereunto, as the diligent consideration and special regard of the common Utility which every man plentifully may receive by the reading of those Monuments or Martyrology; which History as I have taken in hand chiefly for the use of the English-Church, so have I framed it in that Tongue which the simple people could best understand.

Now if men commonly delight so much in other Chronicles which entreat only upon matters of Policy, and rejoyce to behold therein the variable events of worldly affairs, the Stratagems of valiant Captains, the terror of foughten Fields, the facking of Cities, the hurlyburlies of Realms and People; And if men think it such a gay thing in a Commonwealth to commit to History such old Antiquities of things prophane, and bestow all their Ornaments of Wit and Eloquence in garnishing the same, how much more then is it meet for Christians to conserve in remembrance the Lives, Acts, and Doings, not of bloody Warriors, but of mild and constant Martyrs of Christ, which serve not so much to delight the ear, as to garnish the life, to frame it with examples of great profit, and to encourage men to all kind of Christian godliness? As first, by reading thereof we may learn a lively testimony of Gods mighty working in the life of man, contrary to the opinion of Atheists, and all the whole Nest of Epicures. For like as one said of Harpalus in times past, that his doings gave a lively testimony against God, because he being so wicked a man, escaped so long unpunished; so contrariwise in these men we have a much more assured and plain witness of God, both in whose Lives and Deaths appeared such manifest Declarations of Gods divine working, whiles in such sharpness of Torments we behold in them strength so constant above mans reach, such readiness to answer, such patience in imprisonment, such godliness in forgiving, chearfulness, so couragious in suffering, besides the manifold sense and feeling of the Holy Ghost, which they in their Lives so plentifully tasted in their Afflictions, as in reading of their Letters evidently we may understand. Over and besides this the mild deaths of the Saints do not a little avail to the stablishing of a good Conscience, to learn the contempt of the World, and to come to the fear of God. Moreover, they confirm Faith, encrease Godliness, abate Pride in Prosperity, and in Adversity do open an hope of heavenly Comfort. For what man reading the misery of these godly persons may not therein, as in a Glass, behold his own case, whether he be godly or godless? For if God give Adversity unto good men, what may either the better sort promise themselves, or the evil not fear? And as by reading of prophane stories we are made perhaps more skilful in Warlike affairs; so by reading this we are made better in our livings, and besides are better prepared unto the like Conflicts, (if by Gods permission they shall happen hereafter) more wise by their Doctrine, and more stedfast by their Example.

Comparison between worldly Souldiers and the Souldiers of Christ.

To be short, they declare to the World what true Christian Fortitude is, and what is the right way to conquer, which standeth not in the power of man, but in hope of the Resurrection to come, and is now, I trust, at hand. In consideration whereof, me thinks I have good cause to wish, that like as other Subjects, even so also Kings and Princes, which commonly delight in Heroical Stories, would diligently peruse such Monuments of Martyrs, and lay them always in sight, not only to read, but to follow, and would paint them upon their Walls, Cups, Rings, and Gates. For doubtless such as these are more worthy of honour than an hundred hundred Alexanders, Hectors, Scipio's, and War-like Julies. And though the World judgeth preposterously of things, yet with God, the true Judge, certes such are to be reputed in deed; not that kill one another with a Weapon, but they which being rather killed in Gods Cause do retain an invincible constancy against the Threats of Tyrants, and Violence of Tormentors. Such as these are indeed the true Conquerors of the World, by whom we learn true Manhood, so many as fight under Christ, and not under the World. With this valiantness did that most mild Lamb, and invincible Lion of the Tribe of Juda first of all go before us. Of whose unspeakable Fortitude we hear this Prophetical admiration, Who is this (saith he) which walketh so in the multitude of his strength; Forsooth the high Son of the high God, once conquered of the World, and yet conquering the World after the same manner he was conquered. Isa. 63.

The like dance did all his other Martyrs follow, to whom the ancient Antiquity of the Church did attribute so much honour, as never King or Emperor could purchase in this World with all their Images, Pillars, high Spires, Triumphs, Temples, and all their solemn Feasts. In probation whereof we see with what admiration, and almost superstition, not only the Memory but also the Reliques of those goods Martyrs were received and kept amongst the ancient Christians. We have also for witness the learned Hymns and Songs of Prudentius and Nazianzen, wherewith Pindarus did never so much set out his Triumphs of Olympia and Nemea. I need not here rehearse the learned Orations of Eloquent Cyprian, Chrysostome, Ambrose, and Jerome, who never shewed their Eloquence more, than when they fell into the Commendations of the godly Martyrs.

Whereby it is manifest, what estimation in times past was attributed to Martyrs; with what Gratulation, Rejoyce, Mirth, and common Joy the Afflictions of those godly, dying in Christs Quarrel, were sometime received and solemnized; and that not without good reasonable cause. For the Church did well consider how much she was beholding to their benefits, by whose death she understood her Treasures to increase. Now then if Martyrs are to be compared with Martyrs, I see no cause why the Martyrs of our time deserve any less Commendation, than the other in the Primitive Church; which assuredly are inferior unto them in no point of praise; whether we view the number of them that suffered, or greatness of their Torments, or their constancy in dying, or also confider the fruit that they brought to the amendment of Posterity, and increase of the Gospel. They did water with their Blood the Truth that was newly springing up; so these by their deaths restored it again, being so decayed and fain down. They standing in the foreward of the battel, did receive the first Incounter and Violence of their Enemies, and taught us by that means to overcome such Tyranny; these with like courage again, like old beaten Souldiers, did win the field in the rereward of the battel. They like famous Husbandmen of the World did sow the Fields of the Church, that first lay unmanured and waste; these with fatness of their Blood did cause it to batten and fructifie. Would to God the Fruit might be speedily gathered into the Barn, which only remaineth behind to come.

Comparison between the Martyrs of the Primitive Church, and of the later Church.

Now, if we ascribe such Reputation to godly Preachers (and worthily) which diligently Preach the Gospel of Christ, when they live notwithstanding, by the benefit of time, without all fear of Persecution; how much more reasonable cause have we to praise and extol such men as stoutly spend their Lives for the defence of the same? All these premisses duly of our parts considered and marked, seeing we have found so famous Martyrs in this our Age, let us not fail then in publishing and setting forth their doings, lest in that point we seem more unkind to them, than the Writers of the Primitive Church were unto theirs. And though we repute not their Ashes, Chains, and Swords in stead of Relicks; yet let us yield thus much unto their Commemoration, to glorifie the Lord in his Saints, and imitate their death (as much as we may) with like constancy, or their Lives at the least with like Innocency. They offered their Bodies willingly to the rough handling of the Tormentors; and is it so great a matter then for our part to mortifie our Flesh, with all the members thereof? They neglected not only the Riches and Glory of the World for the love of Christ, but also their Lives; and shall we then keep so great a stir one against another for the transitory trifles of this World? They continued in patient suffering, when they had most wrong done to them, and when their very hearts blood gushed out of their Bodies; and yet will not we forgive our poor Brother, be the injury never so small, but are ready for every trifling offence to seek his destruction, and cut his throat. They wishing well to all men, did of their own accord forgive their Persecutors; and therefore ought we, which are now the Posterity and Children of Martyrs, not to degenerate from their former steps, but being admonished, by their Examples, if we cannot express their charity toward all men, yet at least to imitate the same to our power and strength. Let us give no cause of offence to any. And if any be given to us, let us overcome it with patience, forgiving and not revenging the same. And let us not only keep our Hands from shedding of Blood, but our Tongues also from hurting the fame of others. Besides, let us not shrink, if case so require, by Martyrdom, or loss of Life, according to their Example, to yield up the same in the defence of the Lords Flock. Which thing if men would do, much less contention and business would be in the World than now is. And thus much touching the Utility and Fruit to be taken of this History.

To all the Professed FRIENDS and FOLLOWERS of the POPES Proceedings.

Four Questions Propounded.

Four demands or questions put forth to the Papists.

TO you all and singular which profess the Doctrine and Religion of the Pope your holy Father, and of your Mother-Church of Rome, pretending the Name of Catholicks, commonly termed Papists, wheresoever abiding in the Realm of England, these four Questions or Problems hereunder following I would move, desiring you all either to muse upon them, or to answer them at your leisure.

The first Question.

The first question.

FIRST, Forsomuch as Mount Sion (which God called by the Prophet Isaiah the Hill of his Holiness) beareth in the Scripture an undoubted Type of the Spiritual Church of Christ; and forsomuch as the said Isaiah, Chapter eleventh, and sixty fifth, prophesying of the said Mount Sion, saith in these words, Non nocebunt, neque affligent in omni monte sancto meo, dicit Dominus, &c. That is, They shall not kill nor hurt in all my holy Hill, saith the Lord, &c. And again in the same Chapters thus we read, Habitabit Lupus cum Agno, & Pardus cum Hædo accubabit, Vitulus & Leo & Ovis una commorabuntur, & puellus parvulus ducet eos, &c. That is, The Wolf shall dwell with the Lamb, and the Leopard with the Kid; the Calf, the Lion, and the Sheep shall feed together, and a young Child shall rule them. The Cow also and the Bear shall abide together with their young Ones, and the Lion shall eat Chaff and Fodder like the Ox, &c. Isa. 11. 65.

Upon these premisses note followeth my question; Why the Church of Rome can be answerable to this Hill of Sion, seeing in the same Church of Rome is and hath been now so many years such killing and slaying, such cruelty and tyranny shewed, such burning and spilling of Christian blood, such malice and mischief wrought, as in reading these Histories may to all the World appear? Objection.

To this if they answer, and expound these words of the Prophet, as pertaining to the Church-Triumphant; thereunto I reply again, that by the words in the same place and in the same sentence expressed, that sense cannot stand, forasmuch as the Prophet in the very same place, where he prophesieth of this peaceable dwelling in Gods holy Mountain without hurting or killing, meaneth plainly of the Earth, and sheweth also the cause of that godly peace. Because (saith he) the Earth is replenished with Knowledge and Science of the Lord, &c. Ibid. And furthermore the Prophet, speaking of the same day when this shall be, adderh, saying, In that day the Root of Jesse shall stand for a sign to the people, for the Gentiles to be converted, and to seek unto him, &c. Which day in no wise can be applied to the Church in Heaven Triumphant, but only here Militant in Earth. Reflexion.

Touching which place of Isaiah further here is to be noted by the way, that by this peaceable Mount Sion (which compasseneth both the Seares, as well Ecclesiastical as Temporal) is not restrained the publick penalty of good Laws needful to be executed upon publick Malefactors, but here is restrained the fierceness, revenge, cruelty, and violence of mens affections. To which affections men being commonly subject by nature, though grace and working of the Gospel they are altered, reformed, and changed to another disposition, from stoutness to softness, from violence to sufferance, from fierceness to foybearing, from pride to humility, from cruelty to compassion, from wilfulness to simplicity, from solemn singularity to humanity and meekness. Which vertues, if they had been in the Church of Rome (according to the rule of Saint Paul, Which willeth men that be stronger to bear with the infirmities of the weaker, and that in the spirit of meekness, &c. Rom. 15. Gal. 6.) I should not have needed now at this time to write such a long History as this, of the suffering of so many Martyrs. Publick execution of Laws not forbidden in Scripture. The Conditions and Properties of the true Church of Christ. Rom. 15. Gal. 6.

The second Question.

The second question. The deadly hatred of the Papists against the Protestants grounded upon no just cause or deserving.

MY second Question is this, To demand of you Catholick Professors of the Popes Sect, which so deadly malign and persecute the Protestants professing the Gospel of Christ: What just or reasonable cause have you to allege for this your extream hatred ye bear unto them, that neither you your selves can abide to live with them, nor yet will suffer them to live amongst you? If they were Jews, Turks, or Infidels, or in their Doctrine were any idolatrous Impiety, or detestable Iniquity in their lives; if they went about any deadly Destruction, or privy Conspiracies to oppress your lives, or by fraudulent dealing to circumvent you: then had you some cause to complain, and also to revenge. Now seeing in their Doctrine ye have neither Blasphemy, Idolatry, Superstition, nor misbelief to object unto them; seeing they are baptized in the same Belief, and believe the same Articles of the Creed as ye do; having the same God, the same Christ and Saviour, the same Baptism, and are ready to confer with you in all kind of Christian Doctrine, neither do refuse to be tried by any place of the Scripture; how then riseth this mortal malice of you against them? If you think them to be Hereticks, then bring forth, if ye can, any one Sentence which they arrogantly hold, contrary to the mind of holy Scripture, expounded by the censure of most ancient Doctors. Or what is there in all the Scripture to be required, but they acknowledge and confess the same? See and try the order of their lives and doings; what great fault find you? They serve God, they walk under his fear, they obey his Law, as men may do: and though they be Transgressors towards him, as other men are, yet toward you what have they done, what have they committed or deserved, why you should be so bitter against them?

Malice and cruelty of Papists against the Country of Merindol and Cabriers.

What offended the poor Inhabitants of Merindoll and Cabriers, when the Bishop of Aix, the Cardinal of Turon, and other Bishops of France, wresting from Francis the French King a Commission, sent Minerius with his Captain John de Gray, to destroy their Country, Anno 1530. who driving the poor people there into a Barn full of straw, set the Barn on fire, and burned up Men, Women, and Children? And likewise in a Church exercised the like cruelty upon them, where were murdered the same time to the number of a thousand Young and Old, Women, Children, and young Infants, besides seven whole Towns, with the most part of the dwellers therein, being murdered and burnt in the said Country of Provence.

Malice of Papists against the Citizens of Tholouse in France.

Also before that, what offended the Citizens of Tholouse and Avinion, when Pope Gregory the Ninth set Lewis the French King to War against them, and against Raymundus their Earl, without cause; where also the said King died at the Siege.

Malice and cruelty of Papists against the Protestants of the Town of Vaffy.

Do to speak of later years, what hurt or harm did the poor Protestants in the Town of Vaffy, who, being peaceably at a Sermon, were miserably slain and cut, Men, Women, and Children, by the Duke of Guise and his armed Soudiers & Besides other infinite Examples almost not to be numbred of like cruelty, in Calabria, Apulia, Bohemia, Germany, France, and now of late in Flanders, and in other Countries more.

Clemency and mercy shewed to Papists in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

But to let other Countries pass, let us turn now to the peaceable Government in this Realm of England, under this our so mild and gracious Queen now prosperly reigning. Under whom you see how gently you are dealt with, how quietly you live. What lack you that you should have, having suffered, what mercy is shewed unto you, how quietly ye live. What lack you that you should have, having almost the best Rooms and Offices in all the Realm, not only without any loss of life, but also without any fear of death & And though a few of your Arch-Clerks be in custody, yet in that custody is thewnly are they but there, that many a good Protestant in the Realm would be glad with all their hearts to change Rooms and Diet with them, if they might. And albeit some other for their pleasure have slipt over the Seas; if their courage to see Countries abroad did so allure them, who could let them & For this is certain, no dread there was of death that drave them. For what Papist have you seen in all this Land to lose either life or limb for Papistry, during all these twelve years bitherto since this Queens Reign & And yet all this notwithstanding, having no cause to complain, so many causes to give God thanks, ye are not yet content, ye fret and fume, ye grudge and murmer, and are not pleased with peace, nor satisfied with safety, but pray for a day, and fain would have a change. And to prevent your desired day, ye have conspired, and risen up in open Rebellion against your Prince, whom the Lord hath set up to be your Governour.

The traitorious murdering of the Lord Iames Regent of Scotland, Martyr.

And as you have since that now of late disturbed the quiet and peaceable State of Scotland, in murdering most traiterously the gentle and godly Regent of Scotland (who in fearing the Queens life there, when he had her in his hands, hath now therefore lost his own;) to with like fury, by your Rebellion appeareth, would you disturb the golden quiet and tranquility of this Realm of England, if ye might have your wills. Which the merciful Grace of the Almighty, for Christ his Sons sake our Lord, prosebend and utterly disappoint. Amen.

The chief cause of all these later Perfecutions in the Church, is only the private quarrel of the Bishop of Rome.

Wherefore these premisses conswered, my question is to ask of you and know, what just or reasonable cause ye have of these your unreasonable doings, of this your so mortal and deadly hatred, fury and malice you bear against these your even-Christens, of these your Tumults, Conjurations, Saping and Doping, Rebellions, Sputterings, and Murders wherewith you trouble and disquiet the whole World & Of all which mischiefs if the true cause were well known, the truth would be found doubtless to be none other but only the private cause of the Bishop of Rome, that he is not received, and the dignity of his Church exalted.

The Plantation of the Popes Supremacy proved not to be of God.

Touching which cause how unreasonable and unjust it is, more shall be said (the Lord willing) in reply, according as I shall see their answer, if it shall so please them, or any of them to answer this question. In the mean time, this so a brief note shall suffice; that it standeth not with Scripture, but contrary to Scripture, that the Bishop of Rome should so revenge his own private cause. If this Title and Plantation be good and of God, why doth he not refer it unto God? And no doubt, but if it be so, God will maintain it though the whole World fain No. If it be otherwise, it will fail and be rooted out, though all the World should so labour to prop it. If it be otherwise, it will fail and be rooted out, though all the World hath so much Power to do the Works of the first Beast before his face, as he & no who but he alone & which Power to do the works of the Beast before his sight. Apoc. 13. said Yea. Yea the greatest argument to prove this Plantation of the Popes Supremacy not to be of God, is, only the Glory and Will of his Father, thus speaking of himself, Si ego glorifico meipsum, gloria mea nihil est, pater meus est qui glorificat me, &c. John 8. That is, If I glorify my self, my glory is nothing; my Father is he that glorifieth me, &c. John 8. Even so I say with Scripture, that if the Popes proceedings were planted of God, he would not so waistle for his glory, as he doth: Nor so slowly as he seeketh by such cruelty and bloodshed to exalt himself, we may well argue his proceedings not to be of God, and that he should be brought low, ye. Luke 18. Luke 18.

The third Question.

The third Question. Apoc. 13. The two Beasts in the Book of Revelation described. The second Beast with horns like a Lamb.

My third question I take of the thirteenth Chapter of the Book of Revelation, Which Book as it containeth a Prophetical History of the Church, so likewise it requireth by Histories to be opened. In this History mention is made, first of a certain Beast coming out of the Sea, having seven Heads and ten Horns, with ten Diadems of Blasphemy: Unto the which Beast the Dragon the Devil gave his strength, and great Power to fight against his Saints, and to overcome them, and to make forty two months; of the which Beast one of his heads was wounded as largely to death, &c.

After this, immediately in the same Chapter, mention followeth of another Beast rising out of the Land, having two Horns like a Lamb, and did all the Power of the former Beast before having two Horns like a Lamb, and spake like a Dragon, and did all the Power of the former Beast before him, and caused all dwellers of the Earth to Worship the first Beast, whose Head was wounded and slain. Who his face, and caused all dwellers of the Earth to Worship the first Beast, whose Head was wounded and slain. Who also had put Power to give Spirit and life to the said former Beast, to make the Image of the Beast to speak, and to cause all men, from the highest to the lowest, to take the mark of the Beast in their Hands and Foreheads; and whosoever worshipped not the Image of the Beast, should be killed, &c.

Upon this description of these two Beasts risen my question; wherein I desire all Papists, from the highest to the lowest, either to answer, or to consider with themselves, what the Spirit of the Prophesie meaneth by the said two Beasts. Neither is the mystery of this Prophesie so obscure, but being Historical by Histories it may be explained and easily expounded. Writing therefore to the Papists, as men expert in Histories, my question is this, That seeing the Prophesie of these two Beasts must needs presigure some People or Dominion in the World, of some high estate and power; they will now declare unto us, what people or domination this should be. Which if they will do plainly and truly, according to the marks and properties of the said two Beasts here set forth, they must needs be driven of force inevitable to grant and confess, the same to agree only to the City and Empire of Rome, and to no other; which by these Reasons following of necessity must needs be concluded.

The mystery of this first Beast rising out of the Sea, applied.

First, The Beast which came out of the Sea, having the Strength, the Seat and Power of the great Dragon (the Devil, called the Prince of this World) committed to him, who also had Power given over all Tribes, Nations, Languages, People and Countries in the Earth, must needs be an Empire or Monarchy of great force, passing all other Monarchies in the world besides: and this must needs argue the Empire of Rome and none other.

The Image of the Beast reflected to the Monarchy of Rome, before.

Secondly, In that the Beast had seven heads and ten horns, with ten Diadems full of blasphemy upon them; those seven heads being expounded in the same Book, Chap. 17. to seven Hills, not obscurely importing the City of Rome, wherein were seven hills contained. The like also may be thought of the ten horns, being there expounded pounded for ten Kings (signifying belike the ten Provinces and Kingdoms of the world, subdued to the Roman Empire) with ten Crowns of Blasphemy upon their heads; all which conveniently agree to the City of Rome.

Of these forty two months, and the exposition thereof read after.

Thirdly, Where the said Beast had Power to make 42 months, and to fight against the Saints, and to overcome them, &c. Thereby must manifestly is declared the Empire of Rome, with the Heathen persecuting Emperors, which had Power given the space of so many months (that is, from Tiberius to Licinius, 294 years) to persecute Christs Church, as in the Table of the Primitive Church hereafter following is discovered more at large.

The wounded head of the Beast in the Revelation, was at the first beginning of the Empire, and after recovered. The second Beast rising out of the Land, presending the like horns of a Lamb, what head was wounded and cured again.

Fourthly, Where the Prophet speaketh of one of the heads of the Beast to be wounded to death, and the wound afterward to be cured again: by that ye have to understand the decay and subversion of the City of Rome, and of Italy, which, being one of the heads of the Roman Monarchy, was subdued by the Goths, Vandals, and the Lombards, and the City of Rome thrice sackt and taken, between the Reigu of Honorius Emperor of Rome, and the time of Justinian Emperor of Constantinople; and so remained this head of Rome wounded a long time under the Dominion of the Lombards, till at length this wound was cured again, as the sequel of this Prophesie declareth. For to it followeth in the aforesaid Chapter of the Revelation; And after this I saw (saith he) another Beast rising out of the Land, having two horns like the Lamb, and spake like the Dragon. Who practised all the Power of the first Beast before his face, and caused all the Inhabitants of the Earth to worship the first Beast, whose head was wounded and cured again, &c. And to him it was given to give life to the Image of the Beast, and to make it speak: and also to make all them that will not worship the Image of the Beast, to be slain, and caused all from the most to the least, both rich and poor, free-men and bond-men, to take the mark of the Beast in their right hand and in their foreheads, so that none should buy or sell, unless he had the Beasts mark about him, &c.

The description of this second Beast being well viewed, it cannot be avoided, but needs must be applied to Apoc. 13. the Bishop of Rome, and to none other; as by Pistory, and other of times is evident to be proved. For who else experienteth the powers of the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the World, but only he & Who pretendeth with the voice of the Dragon to pound us in the Faith of Christ. That is, of the old Testament. The voice of the Dragon is the voice of the Devil. What is the Kingdom of the Earth, but only the World was his, to give to whom he would, and that he would give it, &c. And doth not this false boyned Lamb, speaking in the same voice of the Dragon, say by the mouth of P. Greg. 7. That all the Kingdoms of the Earth were his, and that he had Power in Earth to loose, and take away Empires, Kingdoms, Dukedoms, and what else soever mortal men may have, and to give them where he would, &c. Ex Plat. in Vit. Gregor. 7.

The mystery of the three-headed Monarchy reversed by the Bishop of Rome.

Furthermore, at what time the declining State of Rome began to decay, and Italy was brought under subjection of the Lombards, then the Pope stirred up Pipinus and Carolus Magnus, to take his part against the Lombards, and to restore again the old glory of that Monarchy to his former State. And therefore who is the woundes head of this Beast again, but only he & Who gave life and Speech to the Image of the Beast, but he & who, after that by the help of the French Kings he had subdued those Lombards with other Aliens, and had gotten the possession of Rome into his own hands, he to repaired and advanced the fame and name of Rome, that since that time all persons from the highest to the lowest, both rich and poor, have been glad to send and seek to Rome, yea Kings, Emperors, Queens and Dukes have been glad to kiss that Bishops feet, and to lead his horse by the bridle. So that the Majesty of Rome, in the old Heathen Emperors days was never more terrible nor glorious, nor ever had more power to persecute and overcome Gods Saints, than this false Lamb-like Bishops of Rome hath, and hath exercised these 600 years in Christendom. And therefore who is like to all the World to worship the first Beast before his face, as he & no who but he alone & which Power to do the works of the Beast before his sight. Apoc. 13. forcerly both high and low, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive the Seal, and to become loyal to the City and See of Rome; so that whosoever hath not the mark whereby to be known to bold of the Church of Rome, Beast before shall have no place to buy and sell, nor to occupy in all Christendom.

Now if any Papists whatsoever, in answering to this my question, can apply this prophetical mystery of these two Beasts otherwise than thus, I would heartily desire him to take so much pains to satisfie this doubt of his good pleasure and leisure. In the mean season, for this stand by a Conclusion, that the Bishop of Rome by this description must be that second Beast prophesied to come in the later time of the Church under a false pretended Lamb, to restore again the old Persecutions of Rome, and to disturb the whole Church of Christ, as this day to truly it is come to pass.

The fourth Question.

As touching my fourth question, although I could urge you with another like prophetical place of Scripture, no less evident against the Bishop of Rome, taken out of the second Epistle of Saint Paul to the Thessalonians, where mention is made of the Son of Perdition, sitting in the Temple of God, as God, and advancing himself above all that is called God, &c. Which place ye can by no reasonable evasion avoid; yet notwithstanding to let this pass, I turn my question to ask this of you; Whether the Religion of Christ be more spiritual, or else corporal? If ye affirm it to be corporal, as was the old Religion of the Jews, consisting in outward Rites, Sacrifices, and Ceremonies of the Law; then shew if ye can, what any one outward action or observation is required in Christian Religion by the Scripture, as necessary in a Christian man for remission of sins and Salvation, save only the two Sacramental Ceremonies of outward Baptism, and of the Lords Supper? Howbeit, neither these also as they are corporal; that is to say, neither the outward action of the one, nor of the other, conferreth remission of sins, nor salvation, but only are visible shews of invisible and spiritual Benefits. And furthermore, if our God whom we serve be Spiritual; how can his Religion and Service be Corporal, as we are taught by the mouth of our Saviour, saying, God is a Spirit, and therefore they that worship him must worship in Spirit and Verity, &c. John 4.

Religion of Christ spiritual, and not corporal.

Now if you grant (as ye must needs) this our Christian Religion to be spiritual, and not a corporal Religion, then shew, if ye can, any one point of all these things, which ye bribe you to much with us, to be spiritual, but altogether corporal, and extern matters and Ceremonial Observations, nothing conducing to any spiritual purpose, as your outward succession of Bishops, Garments, Gestures, Gestures, Colours, choice of Meats, difference of days, times and places, hearing, saying, saying, touching, tasting, numbring of Beads, gilding and worshipping of Images, building of Monasteries, rising at midnight, silence in Cloysters, abstaining from fleh and white meat, fasting in Lent, keeping Embre-days, hearing Mass and Divine Service, saying and singing Psalms, the Body in form of Bread, receiving holy-Water and holy-Bread, creeping to the Cross, carrying Palms, taking Ashes, bearing Candles, Pilgrimage going, confing, kneeling, knocking, Altars, super-Altars, Candlesticks, Thurbows; In Dyners, crossing, anointing, having, forswearing Marriage; In Baptism, crossing, talking, spetling, exorcising, washing of hands; at Easter, ear-confession, Penance-doing, satisfaction: And in receiving, with Beards new shaven, to imagine a Body where they see no Body; and though he were there present to be seen, yet the outward seeing and touching of him, of it self, without Faith conducent no more than it did to the Jews. At Rogation-days to carry Banners, to follow the Cross, to walk about the fields. After Pentecost, to go about with Corpus Christi play. At Hollomas to march in the Church, to lay a Bridge, and make Commemorations, and to ring for All-Souls, to pay Pethes truly, to give to the high Altar. And if a man

The Pope towards the spiritual Religion of Christ to a corporal Religion.

The whole sum of the Popes Catholick Religion set forth in these will be a Priest, to say Mass and Mattens, to serve the Saints of that day, and to lift well over his head, &c. In sickness to be annealed, to take his Rites; after his death to have Funerals, and Dirges said for him, and to be rung for at his Funeral, month mind, and year mind, &c. And moreover to these the outward Sacrifice of the Mass, with opus operatum sine bono motu utentis, &c.

A man may be a Catholick by the Popes Religion, without any working of the Holy Ghost. The nature of true Christian Religion described.

All which things above recited, as they contain the whole summary and effect of all the Popes Catholick Religion; so are they all corporal exercises, consisting in the extern operation of man. Which if they can make a perfect right Catholick Christian, then it may be said, that men may be make perfect Christians by flesh and blood, without any inward working of Faith, or of the Holy Ghost. For what is in all these, but that which flesh and blood of his strength is able to accomplish, though no inward strength or motion of the Holy Ghost did worke

But now the order of our Religion, and way of salvation, consisteth not in such corporal or outward things as these, but in other more high and more spiritual gifts, which do far exceed the capacity of flesh and blood; of the which gifts, the chiefest and only main cause that saveth man, and remitteth sins, is his Faith in Christ. Which Faith I thus define; for a man to believe by the bloodshedding of Jesus the Son of God, his sins to be forgiven, Gods wrath to be pacified, and himself to be justified perfectly from all Accusations that can be laid unto him, &c. And though the Papists make a light matter of this, to believe in Christ; and when they hear us say, That Faith only justifieth, they object to us again, and make it a small matter to be saved, if Faith only justifieth us; yet notwithstanding this Faith, if it be well examined, is such a thing that flesh and blood is not able to attain thereunto, unless Gods holy Spirit from above do draw him.

Salvation of mankind only by Faith in Christ. Faith in Christ no light matter to flesh and blood. Many things incident to salvation besides Faith; but not as causes thereof.

Moreover, besides this Faith, many other things are incident also to the Doctrine of our Salvation. Albeit as no causes thereof, but either as Sacraments and Seals of Faith, or as declarations thereof, or else as fruits and effects following the same. So Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord be as testimonies and proofs, that by our Faith only in Christ we are justified, that as our bodies are washed by water, and our life nourished by bread and wine, so by the blood of Christ our sins be purged, and the hunger of our souls relieved by the death of his body.

Works of Sanctification, how they come and follow Faith.

Upon the same Faith riseth also outward profession by mouth, as a declaration thereof. Other things also as fruits and effects do follow after Faith, as peace of Conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, Invocation, Patience, Charity, Mercy, Judgment, and Sanctification. For God for our Faith in Christ his Son therefore giveth into our hearts his holy Spirit of comfort, of Peace and Sanctification, whereby mans heart is moved to a godly disposition to fear God, to love him, to call upon him, to trust unto him, to stick to him in all Adversities and Persecutions, to love him, and for his sake also to love our Brethren, to have mercy and compassion upon them, to visit them if they be in prison, to break Bread to them if they be hungry, and if they be turbaned to cast them, to cloath them if they be naked, to harbour them if they be houseless. Matthew the five and twentieth, with such other spiritual exercises of Piety and Sanctification as these. Which therefore I call spiritual, because they proceed of the holy Spirit and Law of God, which is spiritual.

Esay 58. Mat. 25.

And thus have ye a Catholick Christian defined, first after the Rules of Rome, and also after the Rule of the Gospel. Now confer these Antitheses together, and see whether of these is the true Christian, the ceremonial man after the Church of Rome, or the spiritual man with his Faith and other spiritual Fruits of piety following after the same. And if ye say that ye will them both together, spiritual things with your corporal Ceremonies, to the end I answer again, that as touching the end of remission of sins, and salvation, they ought in no manner, to that I answer again, that as touching the end of remission of sins, and salvation, they ought in no case to be joyned together, because that the main causes of all our Salvation and Remission is only spiritual, and constituth in Faith and in no other.

And therefore upon the same cause I come to my question again, as I began, to ask whether the Religion of Christ be a meer spiritual Religion; and whether in the Religion of Rome, as it is now, is any thing but only meer corporal things required, to make a Catholick man. And thus I leave you unto your answer.

IN turning over the first leaf of this Book, thou shalt find, gentle Reader, the Arguments of Pighius and Hosius, wherein thus they argue, That forsomuch as Christ must needs have a Catholick Church ever continuing here in Earth, which all men may see, and whereunto all men ought to resort; and seeing no other Church hath indured continually from the Apostles, visible here in Earth, but only the Church of Rome; they conclude therefore, the Church of Rome only to be the right Catholick Church of Christ, &c.

In answering whereunto, this is to be said, that forsomuch as the medius terminus of this Argument, both in the Major and Minor constituth only in the word (visible and unknown) if they mean by this word (visible) in the Major, that Christs Church must be seen here to all the world, that all men may resort to it, it is false. Likewise, if they mean by the same word (visible) in the Minor, that no other Church hath been seen and known to any, but only the Church of Rome, they are likewise deceived. For the true Church of Christ neither is so visible, that all the world can see it, but only they which have spiritual eyes, and be members thereof; nor yet so invisible again, but such as be Gods Elect, and members thereof, do see it, and have seen it, though the worldly eyes of the most multitude cannot do so, &c. Wherein I read more in the Protestation above prefixed to the Church of England.

Four Considerations given out to Christian Protestants, Professors of the Gospel, With a brief Exhortation inducing to reformation of Life.

The first Consideration.

AS in the Page before four Questions were moved to the Catholick Papists, to answer them at their leisure; so have I here to the Christian Gospellers four Considerations for them to muse upon with speed convenient.

The first Consideration is this, That every good man well weigh with himself the long Tranquillity, the great Plenty, the peaceable Liberty, which the Lord of his mercy hath bestowed upon this Land during all the Reign hitherto of this our Sovereign and most happy Queen Elizabeth, in such sort as the like example of Gods abundant mercies is not to be seen in any Nation about us; so as we may well sing with the Psalm in the Church, Non fecit taliter omni nationi, & opes gloriæ suæ non manifestavit eis. First in having the true Light of Gods Gospel so shining among us, so publickly received, so freely preached, with such liberty of conscience without danger professed; having withall a Prince so vertuous, a Queen so gracious given unto us, of our own native Country; bred and born amongst us, so quietly governing us, so long lent unto us, in such Peace obtaining us against such as would else devour us; briefly, what could we have more at Gods hand, if we would wish? Or what else could we wish in this world that we have not, if this one thing lacked not Grace to use that well which we have?

The second Consideration.

AS these things first are to be considered concerning our selves, so secondly let us consider likewise the state and times of other our Countrymen and blessed Martyrs aforepast; what storms of Persecutions they sustained, what little rest they had, with what Enemies they were matched, with what crosses prefsed, under what Princes, under what Prelates they lived, or rather died, in the days of King Henry the Fourth, King Henry the Fifth, King Henry the Seventh, King Henry the Eighth, Queen Mary, &c. under Bonner Bishop of London, Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, Cholmley, Story, Bishop Arundel, Stokesley, Courtney, Warham. At what time Children were caused to set fire to their Fathers; the Father adjured to accuse the Son, the Wife to accuse the Husband, the Husband the Wife, Brother the Sister, Sister the Brother, Examples whereof are plenty in this Book to be seen.

The third Consideration.

THirdly, Let us call to mind, considering thus with our selves, These good men and worthy Martyrs in those dangerous days tasting as they did the heavy hand of Gods sharp Correction, beginning commonly with his own House first; if they were alive now in these Halcyon-days, under the Protection of such a peaceable Prince, O what thanks would they give to God! How happy would they count themselves having but half of that we have, with freedom only of conscience and safety of life? Or if in case we our selves had been in those times of theirs, to trouble and distresfed as they were, spoiled of Goods, hated of the World, cited in Consistories, pinched in Prisons, sequestred from House, Wife, and Children, looking for nothing but death; what would we say? what would we think? what would we do? Much otherwise doubtless than we do now; God grant we may do better, for worse I think we cannot if we would. John Wicklif, W. Swinderby, Thorpe, Sawtry, with a number of godly men more, being then glad in Friese-Gowns, going bare-foot, to preach where they could; if they were now alive, how glad would they be of these days, when mans would they take, yea, what pains would they not take in preaching the Gospel, not for lucre, nor for money, nor passing for Promotions or Dignities of the Church? Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, Sir Roger Acton, with divers worshipful Gentlemen a great number, if they being in our state might enjoy with us their Houses and Lands, with the good favour of their Prince (as then they could not) how gladly would they have contented themselves, though they never raised their Rents and Fines to the undoing of their poor Tenants? Likewise in the time of John Hus and Jerome of Prague, the Nobility and Gentlemen of Bohemia, if they might have had half this Tranquillity which we have, to enjoy the liberty of Gods Word and true use of the Sacraments without molestation of Romish Prelates, what would they have cared how simply they walked in their attire, without any such monstrous pomp in pranking up themselves, as we Englishmen in these Reformed-days walk now, more like Players on a Stage, than Gods Children in his Church?

The fourth Consideration.

WHerefore, welbeloved, these things being so, let us call our selves to mind, considering the times that have been, the times that be, and the times that may come, how we stand, and by whom we stand. If it be the favour of God only that doth support us in the midst of so many Enemies, let us beware that in no wise we provoke his Indignation. If it be his Truth and Gospel that we profess, let us walk in the light of his Truth, and keep our selves within the compass of his Gospel. What the Gospel requireth, and what it abhorreth, who knoweth not? and yet who followeth that he knoweth? If St. Paul willeth every one to depart from iniquity, which nameth the Lord Jesus; and if the Lord Jesus himself testifieth plainly his Kingdom not to be of this world, how will then the nature of that Kingdom so spiritual, and our conditions so worldly, match well together? To rip up all our deformities in particular I mind not here, neither need I, the same being so evident to all mens eyes, that who cannot see our excessive outrage in pompous Apparel, our carnal desires and unchaste demeanors without fear of God, our careless security without conscience, as though there were no judgment to come, our studies so upon this World, as though there were no other Heaven? What pride and idleness of life, double dissembling in word and deed without simplicity, avarice unstatiable, little regard to hear Gods Word, less to read it, least of all to follow it, every man aspiring to worldly Wealth and Promotion, little or no mercy to the poor, racking of Rents and Fines, bribing and taking unmeasurable? What should I speak of the contentions and unbrotherly divitions amongst us, most lamentable to see, but more lamentable, if all were seen which may or is like to follow upon the same. Such were the times once of the Church before the horrible Persecution of Diocletian; for so we read, such hatred and disdain through much Peace and Prosperity of the Church to creep in amongst the Church-men.

Wherefore let us be exhorted, dearly beloved, to reclaim our selves while time doth serve. If we find the Lord so gracious in sparing us as he doth, let not that make us worse but better. It is a lewd Child that will not learn without beating. A well-minding man will be good, not forced by coaction, but of voluntary office induced. As Adversity if it come, ought not to dismay us; so Prosperity now present ought not to puff us up in security, considering what commonly is wont to follow, as Plato well writeth, Summæ atque effrenatæ libertatis servitutem plerumq; assecutam esse. Of immoderate liberty and two much security, followeth most commonly extream servitude. And as Hippocrates saith, Disposition of Bodies when they are come to the highest perfection of health, then are they most subject to danger of sickness, &c. Let us therefore, having light given us, walk like the Children of light. Otherwise, if we walk like Children of Disobedience, God hath his Rods to scourge us; if we will needs be Rebels, he hath his Pharaohs and Nabuchodonosors to plague us. Or if we will be so inordinate and (with reverence be it spoken, without offence to God or man) so doggish and currish one to another, the Lord lacketh not his Dog-strikers to whip us. And would God our lives were such, that the destruction and ruine here of late seen among us may portend nothing against us, as I trust there is no cause for us to fear, but rather to fear the Lord, and walk in his Obedience, and amend that which is amiss amongst us. Amen.

The Grace of our Lord Jesus bless thee gentle Reader, that long thou maist read, and much thou maist profit. Amen.

Pax Prædicantibus, Gracia Audientibus, Gloria Jesu Christo. Amen.

LIFE

OF

Mr. John Fox,

Tranſlated out of the Latine.

TO THE READER.

HAving been often and earneſtly requeſted by many, to gratifie Poſterity, with the Hiſtory of my Fathers life, which I had written above thirty years ſince; and finding that no new matter had faln out, for which (though I were ſilent) I ſhould diſtruſt the judgment of after Ages, concerning a man ſo well known; but that many things to this Purpoſe neceſſary, were now out of my power, by the death of thoſe, upon whoſe Teſtimony the truth of each Particular depended; I made no queſtion, but both eaſily with all men, to find Pardon for my firſt refuſal; and if ſtill I ſhould continue in the ſame mind, as eaſily to keep my ſelf in the right I have to uſe my liberty herein. But when I perceived, that ſome, who were meer ſtrangers to him, and utterly ignorant of his Converſation, had taken upon them, to write his Life; of which they could learn nothing, but by Hear-ſays, and flying Reports; whereby it fell out, that many of his actions were amplified above the truth; many things otherwiſe related than performed; and much paſſed over, that came not to their knowledge; having my ſelf when I was a young man, been always Converſant with him in his later days, and when when I was absent from him, had better Intelligence of any remarkable passage in his life; I thought it but my duty, to preserve his Memory from wrong; and if I could add nothing to it, at least to place it in its true and proper light. Neither feared I, but that I should be able to justifie this to the Readers, that being his Son I published my Fathers life, though in respect of my nearness to him, I may be suspected. For first, that so memorable a man should be unknown to Posterity, even the injury done him, by those who had ill handled his Story, would not suffer: neither was it safe, that any but his own Friends should undertake to right him; and what reason is there, that his Sons credit should be more suspected, than the force of their anger and grief, who desire that no Memory of him might at all remain? Thus long I have forborn, till being in equal danger, of the offence that may be taken, by the adverse Party, and those that desired his Story, I chose at length to satisfie their Minds, who not without some vehemence requested it of me. At whose importunity, I have consented to set forth this Book, written at first to no other intent, than to preserve by me the Image of my Fathers life; and now, in so confirmed a Fame of him, rather thought necessary by others, than so judged by my self.

Mr. John Fox.

JOHN FOX was born in Boston, an ancient Town in the County of Lincoln, Anno 1517. his Father and Mother being of the Commonalty of that Town, well reputed of, and of good state. While he was very young, his Father dying, and his Mother being married again, he came into the Tutelage of his Father in law, with whom he dwelt during his Childhood: which he had scarce passed over, when his Friends well approving his good inclination and towardness to Learning, sent him to study at Oxford. The first Nurse of his more serious Studies, was Brasen-Nose Colledge, where he was Chamber-Fellow with Doctor Nowell so famous a man in this City afterward, and Dean of Pauls, That no great marvail it was, if their manners were so like in the course of their lives, whose Education, and Nurture in Youth was the same. The native excellence, and sharpness of his wit, were well seconded by the fitness of the place; where the emulation of Equals was frequent; and where each Students Proficiency was narrowly sought into: Neither was Industry wanting, which as it seldom accompanieth the greatest Wits, so where it is conjoyned is most available. By which Vertues, when in a short space he had won the admiration of all, and the love of many, in reward of his Learning, and good behaviour he was chosen Fellow of Magdalen-Colledge; which being accounted a Principal Honour in the University, and usually due to the Students of that House, was seldom, and not unless in regard of singular Deserts, bestowed upon any others. It should seem he designed the first over-branching of any early wit, to the exercises of Poetry, and wrote divers Latine Comedies yet to be seen, in a copious, and graceful Stile, but somewhat lofty, which fault of writing, (in all things else so grave and temperate) he left not altogether in his elder years, though age, and experience did not a little mitigate it. But even then he began to give earnest of what he afterward proved, for that neither those first flourishes of his Youth were spent, but in holy Histories of the Bible: nor followed he that vein long. He betook himself to the study of Divinity with somewhat more fervency, than circumspection, and discovered himself in favour of the Reformation then in hand, before he was known to them that maintained the Cause, or were of ability to protect the Maintainers of it: whence grew his first Troubles. This was the time when King Henry the Eighth uncertain what course to take, being at Variance with the Pope, and unresolved in himself, thinking the affairs of the Church (then grown to an infinite height of Power and Pride) neither in all respects tolerable, nor that it was necessary wholly to alter them, while he desired to shew moderation in both, prevailed in neither, obscuring an Act, than which none was of more Glory since the World began, by an unprofitable indifferency. Never before were the people in more distraction, or less security of their Lives, and Estates, there being in the Laws such contrarieties, as no man could tell what to take to with safety, or what to avoid. For although the Popes Supremacy had been renounced, yet was Doctrine still retained. The first News of the abolishing the Popes Supremacy was as prosperous as welcome to the Reformers; and divers joyned themselves to them out of love to the Truth, being further assured of the Kings Intentions, by the punishment taken on some of the contrary part, and especially when the Abbies were dissolved; nor was their hope a little increased, when they perceived the Noblemen more or less to rise in the good Opinion and Favour of the King, as any of them most opposed the Popes Dominion. In the mean while the Act of the six Articles was still in force, and if any were found guilty of the breach thereof, they were sure of punishment. So that as long as the King held the middle way between his own Genius, and the advice of his Counsellors, feeding them with Favours, upon which they could build no assurance, and pleasing himself in his own severity, fear and hope, equally prevailed.

But when the Protectors themselves, and Pillars of the Reformed Religion, were taken away. The Duke of Suffolk by untimely death, the Lord Cromwel by the Sword, the Archbishop Cranmer and his Friends born down by those of the contrary side; and that neither in the Laws, nor the Protection of the Peers, there was any, the least help remaining; then began all things to hasten back again headlong to their former abuses, and that with so much the more violence, because the conquest seemed a kind of revenge.

In

In the Universities and Schools there was yet no open change, or innovation: I know not whether through fear, or that they would not be Followers.

This was the estate of the Church-affairs, when Master Fox began attentively to seek into the substance of the Controversie, then in agitation.

He found the Contention to have been of great Antiquity, and no Age to have been free from some debate in the Church. But those first quarrels were rather for Dominion, and increase of Territory. The Romans endeavouring by subtil Practises, and pretext of Religion to retain under the Jurisdiction of a High Priest, the ancient honour of their City, which by open force they could not defend.

Then no sooner could any shew himself to differ from them in point of Faith, but the hastening of his punishment prevented any infection that might spread it self among others.

Thus by their Cruelty, and the patience of Princes, who suffered it, the greatest part of these Dissensions were appeased: neither hitherto were all tracts of the old Roman vertue quite worn out, at leastwise some resemblances of vertue remained among many things that were perverted, and by long time utterly defaced.

Afterward the Pope grown bolder by good success, began to draw to himself all Power and Authority, nor contented to have weakned the estate of the Roman Empire alone, now, longed to be fingring the Scepters of other Princes; and to compass his design, spared not to violate any Humane, or Divine Right: Mean while the Clergy little weighed with how great damage to Religion, men of spotted life and conversation were sometimes chosen to the Papacy, by whose example the strictness of life, used by their Forefathers, was drawn into scorn, and their poverty into exprobration; The industry of the Priesthood languished, and on the contrary side Ambition, Riot, and Avarice began to reign among them. Then at length were the Practises of the Churchmen brought to light, and their Delusions laid open. It was then known why the Ceremonies and Rites in the Church, had been brought to that excessive multitude, to wit, that the number of the Clergy might be increased to perform them: These of necessity were to be maintained; and to that end were such Opinions broached, as seemed most likely to draw money from all places: Of the dignity of Works; Of Purgatory; Of the power of Absolution, and the Popes Indulgences: All which being in themselves false, and soon subject to decay, were thought fit to be cemented together with that new and subtil invention of the Popes infallibility in matters of Faith.

By this handsome connexure, and linking one Opinion to another, the credulity of the Christians was easily insnared; all this while the new forg'd Opinions yielding plentiful increase, and great sums of money, by a hundred devises screwed out of the Clergy, and common people, came daily to the Pope, and Court of Rome.

I have often heard Master Fox affirm, That the first matter which occasioned his search into the Popish Doctrine, was, that he saw divers things in their own natures, most repugnant to one another, thrust upon men at one time to be both believed: as that the same man might in matters of Faith be Superior, and yet in his life and manners inferior to all the World besides. Upon this beginning, his resolution and intended obedience to that Church, were somewhat shaken, and by little and little followed some dislike to the rest.

His first care was to look into both the ancient and modern History of the Church: to learn what beginning it had; what growth and increase; by what Arts it flourished, and by what Errors it began to decline; to consider the causes of all those Controversies which in the mean space had sprung up, and to weigh diligently of what moment they were, and what on either side was produced sound or infirm.

This he performed with such heat of study, and in so short a time; that before the thirtieth year of his age, he had read over all that either the Greek or Latine Fathers had left in their writings; the Schoolmen in their Disputations; the Councils in their Acts; or the Consistory in their Decrees; and acquired no mean skill in the Hebrew Language.

By report of some who were Fellow-Students with him, he used over and above his days exercise, to bestow whole nights at his Study, or not till it were very late to betake himself to rest. Near to the Colledge was a Grove, wherein for the pleasantness of the place, the Students took delight to walk, and spend some idle hours for their recreation. This place, and the dead time of the night, had Master Fox chosen, with the horror of solitude and darkness, to confirm his mind; which as a fresh-water-Souldier trembled at the guilt of a new imagination.

How many nights he watched in these solitary Walks; what combats and wrastlings he suffered within himself; how many heavy sighs, and sobs, and tears he poured forthwith his prayers to Almighty God; I had rather might be spared from this Discourse, than touched with opinion of Ostentation: But therefore of necessity, was it to be remembred, because from hence sprang the first suspition of his alienated affections. For no sooner was the fame spread of his nightly retirements, but that the more understanding sort out of their own wisdom, others according as they stood inclined towards him, were apt to interpret all to the worst sense. At length those with whom he was intimate, being drawn into suspition of him; there were some employed, who under pretence to admonish him, might observe his walks, and pry with more curiosity into his words and actions; and there wanted not others, who comparing his customs formerly used, with the present course he now took, did with more bitterness aggravate the fact. Why should he not come to Church, so often as in former times he had accustomed? Why should he shun the company of his Equals, and refuse to recreate himself after his wonted manner, unless he had felt in his mind some suddain alteration? nor if that alteration were for the better, would he conceal it.

Being

Being thus reported of, surrounded with Treacheries, and by every one accused; when the matter came to more severe scanning, and that he could neither hide his resolution longer, nor being a man of plain dealing, thought fit to excuse himself by forging a lye; by the judgment of the Colledge, he was convicted, condemned as an Heretick, and removed the house. Nevertheless his Adversaries affirmed he was favourably dealt with by that sentence, and might have been questioned for his life, if they had not rather use clemency towards him than extremity. But this Wound raged worse than was thought it would; his Friends upon the report of this accident being sorely displeased, and especially his Father in law, who was now grown altogether implacable, either through a real hatred conceived against him for this cause, or pretending himself agrieved, that he might now with more justice, at least with more security withhold from Master Fox his own Fathers estate. For he both knew it could not be safe for one publickly hated, and in danger of the Law, to seek remedy by it; and that Master Fox was by nature so ignorant in requiting injuries, that he would many times with much ado confess himself wronged, even then, when he had in his hands ability of revenge.

When he was thus forsaken by his own Friends, and left naked of all humane assistance, GODS Providence began to shew it self, procuring him a safe Refuge in the house of a worshipful Knight of Warwickshire, called Sir Thomas Lucy, to whom he was sent for, to instruct his Children: In which house he afterwards married a Wife, and there continued till the Children coming to riper years, had now no longer need of a Tutor. But the fear of the Popish Inquisitions hastned his departure thence; which now relying on the favour of the Laws, were not contented to pursue publick offences, but began also to break into the secrets of private Families.

Oft would Master Fox in the later times of his life, with much vehemence of mind, in discourse with his Friends, detest the wretched condition of that departing; and say, That all other mischances he had pretty well indured; but in this case the misery was so much the greater; because to have born it patiently, would have seemed unnatural; having brought his faithful Consort, who entirely loved him, from her Friends and Kindred, whose grief and tears were with all officious piety to be comforted. It behoved him therefore, either to find some speedy remedy, or in assurance of his love to weep with her. For in vain should he shew an example of his constancy, where she might rather suspect her grief unregarded, than his mind unconquered with so great Calamities. He consulted therefore with himself what was best to be done, and of two ways only left, whereby he might free himself from further inconvenience, long debated, whether he might with most safety, make choice of; either to go to his Wives Father, or his Father in law by marriage of his Mother.

His Wives Father dwelt neareſt, being a Citizen of Coventry, nor yet bearing any hatred towards him, and more likely to be entreated for his Daughters sake. His Father in law was better known to him, but more suspected. At last he resolved to go first to his Wives Father, and in the mean while by Letters to try, whether his Father in law would receive him or not. His Father in laws answer was, That it seemed to him a hard condition, to take one into his house, whom he knew to be guilty, and condemned for a Capital Offence: neither was he ignorant, what hazard he should undergo in so doing: nevertheless that he would shew himself a Kinsman, and for that cause neglect his own danger. If he would alter his mind, he might come, on condition to stay as long as himself desired: but if he could not be perswaded to that, he should content himself with the shorter tarriance, and not bring him and his Mother into hazard of their Fortunes, who were ready to do any thing for his sake.

Master Fox his estate was at that pass, that he thought no condition to be refused: Besides he was underhand advised by his Mother to come, and not fear his Father in laws severity; For that (perchance) it was needful to write as he did, but when occasion should be offered, he would make recompence for his words with his actions. The truth is, he had better entertainment with both of them, than he any way hoped for: but so his business required, that he should rely long upon neither; and therefore by often going to and fro, from the one to the other, (which carried with it some shew of business) he both deceived their diligence, who enquired after him, and effected, that neither grew weary of his company.

But howsoever he by this means kept himself concealed; yet certain it is, that no time of his life passed more unknown to Posterity than that; whether that while he did but little, which is scarce credible: or whether it more concerned them who knew what he did, that it should be shut up in silence, than published abroad. For his own part he always forbare with particular regard, to speak of that story; left where he had deserved so much, he might by extolling a small courtesie, seem rather to upbraid the slendernes of the requital, than to shew himself thankful by remembring it. Afterward he took his journey towards London; but upon what motives is uncertain; unless we may imagine the convenience of the place enticed him thither; which being full of all sorts of company, both Inhabitants and Strangers from all places might assure him sufficient occasions, whether he should choose to conceal himself, or make known his abilities, and get acquaintance with those of alike inclination.

By computation of times, I should think the chief cause of his going thither to have been, that about that time Religion began at length a little to recover it self, and gather strength, especially about the City. For he came not to Town till within a few years before King Henry departed this life: Who (as I said before) though the Kingdom were divided into Factions, yet as long as his youth and strength remained, so ordered the matter, that sometimes the power of each party being equalled, and sometimes one or other prevailing, by his authority both were retained in their Obedience: But when he grew into years, perceiving his health every day impaired, and that his death could not be far off; he then began to conſider with himſelf which ſide was moſt truſty, and which moſt to be doubted; and at what age he ſhould expoſe his Son, to the raging hatred of the Papiſts, who was yet by reaſon of his youth unfit to govern, and brought up in the Diſcipline of a Religion which they oppoſed.

He therefore at laſt reſolved upon that, which in reaſon ſeemed moſt wholſome, and in the end proved moſt fortunate; and having put the Papiſt-Officers from their authority, by his Will he appointed his Son ſuch Tutors, whoſe love to himſelf he had always found readieſt, and by long trial of their fidelity, thought likely to continue the ſame to his Succeſſor. This ſet Religion again in ſafety: But howſoever the Profeſſors thereof, were thereby ſecured of their lives; yet hence no publick benefit or profit was afforded them: So that Mr. Fox was ſtill in as much want as before, having already ſpent, what either his Friends had beſtowed on him, or his own daily induſtry had acquired.

I ſhould forbear to ſpeak of a marvelous accident, and great example of Gods mercy, were not the matter ſo well known abroad, that it would be to no purpoſe for modeſty ſake to be ſilent.

As Maſter Fox one day, ſate in Pauls Church, ſpent with long faſting, his countenance thin, and eyes hollow, after the gaſtful manner of dying-men; every one ſhunning a Spectacle of ſo much horror, There came to him one whom he never remembred to have ſeen before, who ſitting by him, and ſaluting him with much familiarity, thruſt an untold ſum of money into his hand; bidding him be of good chear; adding withall, that he knew not how great the miſfortunes were which oppreſſed him, but might ſuſpect it was no light Calamity: That he ſhould therefore accept in good part that ſmall gift from his Countryman, which common courteſie had enforced him to offer; that he ſhould go, and make much of himſelf, and take all occaſions to prolong his life; in the mean time let him know, that within a few days, new hopes were at hand, and a more certain condition of Livelihood. Never could Maſter Fox learn who that man ſhould be, by whoſe ſo ſeaſonable bounty, in that extream neceſſity, he had been relieved; though he earneſtly endeavoured to find him out. Some who looked further into the event which followed that Propheſie, believed that this man came not of his own accord, but was ſent by ſome others, who by all means deſired Maſter Foxes ſafety; and that it might (perchance) be through the Servants negligence, that he ſuffered the extreameſt of all miſeries, before any relief came. Certain it is, that within three days ſpace, the iſſue ſeemed to make good the Preſage, there being ſome ſent from the Dutcheſs of Richmond, who upon fair terms did invite him into her Service. It had ſo faln out not long before, that the Duke of Norfolk, the famous Warrior, and moſt renowned General of his time, together with his Son, the Earl of Surrey, a man as far as may be imagined of ſincere meaning, and ſharp underſtanding, was committed to Cuſtody in the Tower of London; for what Crimes is uncertain: While they were in priſon, the Earls Children were ſent to the foreſaid Dutcheſs their Aunt, to be brought up, and educated: Thomas who ſucceeded in the Dukedom, Henry who was after Earl of Northampton, and Jane afterwards Counteſs of Weſtmerland.

To theſe young Lords was Maſter Fox appointed Tutor, to inſtruct them both in Manners and Learning: In which charge he deceived not the expectation which the Dutcheſs, a Woman of great Wiſdom, had of him.

For the two Sons grew to that height of Proficiency in their Behaviour and Scholarſhip; that building in their riper years, upon this foundation, The elder Thomas ſeemed to deſerve more than the Kingdom could beſtow upon him; and the younger Henry came to that happineſs, that he was able to meaſure his Fortunes, not by the opinion of others, but by his own faciety.

The young Lady Jane, profited ſo wonderouſly in the Greek and Latine Tongues; that ſhe might well ſtand in competition with the moſt learned men of that time, for the praiſe of Elegancy in both kinds.

There he dwelt during thoſe golden days of Felicity (not ſeen long time before) in the laſt years of King Henries Reign, and through the five years Reign of King Edward the Sixth (a young Prince incomparably hopeful, and hope by perfecting the Work begun by his Father, paſſed all the Acts of his Predeceſſors) till the beginning of Queen Maries Sovereignty; who coming to the Crown, and turning the ſtream of Religion, all things again yielded to the Papiſts Authority; whence not long after, that cruel Tempeſt proceeded, the noiſe whereof hath come alſo to the ears of our Age; many who ſuffered in that common Shipwrack, ſwimming out to theſe peaceful times, as to ſafe Harbours of everlaſting Tranquillity.

Among theſe Maſter Fox made one, at that time ſheltred by the Protection of the Duke his Sholar; yet not without the eyes of many, who for hatred, or envy looked askew on him, and ſecretly laid wait for, by Doctor Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, who both ſaw ſomething in him, which he greatly feared, and alſo diſdained much, that the Heir of one of the chiefeſt Families in the Kingdom, and neareſt joyned to himſelf in Friendſhip, ſhould by his company be depraved.

Of this man becauſe he was Maſter Foxes greateſt enemy, it will not be from our purpoſe to ſpeak ſomething further; that both their natures may the better be known.

The Biſhop of Winchester was a man famous in his Youth (for of his Birth or Parentage, I have no certainty:) one that ſtood in the midway, between good and bad; and always as he grew grew elder, growing worſe. Induſtry, Wit, and Eloquence, Nature had beſtowed on him: his Pride, Craftineſs, and deſire of bearing Sway, he learned of the Cardinal.

Hence were his abilities fit for any Imployments, which he managed with exceeding diligence, to gain new Honours; and having obtained them, he then put on Boldneſs inſtead of Induſtry, Flattery for Obedience; and inſtead of Fidelity, Deceit and Complements, and ſuch like frivolous faſhions of the Court. He was in bearing thoſe Honours which his Vertue won to him cruel and proud: in regaining any that he loſt, able to weary any man with ſubmiſſion and humility. For in his Fortunes alſo appeared as great diverſity, as in his conditions. Some while he he was pleaſing to King Henry, and high in his favour; having by his Pen maintained the Kings Authority againſt the Pope: Afterwards, when his prevaricating therein was underſtood, he was by the King ſlighted, and that he might be the leſs able to do hurt, ſtript out of his Dignity. Under Edward the Sixth he was not only neglected, but impriſoned, and abid the reproach of a mean eſtate. At length in Queen Maries Reign he was ſet at liberty, and being again reſtored to his former Honors, he exerciſed not ſo much command as tyranny: till even ſick with envy, that Cardinal Pool in Dignity out-ſhined him, and with height of Honors overſhadowed his glory, having often, but ſtill in vain tried to cure his Malady with a Cardinalſhip, anger at length exaſperating his Diſeaſe, he pined away.

After this manner began, and ended that man, commended for many excellencies of mind, while he lead a private life; but in his Honors unbrideled, and of no moderation: Well might one ſay, Nature had made him a worthy man, and Fortune corrupted him.

Now Maſter Fox although he was cheriſhed in the boſome of a moſt loving Duke; yet after he ſaw all ſorts of men troubled for their Religions ſake, ſome impriſoned, and others burnt; in brief nothing on all ſides, but Flight, Slaughter, and Gibbets; and that the Biſhop of Winchester was the principle Incendiary of all this, who for private reſpects was already his enemy; he then began to fear what might become of him, and to think of ſome ſpeedy way for his departure thence. As ſoon as the Duke knew his intent, gently chiding his fearfulneſs, he uſed many words to perſwade him to leave all thought of going away; affirming it neither agreeable to honour or modeſty, for him to ſuffer his Tutor, ſo well deſerving at his hands, at any time of his life, to be taken from him: but that it ſhould then be done, was not beſeeming for him that deſired it. Let him but think with himſelf, how great a burthen of hatred his Scholar muſt needs bear, among thoſe who were ignorant, whether he forſook him of his own accord, or were forſaken by him: yet that he intreated not to be excuſed from any hatred, which might light upon him, if at leaſt he might do it with Maſter Foxes commodity: But in flying, what miſery would be wanting? Baniſhment, Poverty, Contempt, and among thoſe which knew him not, the reproach of a Runagate. That he acknowledged all this leſs evil than death; but that it was not yet come to ſuch extremity; neither would he ſuffer it ſhould: That he had yet Wealth, and Favour, and Friends, and the Fortune of his houſe: if the miſchance prevailed further, himſelf would partake of the danger, and make the deſtruction common: That he remembred, with what Precepts he had fortified his younger years; neither had he with more attention hearkened to his Inſtructions, than he would with conſtancy put them in practice; only let him be of good courage, and ſo avoid the violence of his enemies, as not to be weary of his Friends company: That this he ſpake, as hoping by his authority to prevail with him: but if that might not be obtained, he would then further him in the courſe he intended.

There was in the Dukes Speech the more credit, becauſe it was known to proceed from the inbred ſincerity of his heart, and a moſt tender good will towards him: and he grew now aſhamed, not ſo much of that he had done in asking leave, as that he had believed his requeſt might have been granted: But his modeſty excuſed him: His anſwer being, That the ſame care Tutor from any injury; but his own part, to have a care, leſt for his ſafety, the Duke might incur apparent danger, or perpetual trouble: neither that his fear wanted all excuſe. For though he well knew the Duke could not be drawn from his promiſe and good intentions towards him; yet was he not ignorant, that by ſome wile or other, he might be circumvented and deceived.

For even at that time was the Biſhop of Winchester very intimate with the Duke, relying upon the ancient Obſervance he had always uſed to that Family, by whoſe credit he had increaſed his Dignity. Thither he often reſorted, to preſent his Service to the Duke; and at ſeveral times deſired of him, that he might ſee his old Tutor. At firſt the Duke denied his requeſt, one while alledging his abſence, another while that he was ill at eaſe; ſtill after faining ſeveral delays, to put him off. At length it chanced, that Maſter Fox (not knowing the Biſhop was within the houſe) entred the room where the Duke and he were in diſcourſe; and ſeeing the Biſhop, with a ſhew of baſtfulneſs withdrew himſelf. The Biſhop asking who that was; the Duke anſwered, His Phyſitian, who was ſomewhat uncourtly, as being new come from the Univerſity. I like his counteance and aſpect very well replied the Biſhop, and when occaſion ſhall be, will make uſe of him. The Duke ſtraight underſtood that ſpeech, as the Meſſenger of ſome approaching danger; and now he himſelf thought it high time for Maſter Fox no longer to remain within the ſame City, or within the ſame See, againſt the force of a crafty, and then open deceiver; but by all means, the Biſhops being ſick, muſt be prevented. From that time he cauſed all things neceſſary for his flight, with the leaſt noiſe that might be, to be provided; ſending one of his Servants before to Ipſwich-Haven, to hire a Bark, and make ready all things needful for the Voyage: and becauſe it ſeemed ſcarce ſafe for Maſter Fox to ſtay in any City, or place of resort, he chose out the house of one of his Servants a Farmer, where he might with convenience expect the warning of a fair Wind to put to Sea. Thither Master Fox went as secretly as he could, taking his Wife as companion in his Travels, then great with child, but resolved to go with him, nor yielding to the intreaty of those, who perswaded her to the contrary; and as soon as it was told him, his company expected him, he made hast to the Port, and went abroad.

Scarce had they weighed Anchor, when suddenly a rough Wind rising from the contrary shore, troubled the Sea with so great violence of Waves, that the stoutest Mariners began to tremble: Then followed a dark night, with continual showres, and a great multitude of Clouds gathered together into a thick storm of rain and hail, both hindred the Sea-mens work, and took away all possibility by the Compass any longer to direct their course. That night with much ado, they lay at Anchor, and as soon as the day appeared when the Tempest seemed not like to cease, they began to cast about, and make back again to the shore: so that the Tide a little favouring them, at length with much difficulty they arrived in the evening at the same Haven again, from whence they had loosed the day before. In the mean while that Master Fox had been at Sea, a Pursevant from the Bishop of Winchester had broke open the Farmers house with Warrant to apprehend him, wheresoever he might be found, and bring him back Prisoner to the City; but understanding he was gone already, after he had pursued him even to the Port, and there found that the Ship he was embarqued in, was yet scarce out of sight, had returned back without his arrant. Master Fox, as soon as he came ashore, hearing by report of the people what had passed, although the News somewhat amazed him, yet recollecting himself, presently took horse, and made as if he would have left the Town; but the same night returning, he bargained with the Master of the Ship to set sail again with the first convenience of the Winds; telling him that so his business required, nor did he much care what shore he landed at; only desiring him to go forward, and not doubt but that God would prosper so pious a Work. Whether for reward or pieties sake, the Pilate took upon him this venturous task, and performed it accordingly. For loosing thence in the nights silence, as soon as the Tide turned, though the Sea were rough, and the weather blustring, within two days space he landed Master Fox and his company in safety at Newport-Haven on the other side the Sea.

Whosoever shall read this story, needeth not a more evident argument, to force him to acknowledge, either the certain course of Providence, or the uncertainty of all humane forecasts; when he may see the subtilest deliberations of the wisest heads, oftentimes by errors come to no effect; often overthrown by suddain accidents; and now and then thwarted by contrary Counsels: and that all this is done to teach men so to use their authority, as that the more power Fortune hath conferr'd upon them, so much the less they should know they are able to do of themselves, and not despise those that are of meaner condition. For that God regardeth all men alike, having made them in nature equal, and differenced them by degrees, not to swell the one sort, or shame the other, but to exercise both their modesties, or his own Justice, if they neglect their duty.

Master Fox when he had spent some few days at Newport, in refreshing himself and his company, went to Antwerp, and from thence by small Journeys to Basil.

This City was at that time much spoken of for the great friendship and courtesie shewed to those of the English Nation: for which cause many famous men withdrawing themselves from the cruelty of the Times, had escaped out of England thither. Of these were many, but of slender estate, who some one way, and some another, but the most part maintained their Livelihood, by reviewing and correcting the escapes of the Press; this place for careful Printing, and plenty of diligent and wealthy men in that Profession, then surpassing all the Cities of Germany; and preferring the industry of our men, in that Employment, before any of their own Countrymen.

To these men Master Fox joyned himself, so much the better liked of, because having been always inured to hardiness, and in his Youth put to the trial of his patience, he had learned how to indure labour; and that which seemed the greatest misery to others, to suffer want, to fit up late, and keep hard diet; were to him but the sports of Fortune. This (perhaps) may seem strange to many, who remember Master Fox to have been all his life long but a slender bodied man, and in his elder years somewhat sickly: But let no man compare his old age, worn out, and eaten up with cares, and even by the course of Nature ruinous, with the flourishing prime of his Youth; which by so many his works appeareth to have been most healthful: whether it be, that in those of indifferent size, an upright shape of the Limbs and Members may sufficiently serve for health: or that the mind enflamed with desire of vertuous actions, being content with its own abilities to pursue those things it affecteth, needeth the less help from the Body.

His Industry may be from hence abundantly testified, That being so full of employment at Basil, there nevertheless he began to write his History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church: a Work by the Title alone seeming beyond mans belief.

At first it sufficed only to mark it out, and to draw the first lines or rudiments, or as it were to fasten the Warp to the Loom: the whole body of the History he added and interwove it, after he returned into his own Country. First, he wrote it in Latine, and sent the Copy to Basil to be printed; where the Work is still in great estimation, as also in divers other foreign Nations, among our own men hardly known, whilst we seek after, and admire strangers only; either through carelessness, or envy neglecting our our Country-men. Shortly after to gratifie the Unlearned, he wrote it in his Mother Tongue.

In the mean while the Reformed Religion began again to flourish in England, and the Papist Faction much to decline, by the death of Queen Mary; a Woman, while she followed her own inclination, every way excellent, and well worthy so Royal Parentage; but while she denied not any thing to some wicked Counsellors, getting this, that she both wanted that praise she had otherwise deserved; and if she be not ill spoken of, it may be accounted the modesty of the succeeding Age, whose custom it is either to commend, or at least to tolerate all the actions of Princes.

I dare neither affirm, that Mr. Fox foresaw this suddain change of the Publick Affairs; nor yet (which by no other I would do) will I take from him the testimony of the Reverend and famous Divine, Doctor Elmare, sometimes Bishop of London; who in presence of many yet living, was wont to say, That he was himself at a Sermon, wherein Master Fox, among many things which he preached, to comfort the banished English, did with confidence tell them, That now was the time come for their return into England, and that he brought them that News by Commandment from God. For which words he was then sharply reproved by the graver Divines there present; but excused afterwards by the event; when by comparing of times it was found, that Queen Mary died but the day before Master Fox had thus presaged.

The whole Christian World straight felt some benefit by this Change of the English Government.

The neighbouring-Nations, now disburdened of the exil'd Englishmen, rejoyced for the good Fortune of their Guests, as for their own. But at home what could be devised, to assure their Safety, or relieve their Distresses, which they did not sooner enjoy than presume to hope for? They who had forsaken their Houses, were now called home: They who had suffered Imprisonment, were now released: They who by loss of Goods were decayed, were now by Gifts repaired: They who had been thrust from Places of Honour, were now restored to their former Dignities: The unjust Laws were in the mean while abrogated, and the wholsome Laws established in their places: Their Minds were at quiet: Their Conscience at liberty: All degrees at peace among themselves, and every mans Goods without danger. For in such sort did Queen Elizabeth, even in the Infancy of Her Reign, dispose the Affairs of the Commonwealth, that whatsoever the long and prosperous Government of other Princes, doth hardly produce in many years, at her very first Entrance, all at once brake forth, beyond the peoples wish, as if some Deity had diffused it self, and poured forth Felicity upon the World. Of which incomparable, and since Mans creation, most glorious Queen, to have made mention upon any occasion, and not from thence taken cause of some further digression, let it be counted for a Capital Crime among all Writers of History.

She was born of the Lady Anna Bolen, whom King Henry the Eighth, after his Divorce from his first Marriage, took to Wife. From her she received, as a Princely Dowry, a true Zeal to Religion. As she grew elder in years, so she increased in Manners, Wit and Beauty, which as well make, as beseem a Princess. So that both Nature seemed to have boasted in her, the Masterpiece, of her most absolute Workmanship; and Fortune to have raised her, to as high a degree, as Hope could ever aspire to.

It made her the more capable of so great a Fortune, that she had first learned to obey; then to command, and to use that Honour first to others, which was shortly after to be used by others to her: having in a private life had experience of the hatred, fatal to the Successors of great Empires, yet of a more noble spirit, than to return the like upon those who were to succeed her. As soon as she came to the Kingdom, her several Vertues appeared at once in their brightest lustre; esteeming all Vices, as well as all Men beneath her. Her mind therefore descended not to an overnice care of her Body. The Principles of her new Sovereignty were, to acquaint her self with the publick Reasons of State; To seek fit men to bear part of her Cares; To strengthen all parts of the Kingdom, with faithful Ministers; To know the Natures and Abilities of those about her; and to search into the Strength, Councils and Attempts of foreign Princes: But all these Qualities, if not well tempered, might have had (perhaps) no long continuance. Such therefore was her Gravity, as nothing more pleasing: Such her Severity, as nothing more gentle; and such her Frugality, as nothing more bountiful. Only she knew no measure, in those Excellencies, whose glory is founded, not in the even ballancing of differing Vertues; but as it were in the throng of illustrious Actions. So was the Nobility of her Birth, heaped with desire of Glory: Her Religion (though most sincere) seconded with Zeal to a holy Life; and her Beauty (though of it self unparalled) enchanted by a Resolution of perpetual Chastity. But when all these Vertues brake forth into Actions: (good God) what days of Happiness we then enjoyed? What ever more chearful, more secure or wealthy did England see, than that four and forty years of Peace? For never voluntarily did she provoke any with War, and always preferred the justice of the Quarrel before the Victory: To the Irish-War, Honour, and shame to have lost a Province, enforced her: To the French, Piety, and pity of her Neighbours danger: To the Spanish, her own Safety, and necessity comprehending in it self the force of all other Causes, compelled her.

In the Progress of this War we heard of, and saw that which (perchance) never happened in any before. For other Nations, though they fought with never so mortal hatred each to other, yet were their Battels restrained to some certain Fields and Places; but this War was so scattered over all places, and managed with such haughtiness of Courage on both sides, that through all Seas and Havens from East to West, the Sun might still behold the English and Spanish Navies fighting for their Lives, Honours or Estates. Never till then had that Sea, which was accustomed to no other command but ours, frothed with strokes of foreign Oars. Nor would a large Volume contain the discourse, if I should relate the number and statelines of Ships, the strength of Sea and Land Forces, the multitude of Munition, Engins, Weapons, Guns, and provision of Victuals belonging to that Navy, which Philip the Second, King of Spain, with intention to raze out the English name, sent hither in the year of our Redemption, 1588. Let this suffice, That never was any preparation by Sea comparable to this Fleet, made by any the most powerful Princes or States to be shewed in all the Records of Antiquity: Yet that so huge and threatning Armada, swelling with self-confidence, and a presumed hope of Victory, was by the Fortune of this invincible Princess, even in a moment utterly defeated.

The Navies met together, for number and strength unequal: But the manner of the fight was to the Spaniards disadvantage, because the English Vessels being for bulk much less, and lower built afore, could with more ease cast about for the Wind, and immediately having discharged, retire to open Sea; thereby deluding the sluggish and unweildy Ships of their Enemies, and by levelling at the broad-sides of the Spanish Gallions, bestowing their shot with a more certain and successful aim. To this, our Captains in the skill of Sea-fight, and knowledge of the Tides, far excelled the Spanish Commanders, who now taught by the former days experience, that they could no way, but in a set fight bear the English Encounters, casting their Anchors near Callice, there expected new Forces out of Flanders, and by the goodness of their Ordnance defended themselves. This laid them open to the English for the Victory. For having filled some Ships with Tow, Pitch, Brimstone, and all sorts of materials suddenly combustible, and setting them on fire, with a favourable Tide, they drove them directly upon the Enemies; who were by this action so exceedingly terrified, that the whole Fleet, cutting their Cables as fast as they could, betook themselves headlong to flight. In which flight some of their Ships were burnt, some sunk, some forced to run themselves on shore, some split upon the Rocks, and some for haste falling foul on their Fellows, and so torn and bruised, were taken by our Souldiers. Those that scaped best, not daring to go back the same way they came thither, with long travail both by Sea and Land, returned at length into Spain, by the Coasts of Scotland, and the Islands of the Orcades, through those Seas, which in no age had been sailed on, but by such as were very good at flying.

Where so great Vertues and Victories met together in one person, of necessity Envy would be an Attendant, followed by hatred and treacheries; which could not, by this most innocent Queen, be so avoided, but that her safety (upon whom the safety of almost all Nations in Europe depended) was through all her life daily indangered. Which maketh me the rather wonder, what rare Doctrine of our Adversaries this may be, for pieties sake which they pretend, persecuting even vertue it self, whereas (not only in no Heathen, but in none the most barbarous Nation, which doth at all acknowledge any Deity) it was never thought just to take revenge upon Vertue (which certainly cometh neareſt to the Nature of God) even in their Enemies: unless it be so that the indulgence of the Christian Religion may be so far extended, that although we are commanded to forgive our Enemies, either they must not be vertuous, or they must not be forgiven. But evident enough it is, that in humane affairs, the desires of men are often employed to one end, and the Will of God to another. By him was Queen Elizabeth protected always, from the Injuries and wicked Enterprises of her Enemies, and brought full of years to that Honour, as to carry with her that glory unspotted to Heaven, which the wan upon Earth, Envy now in vain barking at her after death, whose cause all Posterity doth Patronage.

Now let us return to our Story.

Master Fox, when by his Friends he understood the happy News in England, That Queen Elizabeth reigned, and that the state of Religion was sure, and so like to continue, about the end of that year, in which this was in hand, came back to his Country: So much space he had taken to bethink himself, lest (if by any inconstancy of the people, they should grow weary of their present estate) he should again be forced, to seek his Fortunes abroad: besides (his Family being then increased with two Children) he was fain to stay, till money might from home be sent him, to bear his charges in travelling. But before he could get from thence, he was informed that some hard Speeches had passed of him, as if through Pride he had delayed to come, thereby seeking a shorter and more speedy way to preferment, as being due to him, when he should be sent for: This he knew to be a cast of their cunning, who themselves with all earnestness striving for Honours, feared Master Fox, as a man deserving, and like (if he would) to be preferred before them. Yet he thought it not worth his labour, to make any excuse for such a Crime, as would of it self come to nothing: but equally despising Injuries, and neglecting his own right, hid himself wholly in his Study.

As in our Bodies it is commonly seen, that those men are more healthful, which use moderate diet and exercise, than those which exceed in either: So I suppose doth the case stand with our Minds, that he, who if Fortune hath given him no rule, prescribeth none to himself, can hardly persist in the soundness of his duty; whereas he who useth modesty in his Fortunes, is always more fresh and vigorous for any illustrious undertakings. For Master Fox, being being for his Abilities famous and supported (as I before shewed) with the Friendship of great Personages, might with ease have attained to whatsoever his desires had inclined him: but affecting neither Riches nor Authority, the wishes of happy men, (though his deserts were equal with any) yet was he well contented to keep the conscience of well-doing to himself, and that Rewards should remain in the Possession of others. This I neither admit, as wholly to his Commendation, nor yet find fault with, as many have done: Let us at least favour good men so far, as to allow Vertue, to choose what degree of Fortune it listeth to shine in; or if we will needs restrain it within certain limits, let us do it to those who are good with hope of reward; as for them who are so for no design, if their glory overwhelm us not, we shall not need to fear their multitude.

I shall write of a life, bearing continually true and solids fruits, but not such whereon the Readers senses may surfeit; where neither the rare stratagems of War or Peace shall be related, nor any such discourses as Writers use, when they intend to captivate the ears of the hearers. I am to speak of a life passed over without noise, of modesty at home and abroad, of continence, charity, contempt of the World, and thirst after heavenly things; of unwearied labours, and all actions so performed as might be exemplary or beneficial to others.

I have shewed before, that Mr. Fox first applied himself to write the History of the Church, whilst he was at Basil; and that the cause he did not there finish it, was, that he might afterwards use the Testimony of more Witnesses. This Work, not a little, vexed the minds of the Papists. For well they saw that, in vain, they had spilt so much blood, and to no effect, been guilty of so great cruelty, if an account of these proceedings must be rendred to succeeding Ages: and that the Work it self could not be taken out of mens hands, they well understood. There was therefore no other hope left, but by charging the Author with falshood, and feigning some Cavils against him, so to lessen his credit and authority; which whilst Mr. Fox endeavoured to remove, and take away from himself, he could not avoid it, but must needs pass much the lawful bounds of an History, by a new heap of matters and testimonies. And let us but by this judge of the industry of our Author, that he not only gathered together so many several things, as the materials of his Work, from all distances of times or places, and through all Shires of the Kingdom, collected the Acts of both Courts, and the Records of matters judged, but also alone by a most distracted kind of diligence searched out, examined, freed even from motheating, and afterward reduced into convenient order those things themselves, being partly as it were rusty, and eaten out by Antiquity, partly by hatred or flattery of Authors corrupted, and partly hid in the rugged and short form of old writing. I find by the Authors own Notes, that in the eleventh year after he began to write it, the work was finished; and very probable it is, that Work shall live, which was so long in bringing forth: Neither in all that time, used he the help of any Servant about his writing or other business: So much doth industry employed to one purpose, and gathered into it self, afford more useful assistance, than being scattered, and the mind divided into many cares at once, though it hath never so many helping hands. I have often begun to consider with my self, of those two sorts of toylings, which men esteem an Honour to undertake, which may be the more painful or more grievous, warfare or studying. Many things seem to make for both sides, but not in shew alike persuasive. For the miseries of War being grievous, not only to those who endure them, but even to those that but hear them reported, as they give scope enough to the Relator, so they make no light impression in the judgment of the sense it self: whereas the labour of studying is chiefly considerable in the silent testimony of that, whereby life is maintained, and whereof only the Intellect can determine. Thus is the question transferred to the Mind, and the Body, that of these two, that may be thought to have the better cause, whose evils do in greatness outweigh the others. I will neither take to my self authority to decide so weighty a Controversie; nor yet will I conceal what I know many wisemen to have thought concerning that matter; which is this, That those evils which happen to the Body, though they may be excessively raging and displeasant, yet they use always to determine in one of these three, weariness, pain or death; whereof the two first are curable by time, and asswaged by remedies, and the last valiant men use also to despise. Now the mind when it is overstrained, though it produceth in some sort the same mischiefs, yet it stoppeth not at weariness or pain, but rather proceedeth to the ruine of that whereon even the life of man dependeth. For that in the evils of the mind, he who is once tired, cannot by giving over his Work for a while, or abating some part of his diligence in labour, recover again his former strength; nor overcome the discommodities he shall thereby endure, though with never so great abundance of other contentments. They do therefore conclude, that there is as much more misery in this sober, than in that glorious kind of warfare, as there is more danger in losing an appetite to meat or drink, than in having the meat or drink it self taken away; or to lie long sick of a lingring Consumption, than to endure the smarting of a wound for the present; in sum, that in War, a man loseth more of his pleasures, but in eagerness of studying, more of himself.

The truth of this was, by Mr. Foxes example confirmed, who when he had, for many years, left no time free from thought of his study, either not at all, or not seasonably affording himself what Nature required, was at length brought to that pass, that his natural liveliness and vigour being spent, neither his Friends nor Kindred could by sight remember him. By this means he first fell into that withered leanness of Body, in which many afterward saw him, never again returning to that pleasing and chearful countenance which he had before; but when he would by no means be perswaded to lessen his accustomed Labours, or lay aside his study, to recreate himself, the cause of his hurt not being removed, the signs thereof did likewise remain.

From this time Master Fox began to be much spoken of, for a good Historian; the other Vertues of his Mind, as they were less known abroad, so being by that which was known over-shadowed. Shortly after, he began also for other Endowments, to wax famous, not only as a man learned, but as one for his friendliness useful, and no less by art, than a natural inclination made to be helpful to others. But modesty will not allow me, by way of Journal, to rehearse the voluntary pains he took upon him: in general to say something of it will not be amiss; and how, either by good Advice, comfortable Perswasions, or a charitable Hand, he either relieved the wants, or satisfied the desires of innumerable persons; whereupon no mans house was in those times thronged with more Clients than his. There repaired to him both Citizens and Strangers, Noblemen, and common people of all degrees, and almost all for the same cause; To seek some Salve for a wounded Conscience. At length, some who were likewise sick in Body, would needs be carried to him; but this, to stop rumours, he would not suffer to be used. For, because they were brought thither, they were by some reported to be cured.

Thus spending the day at home in such like Duties, frequently preaching abroad, and going to visit those, who were not able to come themselves to him, he both fulfilled that, which by the courtesie of his own disposition was injoyned him, and neglected not the performance of that duty, which the Office of his Ministery had imposed upon him. That little time which his Friends, either called away by other occasions, or ashamed of being too tedious, had left free to his own disposure, he bestowed not in sleeping, or taking his pleasure, but in prayer and studying; in both which, he always retired himself into some private place apart, or made use of the nights silence for secrecy, unless by chance sometimes the vehement groans he mingled with his Prayers, being heard by some that were near the place, gave notice how earnest he was in his Devotions. For at no time of the night could any man come to find his Labours ended; but often hath the next mornings light seen the last of his nights care dispatched.

Now although these things be true, yet well I know there are many who will find fault, that I have so slightly passed them over; and demand, why I produce not the matters themselves, as witnesses of his actions, or at leastwise some particular example in each kind, that they may with more security give credit to the rest. But many things there are which hinder me from so doing. First, that common civility forbiddeth us, to publish abroad that, which the Conscience of another hath committed to our secrecy; and a very ill example should he give, who should not rather by all means conceal, than make known to the World, the secrets of private Houses, the jarrings of Friends, and such privy slips in mens lives, whereof it may either ashame, or repent them: Next, that the matters themselves, which used in the greatest privacy that might be, to be dispatched, could by no means come to our knowledge; or if by suspition somewhat were gathered, and that I should instance in one or two Particulars; yet what great assurance in the rest, could I draw from hence.

I will now bring the last Argument, I know not whither I should say, of his Ability or Industry; that he, who so wholly had given himself to pleasure his Friends, that he had set apart no time, for his other occasions, yet wrote so much, as it might well have been believed, he had done nothing else.

I have here for their sakes, who may desire it, set down the Titles of those Books he wrote; which are these, Comœdiarum libri 2. Syllogisticon. Admonitio ad Parliamentum. De lapsis per errorem in Ecclesiam restituendis. Oliva Evangelica. De Christo gratis justificante. De Christo Crucifixo. Papa confutatus. Contra Osorium de Justitia. Meditationes supra Apocalypsim Rerum in Ecclesia gestarum Commentarii. The Acts and Monuments of the Church.

We are now come so far, as to be able from hence, to give the Readers a full sight at once, of the rest of Master Foxes life; which ought (I suppose) in like manner to please them, as we see those that travel, when they have been long tired with continual rugged ways and rough Forests, and come at length into the plain and Champion-Countries, are with the very change of soil not a little delighted and refreshed.

In this (as it were) draught of his conditions, we shall first observe that which might well be thought the chiefest of his Vertues; to wit, a deliberate and resolved contempt of all things, which are in greatest esteem among men, and especially of Pleasures: which mind of his, whether inbred by Nature, acquired by Discipline, or infused by God, did of necessity give him great ability to perform with commendation in whatsoever he lifted to take in hand; there being nothing which can mislead the mind into errors, which would otherwise of it self hold the right way, but what proceedeth from some pleasure or other; lying in wait to entrap us in our journey. But so did Master Fox hold play with these Enemies, as one who desired not to save himself by flying, or shelter himself in some secret place of retire; but by often skirmishing, and experience in the manner of fight, to encrease his own strength, and give to others an example of fortitude; using to say, That they did no great matter, who forsook business and employments in the World, lest they should suffer themselves to be allured and deceived by them. For, that the things were in themselves innocent, and then first of all grew hurtful, when they were overvalued and pursued with avaritious desire; which he that can beat back when it assaileth him, and striveth to break in upon him, is deservedly called temperate; but that he who was never in any temptation, may rather seem to have been good through want of occasion to be otherwise, than by his own Vertue.

He

He never therefore declined the Friendship of Illustrious Personages; not to gain honour to himself, that thereby he saw his commendation would be more effectual, when he should desire favour on the behalf of others. The money, which sometime rich men offered him, he accepted, returning it back to the Poor. He likewise frequented the Tables of his Friends, not for his pleasure-sake, being of a spare diet; but both in courtesie to keep them company, and left any should imagine, he either feared, or fled from the wrastling, and striving with voluptuous Encounters, or that he thought himself, by being absent, better defended against the pleasures incident to eating and drinking, than by the guard of his own moderation. In a word, so did Mr. Fox behave himself in those things which are followed by delights, that certain it is, none of those who were always in his company, can remember any speech or action of his, which might bewray the least shew of a desire to them; and so far was he from thirsting after Honour, Riches, Applause, or any outward good; that he would at no time suffer the care of his private Estate to enter his mind, much less that it should by taking thought for his Houshold-affairs, be overcome or drawn aside: which either security of his, or as some called it, Slothfulness in his own Fortunes, I will hereafter declare whence it proceeded. In the mean time, whilst I consider the cause wherefore he thought all other things so much contemptible, especially since that could not be imagined to arise from any obstinate disdainfulness, much less from a sleepiness or sluggishness of mind; I assure my self, it was only the love of God, wherewith his mind was so filled, and so much delighted, that he left no room, nor any affection free for other pleasures, of his own accord separating himself from the fashions of the World, of which he was not otherwise incapable; and devoting himself wholly to this care, like one who had found an invaluable Treasure, he bent his eyes and his mind upon this only, neither hoping nor expecting any thing besides, but resolved to make this the scope of all his wishes and desires: Whereby (as in such a case must needs happen) it so fell out, that they who observed his mind so stedfastly fixed upon God, and that he both spoke and did many things beyond the opinion of an ordinary good man, believed that he could not be void of some divine Inspiration; and now some began, not as a good man to honour him, but as one sent from Heaven, even to adore him, through the folly of mankind, madly doting upon any thing, whatsoever their own will hath set up to be worshipped.

I will neither mince the truth of any story, nor will I with additions flatter Report. Many things did Master Fox foretel, by occasion of comforting the afflicted, or terrifying those that were stubborn, to which the event proved after answerable, and (perchance) in many things he was deceived.

It hath been already related, with what constancy, whilst he remained at Basil among his banished Country-men, he signified the times of their return. It is likewise well known, what Answer he gave concerning that noble and vertuous Woman, the Lady Anne Hennage, who lying sick of a violent Feaver, when the Disease had so far increased, that the Physitians had pronounced it deadly, Master Fox was called to be present at her ending, whose counsel and fidelity she had often made use of, in matters appertaining to her Souls health. After he had performed what he came for, in reading Prayers, and comforting the sick Woman, with such perswasions as seemed good to him; Well have you done (said he) and according to your duty, to prepare your self for all events; but know this from me, That of this sickness you shall not die. By chance, among those who stood by, was Sir Moyle Finch, a well known and honourable Knight, the Ladies Son in law, who either moved with so unusual a Speech, or desirous to get somewhat more out of him, as soon as Master Fox was a little withdrawn from the rest of the company, began seemingly to chide with him; telling him, that he could not but marvel what his intent was, that contrary to the opinion of the Artists, he being an unskilful man, should presume to determine the end of the Disease, and by so doing bring the sick Woman, by condition of her Sex, wavering, yet hitherto undismayed, to an impatience of dying, by giving her this hope and expectation of life: if his Mother in law might be likely to live, that no man had more cause of joy than himself; but if her death were indeed at hand, it befitted no man less to dissemble it, than he, who ought to provide for the good of her Soul: that he did therefore, for the friendship he bare him, much fear, lest, by that untimely word, he had lost a great part of the good opinion which men had formerly of his truth and modesty. To this Master Fox, smiling, made answer, That for his part he hindred not any man to think of him as he pleased; but concerning the sick Lady, it had so seemed good unto God, that she should recover of that Disease; and that he had said no more than was commanded him. The Lady recovered: nor can I in this tell an untruth, there being many yet living, who could reprove me.

Like to this, and no less true was that story of Mistriss Honiwood, an honourable Gentlewoman, who had almost twenty years lain sick of a Consumption through Melancholy, neither did any one seem to have advice or courage sufficient against the force of so mischievous a Disease, though she had already consulted with the gravest Divines, and the best Physitians, and with all, who either in the art of curing, or power of perswading were accounted to excel the rest. At length she sent also for Mr. Fox. They who went along with him thither related afterward, that never had they entred into a more heavy or afflicted house. There sate by the sick Woman to attend her, her Friends, Kinsfolk, Children and Servants, some upon Seats, and some on the Chamber-floor, not weeping or sighing, as those commonly do that lament, but having spent all their tears, resolutely silent, neither rising to those that came in, nor answering those who asked any question, as if that also became their mourning; you might have guest them so many ſtatues of Mourners in humane likeneſs. The ſick Woman lay upon her Bed, without any hope of life, together with her frequent ſighs, faintly breathing forth ſome few words, the effect whereof was, That ſhe deſired to end her days. Maſter Fox when he had ſo many Patients under his hands at once, not thinking fit, where a grief ſo violent would make ſtrong reſiſtance, to attempt any thing in vain, left, in not being by reaſon overcome, they might ſeem to have had reaſon on their ſides, left all other means of conſolation, and what he thought neceſſary to cure their afflicted minds, he diligently mingled with his Prayers; ſo that within a few days, they who were thought impoſſible, by mans help to be cured, did now ſeem, of their own accord, to begin to recover. At length, having farther endeared himſelf, he then told her, That ſhe ſhould not only grow well of that Conſumption, but alſo live to an exceeding great age. At which words the ſick Gentlewoman a little moved, and earneſtly beholding Maſter Fox: As well might you have ſaid (quoth ſhe) that if I ſhould throw this Glaſs againſt the Wall, I might believe it would not break to pieces; and holding a Glaſs in her hand, out of which ſhe had newly drunk, ſhe threw it forth; neither did the Glaſs, firſt by chance lighting on a little Cheſt ſtanding by the Bed-ſide, and afterward falling upon the ground, either break or crack in any place about it: And the event fell out accordingly. For the Gentlewoman, being then threeſcore years of age, lived afterward for all example of felicity, ſeldom ſeen in the Off-ſpring of any Family, being able, before the 90 year of her age, (for ſhe lived longer) to reckon three hundred and threeſcore of her Childrens * Children and Grandchildren.

* Among which at this day, to wit, in the year of our Lord, 1641. In which this Book is ſet forth, there liveth Mrs. Grace Hemegraphe Daughter of the ſaid Miſtriſs Hemmaud, a Gentlewoman of great worth, and the Widow of an honourable Gentleman, Maſter Alchorn Newnam, who affirmeth that ſhe was preſent at the ſame time this was done, being a witneſs of more integrity, and more ſincere than that her Teſtimony ſhould without great wrong be doubted of.

I could here relate many ſtories of like nature, but they, for the moſt part, being dead, who might juſtifie the Particulars, I will not intreat to be believed, where I cannot bring proof enough to deſerve it. That which followeth is more commonly known, than that it ſhould need to be confirmed by Witneſſes.

Maſter Fox went one day, in duty, as his cuſtom was, to ſee the Earl of Arundel, Son to the Duke of Norfolk, and Father to this Right Honourable Earl now living. The Earl, in his courteſie, when he was going away, brought him to the Water-ſide, at the lower end of his Garden; but obſerving the River very rough by the ſuddain riſing of the Winds, he counſelled Maſter Fox not to truſt himſelf in ſo boiſterous a Tempeſt upon the Waters: But he continuing in his reſolution of going; So my Lord (quoth he) let theſe waters deal with me, as I have in truth and ſincerity delivered to you all that I have ſpoken: and with that entring into the Boat, before they could put off from the Bridge, the Wind ceaſed, and the River began to run with a ſmoother ſtream.

Being often asked by his familiar Friends, why he had no more regard to the ſtraightneſs of his own Eſtate, it being the firſt precept of Charity to begin at home; his anſwer was, That God by his Covenant had the charge of his affairs, who well knew both what was fit for him, and when to beſtow it; and ſince he had never yet failed him, when could he begin to doubt of him, without manifeſt ingratitude?

Theſe and ſuch like things, although by all men much wondred at, yet dare I not preſume to affirm, what that was in all theſe actions, which did principally tend to Maſter Foxes commendation: whether it be, that the mind by how much the purer and more ſublime it is, ſeeth ſo much the farther: or whether there be ſome hidden cauſe, why God may be pleaſed ſometimes to declare his purpoſes, by men, not ſpeaking out of their own knowledge, but as they are moved.

We muſt make haſte now to other matters, in which there was nothing that ſo much wan to Maſter Fox the love of people, as the pity he uſually ſhewed to all ſorts of men in diſtreſs; and ſome you may find, who affirm, that Maſter Fox not only gave away to the poor his Money, but his Cloaths and Houſhold-ſtuff alſo, without his Wives privity; which modeſty forbiddeth me to maintain for truth. For ſince I know well enough, that many things, concerning the reſt of his behaviour, have been either feigned, or amplified by the affections of men, I ought not a little to ſuſpect, leſt in this they have done the like. True it is, that Maſter Fox gave largely to the Poor, and therein exceeded the meaſure of his own ſubſtance, but that his bounty ever proceeded to the diſfurniſhing of his houſe, I neither have any Author worth the credit, who avoucheth it; nor is it likely that he ſhould deſcend to ſuch extream courſes, who by the liberality of others that ſupplied him with money to that purpoſe, wanted not ſufficient means to ſhew his Charity.

All theſe Vertues of his were fenced about, as with a Bulwark, by a ſingular modeſty and integrity of life; which ſuffered not any thing either to enter into his manners, or to break forth in his actions, but what was firſt with much diligence ſearched into and examined, whether it might beſeem him or not; which alſo having always before him, if at any time (by the condition of mans frailty) ought within began to be ſhaken, yet was proviſion quickly made, before the matter proceeded to any great breach in his manners, by forſaking all commerce with any kind of Vices, againſt which the ſhame to do evil, and the regard he had to his own credit, kept a continual watch and ward.

Yet for all this there want not ſome, who accuſe Maſter Fox of Injuſtice, in the higheſt degree; which injury, becauſe many are intereſſed in, I ſhall further inquire into.

Maſter Fox in that part of his Hiſtory, wherein he deſcribeth the lamentable Troubles in the five years Reign of Queen Mary, hath by name mentioned not only the Authors of thoſe Executions, but alſo many, who were but Miniſters and Aſſiſtants, among whom were ſome perſons of great note. This, ſome of their Poſterity complain to have been done unjuſtly by Maſter Maſter Fox, and that the fatal neceſſity of thoſe times, their modeſty in obeying, or the publick Offices impoſed upon them, ought not to be a ſcandal to them, or their Poſterity. Now though I might juſtly anſwer theſe men, that the ſame excuſe of neceſſity, which they alledge for their Anceſtors, ought to ſuffice on Maſter Foxes behalf, ſince he could no way leave the Miniſters nameleſs, but he ſhould leave his Adverſaries occaſion of cavilling at his ſtory: yet willingly would I give them further ſatisfaction, than they can in juſtice challenge; deſiring, that what hath been done might poſſibly have been done otherwiſe, and intreating them, not to ſuppoſe that done with a thought of hurting, which was only the Fortune of thoſe who were hurt; in the mean while (notwithſtanding) I adviſe them, that they joyn not their grief, with the anger of thoſe men, who are offended with Maſter Fox for a far different cauſe, and under colour of the perſons, ſtrike at a matter of another condition, there being two ſorts of men, who in this reſpect complain they are injured, the one out of Nature, the other out of Faction. To the firſt, as their due, I willingly grant all benefit that courteſie can afford them. Though they are angry, they are ſtill Subjects, and in their Obedience: neither would I make ſo light of the grief, though unjuſtly taken by any good Subject, as not rather to loſe a part of my right, than that he ſhould relinquiſh any part of his Loyalty. To the laſt, I have ſomewhat elſe to ſay, as to men, who had the Fortune to fall out firſt with their Country, and to have that as the true and principal Cauſe of their hatred: than to grow angry with Maſter Fox, whom they hate not, but for their Countries ſake. To theſe men I am ſo far from thinking any ſatisfaction due, as that I cannot afford them the favour of reaſoning with them, which is granted even to Enemies. For the ſafety of civil entercourſe, and all hope of reconcilement they have taken away, and broken all ties of humane ſociety: And what can I hope he ſhould ever after do, either like an underſtanding man, or like a man at all, who could forſake his duty to his Country? which alone ſo draweth into it ſelf the power and right of all duties, that according as any man ſheweth more or leſs love towards it, ſo may the moſt infallible judgment be given, how he ſtandeth affected towards God. But if they ſay, their Country hath failed in its duty: Firſt, that will be a queſtion, whether it hath failed or not and how far it hath failed; but it is without all Controverſie their duty to let paſs any diſcontent for their Countries ſake: Next, how bold a face muſt he have, who being himſelf a party to an Action, of which God only can determine, ſhould preſume to make himſelf his own Judge, and (not content to have ſet at nought that Authority, which amongſt men is moſt weighty) neither grant to his Country ſpace of appealing, nor awaite the Judgment of Almighty God, but as if he had already won the day, ſeize all things before hand by foul and ſtubborn attempts, and rather gratifie an Enemy with his diſloyalty, than perform his duty to his Country ſo well, deſerving it? So that if it ſhould happen at any time, that this famous Kingdom (which is not impoſſible in this ſtate of humane weakneſs) ſhould err in any part of duty towards God, yet might moſt dangerous examples of treachery be given, if when any man ſhall have a deſire to his Countries deſtruction, he may by excuſe of his Countries Crime, not only ſeem to have quitted himſelf of ſo hainous a fault, but alſo to have done what his duty required.

This I have ſpoken of the more largely, becauſe I underſtand that many of our own Party think fit, that ſome Anſwer ſhould be made to the Papiſts, concerning the evil Speeches they have uſed againſt Maſter Fox. To ſatisfie whoſe deſire in a few words, let us firſt ſee what thoſe evil Speeches are: That he is a lying Author: It is therefore a lye, that Maſter Rogers, Archbiſhop Cranmer, Biſhop Hooper, Biſhop Ridley, Biſhop Latimer, and other moſt holy and innocent men of the ſame train were burned for their Religion. But if this, even by their own confeſſion, be true, what (I marvel) may thoſe matters be, by whoſe fallhood the reſt of the whole work hath incurred the infamous Title of a lye, as they do make their Followers believe? Some things they alledge miſtaken in the names or number of ſuch as ſuffer, or in the time of their ſuffering, which were either recalled in the following Editions, or by the Author ſo well defended, that as long as he lived no man exclaimed any more. Somethings they likewiſe urge in the Hiſtory of former Ages, contradicted by the Hiſtoriographers themſelves, which they might eaſily do, in ſo great contention of differing Opinions, that whatſoever Author a man ſhould follow, he muſt ſtill fall into the ſame inconvenience. Yet all they can ſay is of ſuch a nature, as neither we much care if it were true, nor they if it be falſe. But let us (if you will) grant them ſomewhat, and be liberal of Maſter Fox his right: If I ſhall take quite out of the Hiſtory, all that they have ſaid to be falſe, will they then promiſe me to ſuffer their Followers with freedom to read the reſt? They will no more yield to this condition, than they will be contented to be quiet: What ſhall a man do to ſuch men, as are never ſatisfied, whether you grant that they plead for, or deny it them? And how great a frowardneſs it were to expect from any Author, that in the whole courſe of ſo long a ſtory, whilſt one man doth with his own only labours handle ſo many ſeveral matters, he ſhould never ſo much as miſtake any thing? As well might they tax that moſt accompliſhed Writer Julius Cæſar with telling a lye, if where he deſcribeth our Ille of Great Britain, he ſhould by chance in the circuit of any Iſland, or paſſage from one place to another, differ by a few miles from later accompt, who (indeed) wrote the Hiſtory of his Wars and Expeditions, with that truth he ought to do, but in the reſt followed the common report, and believed the Relations of others, not willing to be over curious in things of no great importance.

And thus much it ſeemed good to me to anſwer, rather out of the opinion of ſome of our own ſide, than that my ſelf thought it neceſſary: But if our Adverſaries themſelves require a further Anſwer, I will deal with them upon other terms: Let them firſt return to their Obedience, dience, make satisfaction to their Country, and then prosecute their private displeasures, when they are clear of all publick Offences: But if they will needs run on still in this heat, and after they have neither any hope nor credit left, think to frighten us with railing, I shall (for my part) be well content to let them gain as much commendation for their good pleading, as they have reaped fruit in that course of life they have heretofore used; and to allow them this double glory, neither in evil-doing, nor in evil-speaking to have any Fellows: If this condition seemeth over hard, yet (at least) let them equal the dignity of that History they so much carp at. Let them be Authors of equal credit. So would the fight be more honourable, if they might with as much damage to themselves be overcome, as they should with advantage get the Victory. If otherwise it be their desire to purchase to themselves some blast of fame, by cavilling at this lasting Work, in their Pamphlets and under-hand Invectives, not such as the judgments of understanding men, but the fancies of some easier Women; is there any man so senseless, as by opposing them, to make those Writings of longer continuance, which would, by being countenanced, in a short time be quite forgotten?

Now further, that they may understand how much their ill Language hath made more for Master Fox his honour than reproach; I will speak a word or two of his moderation towards them. I could produce Letters of his, wherein he perswadeth the Lords and others, who then held the places of chiefest Authority, not to suffer Edmund Campian, and his fellow Conspirators to be put to death, nor to let that custom continue longer in the Kingdom, that death rather than some other punishment should be inflicted on the Papist Offendors. And lest he might seem only out of the goodness of his Nature, and not out of the judgment of his mind to have so spoken, he there endeavoureth to prove by many reasons, how much it was to the weakning of the cause, rather to follow the example of their Adversaries, in appointing punishments, than their own mildness; and that they much rather ought to strive, as well in mercy and clemency to overcome them, as they had already in the justice of their cause got the upper hand. This he repeated often, adventuring, even till he was in danger of giving offence by his importunity to intreat for them. Whereas on the other side the Lords gave him to understand; That this was a matter of State, not of Controversie; That the Kings life, the publick Liberty, and the assurance of the Kindgom rested on this Point; That Subjects ought by their own peril to be warned, how they grow too prodigal of their Countries blessings; That such was the estate of the Kingdom, as that nothing could be more glorious, or more secure, if the Subjects, only would consent, to keep their abilities to their Countries use, nor had it further failed of that felicity, than it had been hindred by the revolts and conspiracies of our own men. Yet for all this did Master Fox continue in his opinion, and though he could by intreaty gain nothing, yet would he with many sighs testifie his sorrow, as often as he heard, that any of them were put to death.

And thus having seen his moderations to the persons, it will not be out of the way to add in general what he thought of the Churches of Rome, and the Bishop thereof, as far as they may be gathered out of his Speeches, when being of ripe years, he had strengthened his judgment with much experience.

The Heads of his Opinions were these:

That among the Christian-Churches, the Roman had been in dignity always chiefest, and of most Antiquity. That it retained this dignity and opinion many Ages after, by little and little growing to greater Authority, not by consent of people, or by any right to that Claim, but by reason of a certain inclination and custom among men, that where any chance far to excel others, they first begin to be powerful among the rest, and at length to exercise command over them. That the greatest Honour and Authority it had, was among these Western Kingdoms, which, as every one most affected the Christian Religion, so were they by the diligence and piety of the Romans most assisted, in which respect it had not ill deserved to be called the Mother of those Churches. That the occasion of so great an increase was, that the City of Rome being of so ancient Renown, and as it were by destiny appointed Monarch of the World, in all Ages abounding with men of great courage and vertue, being well peopled, wealthy, usefully seated, and always under the Emperors sight, easily afforded this convenience. That at the first the Christians could no where meet together with less trouble, more plentifully be provided for, more safely be concealed, or, when need was, die with more constancy; all which made Posterity so much to admire and honour them. That the Church at first flourished rather in good Discipline, and the approved holiness of the Professors, than in abundance of riches, there being yet no looseness, no pride or ambition found in the manners of the Clergy, and Money, Servants, Lands, Jewels, and such like goods, altogether unknown to them; in fine, all things so restrained, either by modesty in using what they had, or contentedness in wanting what they had not, as that in Rome only, seemed to be the Seat of Christian Religion. That all this was with most strictness observed in the times neareſt to the Churches Infancy; but in process of time, by little and little began to be neglected and corrupted, after the same manner as Rivers, whose streams near their head being smallest and cleareſt, the farther they proceed, run in a larger Channel, but with more troubled waters; till at length, by mixture with the Sea, they grow also unwholsome; and though in no one place, we can perceive where they are, any jot changed from their first purity; yet may we easily enough find a great difference, if we compare the extreams together. For that in the Church it so fell out, that having brought all Nations to the Christian Faith, after they once began to think it for the Honour of the Empire, that the Priests should no longer (as they had formerly accustomed) endure endure Poverty, but live in a more plentiful way, to which purpose the Emperors granted many things to the Church-men, both as an Ornament and Reward to them; then also the Priests began, first to be taken with the love of Riches, then by degrees to grow wanton through abundance, and not care how little pains they took, after (as always the succeeding Age addeth to the Vices of the former) they affected Power also, which when they had once obtained, and by the Emperors Gift, received the Command of the Church, they gave not over, till (having cast down the Emperors, by whose bounty they had so prevailed) they both invaded the Priviledges of the Empire, and now laid Claim to both Spiritual and Temporal Government; in the mean while neglecting those Rules of Religion which their Predecessors had prescribed them, neither themselves much searching the Scriptures, nor permitting others to do it; and esteeming the Worship of God to consist rather in outward Devotion, and Pomp of Ceremonies, than in the Obedience of Faith. That by this means it so came to pass, that the Church of Rome (as all other immoderate Empires) not only fell from that high degree it once held, but also subverted in it self the very substance and state of a Church: nor that this ought to seem strange, if as the most healthful Bodies fall into sickness with most danger, so it befalleth, that the prime of all Churches should have no mean, but either remain in the perfection of health, or become the most dangerous Enemy to it; and that for this cause the Pope now seemed to be Antichrist. That notwithstanding the case was so plain, yet neither part ought to lend too much belief to Arguments, not be too earnest in hindering it, if by any moderation of men the matter might be brought to soundness and agreement. That it was not (perchance) in our Power to take from Rome her ancient Honour, and the opinion of her Religion so fixed already in the minds of men. That the Church of Rome had fallen by her own covetousness, ambition, and prevarication; but that never any man had gone so far in sinning, as that Repentance had not pierced as far. That therefore it were fit to allow them, as a returning to Repentance, so some convenient means to move them to it, and sufficient space to repent in. That it might be the Author disliked them, because a German or French man, and not an Italian of their own Nation had told them of their Errors. That there might one day among their own men be found some, by whose Authority they should not be ashamed to amend their faults, and with more willingness part with their own power, to procure the peace of the whole World. That there was at least this hope left, it might so fall out, that they had no further erred in the Articles of Faith, than that they would not suffer too much to be known. That the conditions of agreement would be, first, That the Pope should forsake all those Tenents, by which he gained so great sums of money; there being nothing, whereto the people might with more difficulty be perswaded, than that Christ, the Saviour of the World, had instructed his Church in the ways of money, and setting Scriptures to sale. Next that he should renounce all Secular Jurisdiction, and not suppose himself to have Title, or any thing to do with the right of Princes. That on the other side his Opposers should not refuse, that some one man may have the principal place of Counsel and Government in the Church-affairs, as being a thing which would have many conveniences in it, when it might be done with security; neither that the Roman-Church had once fallen, ought to make against it, nor that it had first flourished, to prevail for it, herein to be preferred before any other, but that all this was to be left to the discretion of a General-Council of the Christians, which might be so equitable, as that neither the Power or Favour of any one should be able, either from the place of meeting, or the difference in number of Voices to promise it self any advantage to the injury of the rest. That in the mean while it would be of great moment to the hope and speediness of setling all Controversies, if hereafter on both sides they would give such Instructions, as might cause in each Party a better hope and opinion of the other, especially that they ought to leave off that stubborn conceit, whereby each of them, presuming it self to be the only true Church, supposeth the other excluded. For that it were not only wicked, but also highly to the dishonour of God, to think that he had so given his Commandments to Mankind, as that they should be turned to the destruction of those that obey them; which must of necessity come to pass, if when all men will not consent in the same opinion, they who understand most shall refuse to admit of the rest; Was therefore the Kingdom of Heaven reserved only for the more understanding sort, and those that know most? Where should then the Fools of the World be; where should little Children be, whom Christ had set apart for himself? How much better should we serve God, by following that which was evident, than by interpreting that which was doubtful? How much more probable were it, that Gods mercy was so abundant, as when men were once agreed in point of general Obedience, there should nothing else be laid to their charge? For, that the force of Obedience was before God so great, as thereby only all other inequalities might be made even; but if all were not in equal condition, that certainly with God they were best esteemed, who judged with most modesty of others.

From Master Fox his Enemies, I will now pass to his Friends, among which I have already shewed, with how great affection he was beloved by the Duke of Norfolk, being by his bounty maintained in his life, and after his death, by the Pension he bestowed on him, which his Son, the Right Honourable Earl of Suffolk, to whom those Revenews descended, out of his liberality, confirmed.

His Fortunes were encreased by the Lord William Cecill, then Lord Treasurer, a man beyond expression excellent, whom it as much availed Queen Elizabeth, to have for her Minister, as it availed the Kingdom, to have Elizabeth for their Queen; and without doubt most deserving, that in himself, and his Posterity, he should flourish in that Kingdom, which he had by his wisdom and advice made most flourishing. He of the Queens Gift obtained for Mr. Fox the Rectory of Shipton, upon no other inducement but his publick Desert, and when Mr. Fox delayed, and after his manner entreated leave to excuse himself, the Lord Cecill politickly overcame his bashfulness, by telling him, That he neither accepted that for an answer, nor had he deserved that the blame of Mr. Foxes refusing the Queens Gift, should be laid upon him, as if he had been his hindrance.

To the Earls of Bedford and of Warwick, he was very acceptable, and approved by them for the likeness of his inclination. He

He was very intimate with Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretary of State, a prudent and vigilant man, and one who deservedly was the first that advanced the Power of the Secretariship.

The two Brethren, Sir Thomas Hennage and Master Michael Hennage, he entirely affected, the first for the sweetness of his Behaviour, the other for his solid Learning and singular modesty of Life, and though they were each of them in their kind most accomplished Gentlemen, yet was he wont to say, that Sir Thomas Hennage had as much as was requisite any way to a compleat Courtier, but that Master Michael Hennage had both all his Brother in himself, and that besides of his own, which the Court had not corrupted.

To Sir Drue Drury he bare (likewise) singular affection, as to a man of sincere intentions, and of great constancy in all Fortunes and (perchance) the only man in the Court, who continued his favour, without loss of his Freedom.

Among the Prelates he principally reverenced Doctor Grindal Archbishop of Canterbury, Doctor Elmar Bishop of London, Doctor Pilkington Bishop of Durham, and Doctor Nowell Dean of Pauls, who were his Partners in banishment at Basil.

Among the Writers of his time, he preferred before the rest, Doctor Humphrey, Doctor Whitetaker, and Doctor Fulk, with whose Learning he was wondrously delighted, and esteemed it no small benefit to be again beloved by them.

But with none had he more familiar acquaintance, than with Master John Crowly, and Master Baldwine Collins, whose counsel he made use of in all his affairs, especially of Master Collins, concerning whom he was wont to say, That he knew not which had greatest share in him, excellence of knowledge, or modesty of mind.

Among military men, Sir Francis Drake was much delighted with his Familiarity; whom to commend near the times, he lived in, were needless, but to commend him to Posterity, according to his desert, many Volumes would scarce suffice.

Among the Citizens of London, he always found great good will; especially with Sir Thomas Gresham, Sir Thomas Roe, Alderman Bacchus, Master Smith, Master Dale, and Master Sherington, who had him in great account and estimation, being part of them such as had born the highest places of Honour in the City, and part of them Merchants of great substance.

I pass by many, who (perhance) had as great share in Master Fox his Friendship, as any of these; nor ought it to be accounted a fault, if I either knew not, or remembred not at all: But this I ought not to slip, (as being the chiefest cause why I thought fit to mention the forenamed worthy men) That these were they, from whom, I before said, Master Fox received such large sums of money to divide among the poor: which although they did with so much privacy, as that they trusted not to Messengers in delivering it, not regarding any outward praise, their well doing might procure them, knowing the conscience thereof to be as much as they needed to desire; Yet was it not fitting for me in Master Fox his History to dissemble it, or to give any man occasion to suppose the truth not opened by Master Fox, though they themselves thought good to neglect the fruit of so great Liberality, especiall since it may abundantly serve for commendation of both him and them, that they should be known by their own actions, and he by none but his own.

He used always among his Friends a pleasant kind of familiarity, wherewith he seasoned the gravity and severity of his other behaviour.

Being once asked at a Friends Table, what Dish he desired to be set up to him, to begin his meal with, he answered, the last; which word was pleasantly taken, as if he had meant some choicer Dish, such as usually are brought for the second Course; whereas he rather signified the desire he had to see dinner ended, that he might depart home.

Going abroad (by chance) he met a Woman that he knew, who pulling a Book from under her arm, and saying, See you not that I am going to a Sermon; Master Fox replied, But if you will be ruled by me, go home rather, for to day you will do but little good at Church; and when she asked, At what time therefore he would counsel her to go; Then (answered he) when you tell no body before hand.

It hâppened at his own Table, that a Gentleman there spake somewhat too freely against the Earl of Leicester, which when Master Fox heard, he commanded a Bowl filled with Wine to be brought him, which being done: This Bowl (quoth he) was given me by the Earl of Leicester, so stopping the Gentleman in his intemperate Speeches without reprehending him.

When a young man, a little too forward, had in presence of many, said, That he could conceive no reason, in the reading of the old Authors, why men should so greatly admire them. No marvel indeed, (quoth Master Fox) For if you could conceive the reason, you would then admire them your self.

I could speak of many stories of this kind, but that I will not exceed my intended limits too far.

At length having in such actions, and such behaviour spent out his Age, being now full of years, and stored with Friends, ere he had quite passed through his seventieth year, he died, not through any known Disease, but through much Age. Yet did he foresee the time of his departure, nor would suffer his Sons (which notwithstanding he entirely loved) to be present at his death, but forbad the one at any hand to be sent for, and sent the other on a Journey three days before he died, then calling both of them unto him, when he well knew, though they made never so great haste, they should come too late; whether he thought them unable to bear so heavy a Spectacle, or would not have his own mind at that time troubled with any thing that might move him to desire life. Which to me and my Brother was the most grievous of all chances, that thereby we could neither come to close his eyes, to receive his last Blessing and Exhortations, nor satisfie our minds with that last sight of him. Perchance we could with more patience have endured to see the fainting approaches of his death drawing on, than to have lost in him so good an example how to die.

Upon the report of his death the whole City lamented, honouring the small Funeral which was made for him, with the concourse of a great multitude of people, and in no other fashion of mourning, than as if among so many, each man had buried his own Father, or his own Brother.

LECTOREM.

COntendentibus a me multis, idque sæpenumero, ut Patris mei vitam, ante triginta annos a me conscriptam posteritati donarem; cum nulla nova res accideret, propter quam (vel me tacente) judicio posterorum de clarissimo viro diffiderem; multa autem me nunc necessaria huic instituto deficerent, excessu eorum, in quorum testimonio fides rerum continebatur: non dubitavi quin & prioris recusationis meæ veniam apud cunctos consequi, & si in recusando perseverarem, hujus quoque libertatis jus tenere facile potuissem. Sed cum viderem homines alienos, & consuetudinis ejus prorsus ignaros, hoc suum negotium feciſſe, ut de vita ejus scriberent; de qua nihil nisi per vagas, & fortuitas auditiones doceri potuerunt; eoque fieri, ut multa de eo supra quam facta sunt, extulerint; multa secus quam facta sunt narrarint; plurima ignoratione præterierint; qui adolescens supremis ejus vitæ temporibus perpetuus interfui, & cum abessem propiores causas cognoscendi quicquid attentius gessisset semper habui; adductus sum officio, ut memoriam ejus illæsam esse vellem; & si luce eam donare non possem, at eam in vero, & suo lumine collocarem. Neque veritus sum, ut hoc factum meum legentibus probare possim, quod filius Patris mei vitam composuerim, exemplo propter propinquitatem suspecto: Nam primum celari posteros memorabilem virum, nec injuria eorum qui perperam de eo scripserunt sinebat: defendi autem eum aliter quam ab suis, tutum non erat: neque est, cur in filio magis suspecta sit fides sua, quam in iis qui nullam de eo memoriam extare volunt vis doloris, & iracundiæ suæ. Hactenus sustinui, donec æquato periculo offensionis inter infensos, & cupidos, vicit tandem ratio parendi eis, qui hoc meum studium, etiam cum expostulatione, flagitabant; quorum importunitate consensi in opus emittendum, initio non alio destinatum, quam ut imaginem Paternæ consuetudinis apud me servarem, & nunc, in tanta hominis fama, aliorum magis opinione, quam judicio meo necessarium.

JOHANNIS FOXII VITA.

Prima illi diligentia fuit Eccleſiæ Hiſtoriam omnem tum veterem, tum novam evolvere, cognoſcere quis Eccleſiæ exortus, quæ incrementa, quibus artibus floruerit, quo errore declinaverit, expendere controverſiarum quæ intervenerant cauſas, vim, & quid in utraque parte ſanum, quid egrum eſſet : quo in conatu ſic exarſit ſtudium, & celeritas ejus ut ante trigeſimum Ætatis ſuæ annum, quicquid Patres Latini, Græcive in ſcriptis, quicquid Schola in concluſionibus, quicquid Concilia in Actis, Curia in Decretis reliquerat, id omne, modo obvium eſſet, legendo percurrerit ; in Hebræorum *quoque literis peritiam non vulgarem aſſecutus ſit. Retulerunt æquales ipſius ſolitum illi fuiſſe, ſuper diurnum laborem ; pernoctare quoque in ſtudiis, aut non niſi multa admodum nocte ad quietem ſe recipere. Lucus eſt extra Collegium amœnitate loci, ſtudentium otio, & ambulationibus dicatus : Eum locum, noctemque delegerat, ubi tyronem animum pavidum conſcientia novæ cogitationis, adverſus metum, ipſo terrore ſolitudinis, & tenebrarum firmaret. Quas ibi vigilatas nocteſ, quos fluctus, æſtuſque animi perpeſſus ſit ; quantum ſingultuum, gemitus, lacrymarum precibus apud Deum interfuderit, malim ſilentio tranſiiti, quam in ſpeciem oſtentationis memorari: Sed ideo tradi oportuit, quod hinc prima indicia alienatæ voluntatis eruperunt. Quippe evulgata fama nocturnorum ſeceſſuum, cum ſuſpicaciſſimus quiſque ſuopte ingenio, cæteri ut quiſque ab eo alienior, ita pronior in ſiniſtram interpretationem penderet, tandem familares quoque ejus trahebantur ; immiſſisque qui ſpecie monitionis digreſſus ejus ſermones, actus ſingulos accuratius ſpecularentur. Et erant, qui comparatione priſtinæ conſuetudinis facta atrocius urgerent : Cur infrequentius rem divinam faceret quam ſoleret ? cur vitaret congreſſus æqualium ? Cur ſolatia conjuta dimitteret ? qua mente iſta faceret niſi mutata ? neque occulturum ſi in melius mutaretur. Igitur appetitus rumore, inſidiis, inſimulatione omnium, queſtione ſeverius habita, cum ultra celare conſilium ſuum non poſſet, neqꝫ in mendacio perfugium quærendum putaret, homo ſimpliciſſimi inſtituti, Collegiali judicio convictus, damnatuſque de hereſi, motuſque collegio eſt. Verum ut salus eorum qui Religionem sectabantur magis in securo constituta est; nondum tamen quicquam publici emolumenti, utilitatisque ad ipsos pervenit: unde Foxio stituta est; nondum tamen quicquam publici emolumenti, utilitatisque ad ipsos pervenit: unde Foxio eadem egestas quæ antea fuit; consumpto quicquid vel necessariis ipsius erogaverant, vel ipse quotidiana industria quæsiverat. Rem miram, & Divinæ miserationis documento insignem superfederem referre; nisi modestiam silentii fama rei celebris frustra faceret. Sedebat quodam die Foxius in Ædæ Paulinæ, inedia longa victus, vultuque, & oculis in supremam morientium torvitatem excæsuatis. Cæteris autem vitantibus tam deformem aspectum; accessit ad eum homo quidam facie incognitus; qui postquam juxta assedisset, familiariterq; salutasset, prehensa ejus dextera incertæ pecuniæ summam illi in manum inseruit; jubens bonum animum haberet, & subjiciens: non quidem se scire quantus infortunii modus esset quo constrictaretur, verum suspicari debere haud levem esse: proinde non gravaretur id abs se populari suo munusculi accipere, quod vel communis humanitatis ratio expresserat: iret, refocillaret animum & vivendi causas reciperet: interim sciret haud multorum dierum intervallo adesse spes novas, & subsidia vitæ certiora. Quis ille mortalium fuerit, cujus opportuna liberalitate ultima illa necessitas depulsa sit, rescirri postea nunquam potuit, quamvis multum admitente Foxio ut detegeretur. Credidere qui vaticinii exitum altius attendebant, hunc non suo, sed aliorum studio missum, qui Foxium omnino salvum esse cupiebant: nam quod extrema prius adierit, quam subventum ipsi esset, in eo fortasse ministri negligentia erratum. Certe eo triduo nondum exacto, præsagii fides impleri visa est; missis ad eum ab Ducissa Richmondensi qui sub honestissimis conditionibus eum in familiam suam perlicerent. Acciderat per eos dies ut Dux Norfolcius, is quem inclytum Militia & Imperatoriis artibus celeberrimum illa ætas vidit, unaque cum eo filius, Comes Surriæ, vir in quantum dici potest vecordissime mentis, acerrimiq; ingenii, incertum quibus criminibus, in custodiam Arci Londinensi traderentur. Dum hi in vinculis erant, liberi Comitis apud amitam præfatam Ducissam educabantur, Thomas qui in Ducatu successit, Henricus postea Comes Northamptonæ, & Jana postea Comitissa Westmerlandiæ. Horum puerilitæ Foxius admotus est, ut & mores eorum regeret & literas doceret. In quo munere prudentissime fœminæ de se judicium minimè fefellit. Nam Thomas & Henricus eos morum, & scientiæ profectus fecerunt, quibus substructa eorum grandior ætas, illum ad id opinionis extulit, ut plus meruisse quam regnum ei conferre posset videretur: hunc ad id felicitatis, ut constet modum fortunæ suæ eum non in hominum judicio, sed in satietate sua habuisse: & Jana græcis latinisque literis in miraculum exculta, doctissimis illius temporis viris de utraq; elegantia concertavit. Interim pertransierunt tempora illa non alias visæ felicitatis, ab supremis Henrici annis, per quinquennium Edvardi sexti, (incomparabilis spei juvenis, & perfecto patris opere omnium Regum opera prætervecti,) ad initia principatus Reginæ Mariæ: qua vetabatur, ex conspectu abisse cernerent, delusi præda reverterentur. Id Foxius simulatque navi egressus est, vulgi Sermonibus edoctus, quanquam multum animo conturbaretur, colligit tamen se, consensitq; propere jumentis, simulat se oppido abire; sed eadem nocte clam reversus, pacisceitur cum naviculario, ut primas ventorum remissiones ad navigandum arripiat: Docet id res suas poscere, neque sua referre, quo continentis littore ejiceretur: pergeret modo, neque dubitaret affuturum pio operi Deum. Sive merces, sive pietas valuit, suscepit homo audacissimi conatus rem, & perfecit. Solvens enim antelucano silentio, favore recursantium æstuum, quamvis sævo adhuc mari, & truculento cælo, Foxium cum suis eo biduo in adversi littoris portu Nauporto salvum exponit. Non illustriore documento qui ista legerit agnoscat, quam certa divinæ providentiæ ratio sit: quam incerta humanæ; cum videat accuratissimas prudentium deliberationes sæpe erroribus everti; interpellari casibus, aut contrariis consiliis superari: idq; fieri ut homines pro disciplina habeant, sic Imperio uti, ut quo plus ex fortuna possunt, tanto se minus ex se posse sciant, neq; impotentes desperent: Deum enim utramq; fortunam ex æquo respicere, hominesq; ortu pares honoribus distingui, non in superbiam, contumeliamve, sed ut utrisq; locus modestiæ pateat, vel adversus utrumq; ultioni.

Jam Foxius, ubi dies aliquot Nauporti, reficiendis ab Nausea corporibus consumpsisset. Antuerpium proficiscitur: inde modicis itineribus Basileam contendit. Ea urbs comitatis atque officii erga nostros singularem tum famam obtinebat: Ob quam causam multi ex Anglia celebres viri sævitiæ temporum se subducentes eo confluxerant: ex quibus qui tenuiori fortuna erant, alius aliter, sed longe major pars recensendis librariorum tipis, preliq; vitiis captigandis vitam tolerabant: quod ea urbs Typographicæ cura, copiaque diligentissimorum, ditissimorumque in ea facultate hominum reliquas Germaniæ urbes id temporis antecedebat, qui nostrorum hominum in ea re studium suorum diligentiæ anteponebant. His se Foxius adjunxit, eo acceptior quod durissima olim disciplina habitus, exercitaque per omnem adolescentiam patientia labores perferre didicerat, quæque aliis miseria videbantur: egestatem, vigilias, inediam perferre; ea illi pro ludo fortunæ erant. Id multis fortasse mirum videri potest, qui Foxium per omnem ætatem gracili admodum corpore, & per senectam tenuissima semper valetudine fuisse meminerunt: sed nemo illius extremam vitæ ætatem attritam, depasta quæ curis, & tum naturæ vitio fatiscentem cum vigore integræ juventutis comparaverit, quam ex tot ejus operibus firmissimam ei fuisse constat, sive in modica structura, erecta artuum membrorumq; compages ad firmitatem sufficiat, sive animus ipse, accensa desiderio honestarum actionum, seipso contentus sit, ad exequendum ea quæ vult, minima corporis administratione adjutus.

Industriæ autem ejus fidem abunde fecerit, quod inter tantas occupationes Historiam suam Actorum Ecclesiæ Basiliæ nihilominus inchoaverit, opus vel ipsius tituli professione mensuram humanæ fiduciæ ferme egressum. Et primo adumbravisse tantum contentus est, tanquam lineas vel stamina duceret, corpus & subtegmen Historiæ postea adjecit reversus in patriam, vulgavitq; primum latino Sermone (mox & plebi gratificaretur,) opusq; ipsum imprimendum Basileam misit, ubi etiamnum in honore est, legiturq; passim per exteras nationes, nostris hominibus fere incognitum, dum externa tantum miramur nostra, vel incuria, vel invidia tramittimus.

tanquam authoritate impetraturum: æternum si id impetrare non posset, provisurum etiam in ea quæ destinavisset. Inerat orationi Ducis eo plus fidei quod ea ab innato animi ejus candore attentissimaq; voluntate proficisci noscebatur, pudutque Foxium non tam facti sui, quam quod fieri id potuisse crediderat. Sed modestia defendebatur. Non enim eadem utrumque decere, & dominum & servum: Duci quidem in gloriam conducere, præceptorem suum inviolatum ab injuria servare: suas partes esse ne incolumitas sua Duci vel perniciem, vel perpetuam sollicitudinem afferret: neque timorem sunm defensione carere: scire se Ducem de fide & benevolentia deduci non posse; circumduci & decipi dolis eum posse non se ignorare. Etenim Wintonienfis etiam tum Norfolcio valde charus habebatur, veteri domus observantia nixus, cujus potentia florneratur. Is officii causa ad Norfolcium ventitare crebro solebat, petereque ab eo, ut Præceptoris sui videndi copiam faceret. Id Norfolcius primo abnuere, excusare ejus absentiam, vel valetudinem, postea prolatare, & eludere. Demum accidit ut dum simul in colloquio essent, Foxius, ignarus Wintonienfem in domo esse, in occursum iis se daret, & viso Wintonienfi, tanquam per verecundiam se subduceret. Percunctanti Wintonienfi quisnam is esset è responsit Dux, medicum suum esse, hominem è Schola rudem: Intulit Wintonienfis placere sibi hominis aspectum, & cum occasio daretur, usurum. Intellecta statim est vox nuntia appropinquantis periculi: neque jam ipse Norfolcius manendum Foxio in ea urbe vel intra idem mare putabat contra vim veteratoriæ astuti & tam manifesti, præveniendam omni modo Wintonienfis egritudinem. Exin necessaria fuga quanto potuit fieri silentio adornantur. Præmissus ad portum Ipsuicensem servus, qui navigium conduceret, & apta itineri compararet: & quoniam in oppidis, locisque publicis morandi parum tuta ratio videbatur, delecta est domus cujusdam ex Ducis famulitio, villici, ubi Foxius commodum mare, & navigandi signum opperiretur. Eo clam Foxius proficiscitur, suscepta comite uxore tum gravida, sed eundi certa, & retinentium precibus invicta; & postquam nuntiatum est expectari illum à comitibus, expeditur ad portum defertur, navemque conscendit. Vix altum tenuerant, cum subito effusus ab contrario littore ventus mare turbavit, tanta fluxus violentia, ut ab firmissimis etiam nautis trepiderarur: tum nox continuis imbribus fœda, nubiumque globus in densissimum nimbum convolutus, & administrationem omnem nauticam impederat, cœlestis calculi rationem ademerat. Ea nocte anchoris vix hærere: ubi illuxit postquam tempestas nihil remittere visa est, conversa in littus prora, vetro adigere navem cæperunt, paulum jam secundante æstu, & tandem superata difficultate sub vesperam postride dici quo solverant, in eundem portum invecti sunt. Interea dum Foxius ad mare esset, lictores à Wintonienfi missi domum villici irruperant. Is mandata habebant, ut Foxium ubicunque capi posset, vincirent, vinctumque ad urbem retraherent. Sed cognito illum discessisse, postquam etiam ad portum usq; insecuti, vix navem qua propere jumentis, simulat se oppido abire; sed eadem nocte clam reversus, pacisceitur cum naviculario, ut primas ventorum remissiones ad navigandum arripiat: Docet id res suas poscere, neque sua referre, quo continentis littore ejiceretur: pergeret modo, neque dubitaret affuturum pio operi Deum. Interim in Anglia fortuna Religioni tandem vicem reddiderat, magnisque momentis res Pontificiorum inclinare denuo cœperunt excessu Reginæ Mariæ, fœminæ dum suis moribus ageret egregiæ, tantoque Patre dignæ, sed dum pessimis nihil negat, id consecutæ, ut laude quam meruit careat, quod infamia careat, id insequentium temporum modestiæ debeatur : quibus moris est omnia Principum acta vel laudare, vel certe tolerare. Sensit statim orbis Christianus beneficium immutati in Anglia principatus. Deoneratæ exulibus circumvicinæ nationes de hostilium restitutione tanquam in sua fortuna gratulabantur. Domi vero, quid est quod ad salutem, vel solatium quisquam excogitare possit quo homines non prius frui quam sperare inciperent ? Qui domo profugerant revocati : qui carceribus abditi liberati : qui bona amiserant donati : qui dignitate exuti restituti sunt. Leges interim iniquæ abrogatæ : latæ salubres. Pax mentibus, conscientiæ libertas, concordia ordinibus, securitas bonis redierat, ita initia Regni temperante Elizabetha, ut quæ sub aliis Principibus, vix longa regnantium felicitas solet producere, ea cuncta sub hujus introitu, tanquam explicante exporrigenteq; se numine superius omnium voto expedirentur. Cujus præcellentissimæ, & post homines ; conditos fulgentissimæ fœminæ mentionem ex quacunq; occasione fecisse, flagitium Scriptoris fuerit, ut non major semper ex se præbita occasio videatur, cur ultra dicatur. Ea matre Anna Bolena genita est, quam Henricus Rex repudiata priore consorte fecundis nuptiis uxorem duxit. Ab ea in dotem principalis fortunæ Religionis amorem accepit. Adolevit moribus, ingenio, forma, quæ Principem non magis decerent quam facerent ; ut in eadem & absolutissimi operis exemplum Natura, & Fortuna fastigium summæ spei collocasse viderentur. Capaciorem tantæ fortunæ fecit, quod parere prius quam imperare didicerat ; id aliis fucere docta quod ipsi mox alii facerent ; expertaque est in privata vita odium fatale successoribus magnorum Imperiorum, major animo, quam ut satis reponderet. Ut Regnum attigit effulsere simul virtutes ; tamque omnia vitia infra se statim quam homines habuit. Itaque non illi animus ad studium corporis per mollitiem abjectus est. Rationes Regni publicas novisse, adjutores in partem curarum conquirere, Regni partes optimis ministeriis firmare, suorum ingenia callere, externorum Principum copias, consilia, conatus explorare, ea illi rudimenta novi Principatus fuerunt. Possent ista esse minus disturna nisi temperarentur. Nihil illa gravitate amœnius, nihil illa severitate placabilius, nihil illa frugalitate effusius unquam fuit. In iis tantum bonis modum non novit, quorum dignitas non ex contraintentium virtutum libramine, sed in ipsa celsissimarum actionum congerie spectatur. Sic Nobilitatem generis studio gloriæ, Religionem quamvis rectissimam studio sanctitatis, Formam corporis quamvis incomparabilem castitatis perpetuæ proposito cumulavit. Ut mores ad facta transtulit Deus summe quanta tum temporum felicitate fructi sumus ? Quid illa 44. annorum pace serenius, vel securius, vel opulentius intra se Anglia unquam vidit ? Nam bello neque quemquam sponte lacessivit, & bellandi justas causas potiores semper victoria habuit. Ad Hibernicum, dignitas, & recuperandæ Provinciæ pudor, ad Gallicum pietas, & miseratio vicini periculi ; ad Hispanienſe salus sua, & omnium causarum vim complexa necessitas rapiebat. In hoc bello nobis audivisse, & vidisse contigit quod in nullo alio forsan usu venit. Nam aliæ nationes, quamvis attrocissimis inter se odiis contenderint, certis tamen sedibus locisque dimicaverunt. Hoc bellum tam diffusum, tot in locis, tantisque animis gestum est, ut ubicunque Sol exurgeret, occideretve, ibi Anglorum, Hispanorumque acies, per omnia maria, portusque deprehenderet, de vita, de facultatibus, aut de dignitate decernentes. Tum primum mare istud nostrorum Imperio fuetum, externarum navium proris inalbuit. Numerum, speciemq; navigiorum, copiarum terrestrium, navalium q; vim ; munitionis, machinarum, telorum, tormentorum, commeatusq; reliqui modum, quibus illa classis constabat, quam Philippus Secundus Hispaniæ Rex, extinguendi hujus nominis causa, misit Anno sal. hum. M. D. L. XXXVIII. vix justi operis volumen reciperet. Sufficerit dixisse, nullum ullo pian maritimum apparatum ab quoquam Regum, Populorumq; potentiſſimorum factum comparandum huic ex omni antiquitatis delectu monstrari posse. Hanc tamen classem tam immanem, tam formidabilem fiducia sui, & præsumpta victoriæ spe tumentem, fortuna invictissimi Principis momento temporis disjecit. Concurrere Classes numero, viribusq; impares. Sed genus pugnæ adversum Hispanis fecit, quòd nostræ naves minores & humiliore rostro ædificatæ facilius in ventum circumagi atq; eluctari poterant : quo facto promptum illis fuit Hispanas tardiores, & ad insequendum inhabiles, vel vedendo illudere, vel in patentes alveos pugnando certiori ictu vulnerare. Accedebat quòd nostri Duces omnis maritimi officii peritia & notitia æstuum Hispanos longè antecedebant. Contra Hispani edocti superiorum dierum usu, se nisi stabili pugna nostros sustinere non posse, jactis ante Caletum anchoris, ibi & auxilia Flandrorum expectabant, & præstantia tormentorum se defendebant. Id nobis rationem victoriæ primùm aperuit. Naves stupa, pice, sulphure, omnisq; generis arida materia infarcire incensaq; prono æstu in hostium classem impellebantur ; tantumq; consternationis ea res improvisa attulit, ut universæ naves sectis properè funibus, in fugam præcipitarentur. Qua in fuga pars navium flamma, pars fluctu hausta est, pars littoribus, scopulisve impacta, pars victibus, aut concursu fugientium lacera, in potestatem nostrorum venerunt. Validiores regredi non ausæ, per Scotiæ Orcadumq; extremam oram, & nisi gravitet fugientibus intentatum ullo seculo aequor, immenso marium, terrarumq; circuitu in Hispaniam tandem reverterunt. In tanto virtutum victoriarumq; cursu, proximum fuit invideri, ab invidia proximum odio, atq; insidiis peti, quæ, licet integerrima omnium Princeps, sic effugere nequivit, quin salus sua per omnem fere vitam infesta fuerit, in cujus vita omnium fere Europæ gentium salus fundata est. Quo magis subit animum mirari, quæ ista præclara adversariorum sariorum disciplina sit, pietas quam obtendunt cura virtutes ipsas infectantium ? Quod in nulla non dicam Ethnica sed ne barbara natione usu venit, ut qui modo numen esse scirent virtutem, quæ certe Deo proxima est, vel in hostibus ulciscendam putarent : nisi nobis Religio Christiana ita omnia indulgeat, ut cum inimicis ignoscere præceptum sit, iis aut bonis esse non liceat, aut liceat non esse ignotis. Sed manifestum est alio fine in humanis rebus voluntatem divinam, alio cupiditates hominum versari. Ea Elizabetham ab inimicorum scelere atque injuria semper prohibuit, eòque perduxit Saturam jam annis, ut quam apud homines gloriam adepta est, eam illibatam cœlo inferret, fraterq; quoque in mortuam grassante invidia, cujus ultor omnis Posteritas est. Nunc ordo operi restituatur.

Foxius ubi in Anglia letas res, regnare Elizabetham, fidumque, & mansurum Religioni statum esse, ex amicorum literis edoctus est, fine ejus anni quo ista gerebantur in Patriam regreditur. Id tempus ad deliberandum sumpserat : ne si qua hominum inconstantia præsentis conditionis pertæsum esset, in casum rursus se dare cogeretur. Sed & tum quoq; familiam trahebat duobus liberis auctus, ut in itineris sumptum necesse esset pecuniam ab domo afferri interim expectari. Ibi cognovit, sinistros de se Sermones jactos esse, tanquam per superbiam tardavisset, in eoq; compendium sibi ad honorem quæsivisset, tanquàm debitum si accivetur. Id intelligebat eorum artificio fieri, qui cum ipsi omni vi ad honores contenderent Foxium ut dignum, & si vellet antecessurum metuebant. Neq; ille purgare se tanto crimine, quod iniquitate sua casurum erat, operæpretium sibi esse duxit : Sed juxta injuriarum atq; juris sui negligens se totum in studia abdidit. Quod corporibus nostris contingit, ut ea firmiore valetudine utantur quæ intra modum cibantur excerenturve, quam quæ excedunt, id animis quoq; opinor nostris contingere, ut difficillimè quid in sanitate officiorum perseverare possit, qui si fortuna sui modum non fecit, ipse sibi non fecerit ; contra, qui fortunam per modestiam habuere, ii habitiores & vegetiores ad egregia studia semper fuerint. Nam Foxio integrum fuit quàcunq; animus inclinavit ea emergere, multa ingenii fama & præclaris, uti dictum est, amicitiis fultus. Ille non opes neque potentiam, felicium hominum vota, affectavit : sed cum pari cum cæteris virtute esset, conscientiam penes se, præmia penes alios esse libenter tulit. Quod ego factum neque inter laudes ejus prorsus recipio, neque tamen arguo quod multi fecerunt. Concedatur sane bonis viris, ut virtus quemlibet fortunæ locum legat, ubi eniteat : aut si finibus ea arctanda sit, quin ad eos convertere, qui propter spem aliquam boni esse volunt : nam qui gratuitò tales sunt, si eorum gloria non obruare, numerum non reformides. Commemoraturus sum vitam continuam fructibus, non iis quibus legentium sensus hauriuntur, sed solidis veriſque. Non hic bellorum aut pacis illustria facinora narrantur, aut si quæ alia Scriptorum spatia sunt, per quæ captivas hominum aures ducunt. Nobis vita sine strepitu acta, intus, foriſque pudor, continentia, charitas, rerum humanarum contemptus, divinarum ardor, indefessa studia, cuncta in exemplum, vel utilitatem proximi composita dicenda sunt. Demonstratum paulo ante est, Foxium dum Basilææ esset Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ scribendæ mentem adjecisse ; quod ultimam manum non imposuerat causam fuisse, quo testatius aliquando scribere posset. Id opus Pontificiorum animos varie anxit. Frustra enim tantum ab se effusum sanguinis, frustra susceptam tantæ crudelitatis conscientiam videbant, si horum omnium reddenda posteris ratio esset. Et opus ipsum ex hominum manibus tolli non posse intelligebant. Relinquebatur si salstitatis coargui, & confictis ad id calumniis extenuari fides ejus, atque authoritas posset. Quibus amoliendis, depellendisque ab se dum Foxius annititur, evitari non potuit, quin ex tot rerum, testimoniorumq; novo aggestu, legitimum Historiæ limitem multum excederet. Indeque æstimetur diligentia nostri scriptoris, qua non modo tot res ceu materiem operis sui, ex omni temporum, locorumque distantia comportaverit, & utriusque fori acta, tabulasque rerum judicatarum per omnes Regni Jurisdictiones congesserit, sed etiam eas ipsas res partim vetustate tanquam rubigine adrosas, partim eorum qui scripserunt odio vel assentatione depravatas, partim in informi truncaque veterum scriptura latentes, ipse solus, distractissimo conatus genere, primum eruerit, examinarit, ab situ vindicarit, deinde in convenientem structuram redegerit. Undeceimo quam scribi cœptum est anno finitum opus fuisse ex commentariis authoris reperio, ut credibile sit vicinum opus, cujus tam prolixa fuerat fuit. Quo tamen tempore, neq; ipse Amanuensis unquam opera ad scribendum, neq; servi ad alia vitæ ministeria usus est. Tanto plus in se efficacis subsidii industria habet uni tantum rei inserviens, & in se unam collecta, quam extra se licet multis adminiculantibus, si modo ipse in plura dividerit.

Sæpe apud animum meum instituti inquirere, ex duobus ærumnæ generibus, quæ maxime subire homines dignitatis suæ esse arbitrantur, quodnam usu gravius, atq; asperius reperiatur, militiæne, an studiorum. Pro utroq; multa facere videntur, sed non utraq; juxta in speciem valida. Nam bellandi incommodo non modo iis qui ea præsentur, sed audientibus etiam gravia, ut liberum narrandi egressum, ita pronum in ipsius sensus æstimatione patrocinium habent. Contra meditandi labor, & exercitatio tantummodo in principiorum vitæ tacitis suffragiis vim suam retinet, quorum judex intellectus est. Ita quæstio ad animum corpusq; transfertur, ut ex his duobus, cujus mala alterius malis magnitudine præponderant, id potiorem causam habere existimetur. Mihi neq; definiendæ tantæ litis arbitrium adsumitur, neq; tamen reticebo quid sapientes viros de ea re sensisse intelligo. Id ita se habet. Quæ enim corpori contingunt, etsi ea sæva & acerba vehementer esse possint, eorum tamen extremum semper consuevisse esse, vel defatigationem, vel dolorem, vel denig; mortem, quorum illa altera ad tempus sunt, & remediis eadem ; hanc viri fortes etiam contemnere solent. Jam animus ubi intenditur, etsi paria his genere mala infert, non tamen ultimum illud habet, ut homo defatigetur, vel doleat, sed potius illud quod cum eorum unde homo exisit ruina conjungitur. In his enim malis fieri, ut neq; vacationibus, remissionibusq; laborum fatigatus denuo instauretur, neq; ex copia commodi incommodum arceatur. Ita concludunt, quanto pernicioſius esse, appetentiam somni, cibique, quam somnum ipsum, cibumve auferri, & ex tabe, quam ex vulnere decumbere, tanto plus miseriarum in hoc sobrio, quam in illo luculento militæ genere inesse : in altero nimirum plus voluptatis, in altero plus hominis homini ademptum esse.

Confirmavit

Confirmavit rem ita esse Foxius, qui cum per tot annos nullum omnino tempus ab cogitationibus scribendi vacuum feciſſet, plurimumque sibi in iis quæ naturæ debentur vel denegaviſſet, vel intempeſtive conceſſiſſet, eo ſe tandem redegerat, ut conſumpto quod corpori inerat naturaliter floridi, ſuccilentique, non ab amicis, non ab propinquis noſci potuerit. Hoc enim initio cæpit primum in eam corporis maciem areſcere, qua multi eum fuiſſe viderunt: neque rediit unquam priſtini vultus decor, aut ſtos, ſed manentibus noxæ cauſis, cum nullo modo dimittendam ſibi conſuetudinem ſuam, aut laxandum ab curis animum putaret, etiam indicium noxæ permanſit. Multus igitur debinc Foxius in ore hominum fuit Hiſtorici nomine: Nam reliqua quæ animum ejus incolebant bona, ut minus nota in vulgus, ita notorum magnitudine obterebantur. Mox aliis quoq; artibus cæpit clarescere: neq; modo literis bonus videri, ſed & officiis commodus, & ad juvandum alios non minus arte, quam naturali quadam anxietate comparatus. Sed inſtituta induſtriæ ejus per modum Diariorum componere vetat modeſtia operis: per genera noſci non indecens erit, ut ille conſolando, conſilio, manu infinitorum hominum, aut inopiam ſublevarit, aut deſideria implerit. Hinc nullius domus conſulentium cætibus ; frequentior ea tempeſtate quam Foxii *fuit. Adiere eum cives, pariter atq; Advenæ ; illuſtres, atq; plebei ; etiam infimæ conditionis homines. Una fere omnibus adeundi cauſa ; conſcientia vulnera: His medela quærebatur. Tandem ægri quoq; corpore portari cæpti. Id fieri vetuit ut rumoribus occurreret: nam quia duci, etiam ſanari dicebantur. Cum autem per talia officia domi diem eximeret, tum foris etiam frequentiſſime prædicando, adeundoq; eos ab quibus ipſe adiri non poterat, & quod humanitatis ſuæ erat implevit, & quod paſtoris munus erat non intermiſit. Reliquum tempus quod ſibi amicorum vel digreſſus, vel pudor fecit, non amenitati, aut ſommo, ſed vel orationi, vel ſtudiis addixit, & utriſque ſecretum adhibuit loci, vel noctis, niſi qua crumpentes pectore gemitus ex propinquo audiſti orantis impetum prodebant: Nam nocturnæ curæ finem nemo unquam ; lux nova ſæpè deprehendit. Cum hæc ita ſint, ſcio tamen futurum, ut multi hæc à me tanquam nimis aridè decurſa reprehendant, poſtulentq; res ipſas, teſtes officiorum produci, aut ſaltem in unoquoq; genere ſingulare aliquod factum proferri quo fides de reliquis ſecurior ſit. Id vero ne facere poſſem multis prohibeor. Primum quod conſcientiæ depoſita efferri in vulgus vel ipſa humanitatis ratio vetat: peſſimoq; exemplo fecerit, qui arcana domuum, neceſſariorum controverſias, clandeſtinos hominum lapſus, cujuſque quemq; in vita vel pudet, vel pœnitet, non omni modo celanda potius, quam enarranda exiſtimet. Deinde quod hæc ipſæ res, quæ ſecretiſſimis colloquiis tranſigi conſueverunt ad noſtram cognitionem pervenire nullo pacto potuerunt, aut ſiquæ ſuſpitionibus emanarunt, unumq; aut alterum tale exemplum prodatur, at quota id pars diſſolvendæ fidei fuerit? Jam ultimum illud induſtriæne, an ingenii dicam argumentum profuratur? Hunc virum qui ſe adeo totum amicorum uſibus condonaſſet, ut nihil ſibi ad eam curam reliqui faceret, ſic tamen interim ſcripſiſſe tanquam nihil aliud facere videretur. Libros quos ſcripſit eorum cauſa quibus id gratum erit adjungere hoc loco viſum eſt: Ii ſic circumferuntur: Comœdiarum lib. 2. Syllogiſticon. Admonitio ad Parliamentum. Perventum jam eſt ad id, unde ſimul in totam reliquam Foxii vitam proſpectus datur. Id vero legentibus (opinor) pergratum accidere debet, perinde atq; in itinere hominibus ſuſvenire videmus, ut qui ſe multum locis aſperè, ſaltuoſiſq; fatigaverint, ii poſtquam campos, & planitiem aperuerint, ipſa variantis ſoli ſpecie refici, & tanquam renovari videantur. In hoc veluti tractu morum occurrit primum quod facile primum in virtutibus Foxii fuit: Omnium ſcilicet rerum quæ hominibus maxime in pretio ſunt, voluptatumq; imprimis deliberata contemptio. Quod illi ſive ab Natura ingenitum, ſive ab diſciplina hauſtum, ſive divinitùs datum, neceſſe fuit, ut magnam ei facultatem afferret, præclare quicquid vellet faciendi: cum nihil ſit quod animum per ſe rectæ iturum in prava detorqueat quin id ab aliqua voluptatum tanquam inſidiatore, ſpeculatoreq; itineris noſtri proficiſcatur. Cum hoc tamen hoſte rem ſic habuit Foxius, ut qui non fuga aut latebra incolumis eſſe vellet ; ſed qui potiſſimum cuperet uſu congrediendi, & notitia certaminum, tum vobur ſibi augeri, tum aliis exemplum reſiſtendi dari: ſolituſq; eſt dicere, nihil eos magnum facere, qui res, & negotia eo ſine deſererent, ne capi ſe, aut deliniri ab iis paterentur: Res enim ipſas natura innocentes eſſe: nocere tum incipere, cum nimium æſtimentur, cupiunturq; quam cupiditatem qui irrumpentem, inferentemq; ſe propellere poſſet, eum uberito temperantem eſſe ; qui in nullo unquam periculo fuerit, cum non tam propria virtute quam occaſionis defectu bonum videri. Itaq; neque ille illuſtres amicitias unquam recuſavit: non quo ſibi honori eſſent, ſed quod in iis magnum uſum commendationis ſuæ, quoties aliquem ab ſe adjutum vellet fore intellexit. Pecunias ab divitibus oblatas accepit, ſed quas in pauperes refunderet. Etiam eonvivia amicorum multoties celebravit: non animi cauſa, cum cibi pareiſſimus eſſet: Interveſſe voluit cum urbanitatis cauſa, tum ne quis exiſtimaret ſe luctam, & certamen voluptarii congreſſus reformidare, vel refugere, aut adverſus epularem laſciviam abſentiæ, quam moderationis ſuæ præſidio munitiorem ſibi videri. Breviter dicam: In his rebus ad quas voluptas conſequitur Foxium ſic eſſe verſatum, ut conſtet neminem eorum qui una ſemper adſuimus meminiſſe poſſe ejus vel vocis, vel factì, quo ille, vel leviſſimam cupiditatem prodiderit: adeoque non honoris, non pecuniæ, non laudis, aut cujuſpiam externi boni aut avidum, aut appetentem fuiſſe. ut ne rei quidem familiaris curam intrare animum ejus ullo tempore, nedum vinci eum aut abduci domeſticis cogitationibus patueret. Quam ego ejus ſive ſecuritatem, ſive, ut alii appellarunt, in propriis fortunis ſocordiam, unde profecta ſit, alio loco demonſtrabo.

Interim, dum mecum cauſas conſidero, propter quas ille vir reliquia omnia tantopere ſpernenda cenſeret, cum præſertim id neque ab parva ambitione, multoque minùs ab ſomno, aut torpore animi profectum exiſtimari poſſit ; compertum habeo: unum amorem divinum fuiſſe, quo perfuſus, atque impletus animus ejus, non locum non affectum ad reliquas voluptates relinqueret, ultroq; ipſe ſe ſeculo tanquam tanquam abrumperet, alioqui ſeculi non incapacem. In hanc ille curam abſorptus, tanquam qui ingentis gazæ theſaurum reperiſſet, ac zelo retinendi quæ repererat hunc unum oculis, atq; animo obſervare, nihil præter hunc in ſpe, atq; expectatione habere, hanc metam omnium votorum cupiditatumq; facere inſtituerat. Quo factò id illi contigit, quod in tali re contingere neceſſe fuit, ut qui animum ejus ſic penitus deſixum in Deo contuebantur, multaq; eum & facere, & loqui quæ communis probitatis opinionem egrederentur, non illum afflatus Divini expertem eſſe crederent, neq; jam ut pio honorem, ſed ut cæleſti viro venerationem, vitio hominum ad ſponte culta inſanientium attribuerent. Non ſubtraham quicquam juſtæ fidei, neq; ſublandiar famæ. Multa per occaſionem conſolandi, aut terrendi monuit Foxius, non vano exitu. In multis etiam forsiſſe falſus eſt: Demonſtratum antea eſt, quæ conſtantia Sermonis Baſilææ dum eſſet apud extorres Anglos, de reditu ipſorum pronunciavit. Circumfertur illud de Anna Hennagia, lectiſſima, nobiliſſimaq; fœmina reſponſum ejus celebre. Decumbebat ea febre rapidiſſima, jamque eo malum creverat, ut medici exitiale eſſe pronunciarent. Vocatus ad ſuprema ejus Foxius, cujus ad animæ regimen conſilio, & fide plurimum utebatur. Poſtquam quæ viſa ſunt ad conſolationem ægræ expoſuiſſet, peraſtaque; cujus cauſa veneret re Divina? Tu inquit recte, atq; ex officio feciſti, quæ te in omnem exitum compoſueris: ſed ſcito, me interruncio, te ex hoc morbo minime eſſe interviturum. Inter aſtantes forte tum erat genere Hennagiæ Moyleus Finchius, eques ampliſſimus atq; clariſſimus hodie vivens. Is dicti novitate permotus, ſive ſtudio plura eliciendi, digreſſum paululum ab turba Foxium filò jurgio adoritur: Mirari ſe dicens, qua mente feciſſet, ut contra quam res, & periti artis judicabant, imperitus ipſe, de ægritudinis ſine ſtatuendum putaret, eoq; facto mulierem, ſexu ipſo mobilem, adhuc tamen interritam, ad impatientiam moriendi, ſpe, atq; expectatione vitæ converteret: ſi inter vivos referri ſocrus ſua poſſet, nullius latitiæ juſtiores eſſe cauſas quam ſuæ ; ſin moriendum illi ſit, nulli minus conveniſſe, id diſſimulare, quam ei qui in animum conſuleret. Vehementer igitur ſe pro amicitia vereri, ne ille magnam partem opinionis, quam de fide, atq; modeſtia ejus homines habebant eo intempeſtivo dicto deperdidiſſet. Ad quæ renidens Foxius reſpondit: per ſe non ſiare quo minus quiſq; quod ei collibitum eſſet, de ſe ſentiret: ſed de ægra ſic viſum Deo, ut eo morbo non extingueretur: idq; ſe demandato dicere. Convaluit fœmina, neq; mendacio locus eſt, viventibus etiamnum qui poſſent arguere. Simile huic erat illud de Maria Honivoda, illuſtri imprimis matrona, neq; minus fidum. Ea viginti jam prope annos tabe melancholica laboraverat, neq; contra vim terrimi morbi ſatis in quoquam conſilii, animive ſupereſſe videbatur ; quanquam adhibitis melioribus, quiq; aliquam præ cæteris vel artis, vel facundiæ commendationem habebant. Placuit tandem Foxium quoq; acciri. Qui una ierant retulerunt ſe mœſtiorem illa, afflictioremque domum nunquam introiviſſe. Aſſidebant quotidie per officium ægræ familiares, propinqui, liberi, ſervi, pars ſedilibus affixa, pars humi ſuſa, non ſtentes, gementeſque, quod vulgo fit ; ſed conſumptis lacrymis, contumaci ſilentio: ſub ſpecie humana tot ſimulachra mœrentium diceres ; itaque non aſſurgere venientibus, non interrogati reſpondere, tanquam id quoque luctum deceret: Ipſa ægra, projecta ſpe vitæ jacebat in lectulo, inter denſa ſuſpiria, obſcurum quid pectore expromens, cujus ſumma erat, quod exoluſ ſe cuperet. Cum tantum egrorum præ manibus Foxius haberet, neque contra violentiſſimum doloris renixum quicquam fruſtra tentari placeret ; ne rationem quoque habere videretur qui ratione vicit non eſſent, reliqua omnia demulcendi doloris remedia dimiſit: ſi quid ad ſanandas eorum mentes pertinebat, id precibus diligenter immiſcuit. Ita conſuetudine paucorum dierum effecit, ut qui humana ope ſanari ſe poſſe diffiderent ultro ſanescere viderentur: Cum tandem charior factus pronunciaret coram plurimis, futurum, non modo, ut ægra ex ea tabe convaleſceret, ſed ut quam exteniſſimam in ſenectam vita ejus protolleretur: Quo Sermone audito, ægra paululùm excitata, & Foxium *acriter intuita: Qua eadem inquit ratione, ſe ego vitrum hoc in parietem adegero, confidam fore, ut non frangatur: Tenebat autem in manu ciathum vitreum, ex quo biberat, projecitque: neque vas caſu impactum primo in ciſtellam lecto attiguam, & poſtea ſolo illapſum, ulla ex parte commimutum eſt. Acceſſitque omini fides: Reſtituta enim valetudini paulò poſt mulier, tum ſexagenaria, duravit in exemplum rariſſime in ſobole ſalicitatis, qua ante nonageſimum ætatis ſuæ annum (nam diutius vixit) ſexageſimum ſupra trecenteſimum nepotem, abnepotemve numeravit, ex liberis quos genuerat .

ter, in eaque re fuarum ipse virium modum egressus est: sed neque quod ad dissipationem domus suæ liberalitas ejus unquam progressa est, ullum dignum authorem habeo: neq; convenit, qua ipse aliorum liberalitate adjutus est, qui pecuniam illi Eleemosinæ nomine copiosissime subministrabant, illum ad tam extraordinaria subsidia dilapsum. Quas omnes virtutes tanquam vallo clausit insignis vitæ modestia, atque integritas, ut nihil alienum in mores ingredi, nihil foras in facta prodire posset, misi summa diligentia excussum, examinatumque an deceret. Cujus etiam objectu, si quid intus, per humanæ imbecillitatis sortem, vacillare contingeret; ne tamen id in magnum morum detrimentum abiret providebatur, sublato undiq; corruptelarum omnis generis commercio, contra quas perpetuis stationibus, atq; custodiis pudor peccandi & decoris sui cura excubabant. Interim tamen non defunt qui Foxium summe in se iniquitatis incusent: id autem quale sit, quoniam ad plures ea injuria pertinere videtur altius investigabimus.

Foxius in ea parte Historiæ, qua luctuosum illud quinquennii Reginæ Mariæ incendium describit, multos nominaverat, non authores modo cladium, sed etiam ministros, adjutoresque; inter quos etiam aliquos illustri loco viros. Id horum posteri Foxium injuste fecisse queruntur: neq; debuisse necessitatem illam fatalem temporum, modestiam parendi, aut imposita publice ministeria, aut ipsis, aut posteris ipsorum ignominiæ esse. Quibus tametsi justissime respondetur eandem quam ipsi pro majorum facto afferunt necessitatis excusationem, pro Foxio quoq; valere debere; aliter enim calumniæ locum relinqui, si ministri non ederentur: his tamen ego longe aliter quam pro jure satisfactum velim: Cupere enim, ut quod factum sit, id ita fieri omnino necesse non fuisset: petere etiam, ne quod fortuna lesorum factum est, id animo ledendi factum arbitrentur: monere tamen interim, ne dolorem suum cum eorum iracundia misere velint, qui Foxio longe alia de causa succenseant, & sub personarum invidia aliam rem proscindunt. Duplex enim genus animadvertas eorum, qui nomine posterorum se lesos ferunt: altorum natura: factione alterum. Illis uti dixi humanitatis fructus debetur, atq; conceditur: irati sint, sed interim cives, atq; in officio sint: Neque ego cujuspiam boni civis, quamvis injustum dolorem, ita contemnerem, ut non potius quam ille de fide, ego de jure meo decederem: Cum his alteris longe alia res est: quibus nimirum contigit, patriæ prius iratis, quam Foxio, illamq; primam, & veram causam odii habere, hunc non nisi patriæ causa odisse. Quibus ego non modo satisfactionis ullam, sed ne quod hostibus conceditur, vel expostulationis gratiam deberi existimo. Sustulerunt ipsi fidem commercii, spem reconciliationis; societatis, humanitatis, fœdera omnia diremerunt. Quid enim eum vel pro sano, vel pro homine posthæ facturum sperem, qui patriæ charitatem potuit deponere? Ea una sic omnium officiorum vim, atque jus in se trahit, ut nullum gravius judicium sit, quo quisq; animo in Deum affectus sit, quam quanta in patriam charitate exciterit. At patria ipsa desciit. Primum id in controversia est, desciverint, & quantum desciverit: extra controversiam est, debere eos omnem suum dolorem patriæ dimittere. Deinde quam duri illud oris est, cujus nimirum litis cognitionem solus Deus potest suscipere, ejus litis litigatorum, judicem se facere, neq; modo eam quæ inter homines gravissima est authoritatem non sequi, sed neq; vel patriæ provocandi, neq; ipsi Deo spacium determinandi velle concedere; sed omnia sædis, proterviisque factis ante capere, tanquam vitæ causa, & potius hostibus scelus suum commodare, quam optimæ patriæ præstare officium? ut si contingeret prælariissimam hanc patriam (quod tamen humana conditio facile recipit) contra Deum ulla in parte delinquere: at pernicioissima exempla perfidiæ monstraverint, si quotusquisq; animum perdentæ patriæ sumpsit, is excusatione patrii delicti non modo liberasse se scelere, sed id quod juris sui est feciisse videatur. Quæ eo pluribus quoniam intelligo in nostris etiam multos esse, qui reprehendendum Pontificiis de maledictis in Foxium censent: Quibus ut paucis obsequar. Primum quid illud maledicti est quod jaciunt? Mendacem scriptorem esse: Igitur mendacium est Rogerium, Cranmerum, Hoperum, Ridleyum, Latimerum, alios q; ejusdem porticus sanctissimos atq; innocentissimos viros Religionis causa esse exustos. Sin illa, vel ipsorum confessione, vera sunt, quænam tandem illa sint quorum vitio totum reliquum opus in mendacii infamiam abierit, quod suis perfuadent? Nonnulla affirmunt in nominibus, in temporibus, in numeris errata; quæ partim in sequentibus editionibus retractata sunt, partim ab ipso authore ita defensa, ut eo vivo nemo amplius oblatraret. Nonnulla etiam afferunt in superioris seculi Historia ab Historicis ipsis contradicta, quod facilimum fuit, in tanta discordantium Authorum pugna, ut quemcunque Authorem secutus sit in eundem scopulum impingeres. Ejusmodi tamen omnia afferunt, quæ neque si vera, nobis valde curæ sint, neque illis si falsa. Demus tamen illis aliquid, si placet; simus liberales in Foxii jure: Si ego ista falsa quæ faciunt de Historia penitus excerpsero, pelliceanturne mihi passures se reliquum opus in suorum manibus libere versari? Non magis ferant conditionem quam pacem. Quid his hominibus faciat, qui neque datis neque negatis acquiescunt? Jam illud quoque quantæ proteruiæ est, exigere ab ullo Scriptore, ut in cursu longi operis, dum innumerabiles res unius homines labore persequitur, nusquam vel hallucinetur? ut si Cæsarem contingat, quo in loco Britanniam nostram describit, de circuitu, vel trajectu insularum paucis milliaribus dissentire ab eo quod hodierna dimensio reperit, idcirco absolutissimus Scriptor mendacii postuletur. Scripsit ille bella, expeditiones q; suas, quod institutum operis fuit, ea fide qua debuit: in reliquis secutus est famam; credidit renunciantibus; noluit in re non nimis necessaria esse accuratus. Atq; hæc ex nostrorum potius hominum opinione, quam quod id faciendum putavi responsum est. Quod si illi ipsi respondendum sibi postulent, alia cum illis conditione agam. Redeant ad obsequium, Satisfaciant patriæ, Discedant ab hostibus: cum nullum publicum crimen illis adhæreat, sum privatas offensiones prosequantur. Sin perseverare adhuc in studio volunt, deinde post quam omnem spem, famamq; consumpserint, maledictis terrere incipiant; næ ego facile concedam, ut quem anteactæ vitæ fructum ceperint, eam orationis quoq; laudem habeant: ita utrumq; decus obtineant, ut neq; maleficio, neq; convitiis quisquam cum iis possit contendere. Si ista durior conditio videatur: Æquent saltem dignitatem inviso operis. Sint Authores pari fama: Honestius certamen fuerit, si quanto suo compendio vicerint, tanto suo detrimento vinci possint. Quodsi per libellos, & furtivas declamationes obtrectando æterno operi, eo pacto nomen suum famæ studeant inserere, neque virorum, sed mulierculorum animis per convitia adrepant, quis ita demens est, ut quæ scripta contemnendo perire statim faciat, ea oppugnando faciat diuturniora?

Jam

Jam porrò, ut ipsi intelligant quantum Foxio ad dignitatem potius, quam ad contumeliam illa eorum virulentia contulerit, panca contrà de æquitate ejus erga ipsos dicam. Epistolas ejus proferre possum, quibus persuadet Proceribus, iisque qui tum summam in regno authoritatem habebant, ne Ed. Campianum, reliquosque ejus conjurationis socios capitis condemnari permitterent, neve invesregascere in Regno consuetudinem illam sinerent, ut Pontificii morte potius, quam aliquo alio supplicii genere plectrentur. Et ne videretur ipsud ex naturæ suæ tantum bonitate, & non judicio animi deceret, multis rationibus apud eos probare contendit, quantum illud ad diminutionem causæ suæ pertinebat, si in constituendis suppliciis judicium potius adversariorum, quam suam clementiam sequerentur. Multo enim magis debere eos conniti, ut quos justitia vicissent, eos mansuetudine quoque & misericordia vincerent. Hæcque sæpius inculcabat, etiam ad offensionis periculum ausus deprecari; cum illi contra ostenderent: Majestatis esse rem, non controversiæ. Verti in eo exemplo vitam Principis, publicam libertatem, possessionem Regni: debere subditos periculo suo moneri, ne patrias facultates prodigere condiscant: eam Regni rationem esse, ut si sua bona intra se servare consenserit, nihil illo sublimius aut securius esse possit: quantum enim ab ea felicitate defecerit, id nostrorum hominum transfugiis, & conjurationibus esse decussum. Perstitit tamen in sententia Foxius, & cum nihil precibus proficeret, dolorem tamen suum multo gemitu testari solitus est, quoties quempiam ex iis morte affectum esse audiebat. Visa æquitate ejus in homines non alienum fuerit adjungere quid Foxius in universum de Romana Ecclesia, ejusque Pontifice senserit, quatenus id ex ejus sermonibus elici potuit, cum jam maturus annis judicium suum multo rerum usu roborasset. Ejus sententiæ capita hæc sunt.

Romanæ Ecclesiæ primam, antiquissimamque inter Christianos dignitatem semper fuisse: Eam ei dignitatem opinionemque multis postea seculis manssse; authoritatem paulatim accrevisse, non consensu, vel jure, sed inclinatione, & consuetudine quadam serendi, ut quos multum aliis præstare contingit, ii plurimum quoque apud eosdem valere, iisque tandem imperare incipiant: præcipua autem tum dignitate, tum authoritate apud hæc Occidentis Regna valuisse; quorum ut unumquodque Religionem Christianam maxime appetebat, ita in eo studio Romanorum potissimùm pietate & labore sublevabantur: unde neque male earundem Ecclesiarum matrem dici meruisse: Occasionem tanto incremento dedisse urbem Romam veteri gloria, & fato quodam imperandi monstratam terris; quæ etiam cum ipsa omni tempestate ingentis animi, atq; virtutis viris abundarit, tum frequentia, & opibus, & opportunitate loci, & quod Imperatorum occulis subjecta erat, facile contulerit, ut initio Christiani neque Congregari usquam facilius, neq; sustentari copiosius, neque latere tutius, neq; cum opus esset mori constantius reperirentur: unde illis admirationem, & gloriam in posteros accessisse. Sed initia Ecclesiæ rectissimis potius disciplinis, & sanctitate spectata hominum, quam divitiis floruisse. Nihil in Ecclesiasticorum moribus dissolutum, nihil fastus, ambitionisve. Pecuniam, servos, villam, gemmas ignota ipsis bona. Omnia vel pudore, vel carendo coercita: ut non aliud quam Romæ Christianæ fidei domicilium esse videretur: Atq; hæc quo magis finitima principiis essent, eo magis curæ fuisse: recessu paulatim diffluere, & corrumpi cæpisse, more fluminum, quæ prope fontem minora sed limpidiora, quanto longius progrediuntur, tanto conspectiore alveo, sed turbidioribus aquis fluunt, donec recepto tandem mari, insalubres quoq; ea reddantur, & cum nullo in loco momenta primi discriminis deprehendas, extremorum tamen comparatione diversissimas esse statim perspicias. Ita enim Ecclesiæ usu venisse, ut postquam traduxis ad fidem Christianam nationibus, ex dignitate Imperii visum esset sacerdotes, quod in veteri Religione consueverant, non inopem, sed liberalem vitam ducere, ejusque causa multa ab Imperatoribus tum in ornamentum, tum in præmium Ecclesiasticis concederentur, eo initio Sacerdotes pecuniam primo adamare cæperint, tum paulatim ex copia lascivire, & laborem aspernari, ex hoc (ut prioribus vitiis semper, addit, pejor Posteritas) potentiam cupere, cujus potitos, & Imperatorum munere principatum Ecclesiæ adeptos, non prius destitisse, quam dejectis quorum beneficio creverant Imperatoribus, & Imperii jura invaderent, & utrumq; humani generis regimen expostularent: Interim Religionis quam majores ipsis tradiderant normam omittere; Scripturas neq; multum ipsi scrutari, neq; aliis ut id facerent permittere; cultumq; divinum non in Obedientiam fidei, sed in externis devotionibus, & magnificentia sacrorum habere.

Quibus ex rebus factum esse, ut Ecclesia Romana, ut cuncta alia immoderata imperia, non solum de gradu, & fastigio dignitatis cecidorit, sed & vim ipsam, statumq; Ecclesiæ in seipsa labefactarit: neq; id mirum videri debere, si ut nulla corpora contingit lethalius ægrotare, quam quæ sunt sanissima, ita contigerit principi Ecclesiæ, ut nihil medium ei conveniret, quin aut in absolutissima sanitate maneret, aut in pernicioissimum hostem evaderet; unde etiam Papam Antichristum videri.

Utcunq; in tam manifesto negotio, debere tamen utramque partem non nimium Argumentis fiduciæ suæ tribuere; neq; nimio studio impedire, si qua hominum æquitate, res ad sanitatem, atq; concordiam deduci possit. Non nostrarum fortasse virium fuisse, Romæ antiquum decus, & confirmatam in hominum mentibus Religionis opinionem eripere. Romanam Ecclesiam sua avaritia, ambitione, prævaricatione concidisse. Sed neminem unquam in delinquendo eo progressum, quo pœnitentia non penetravisset. Debere dari ut regressum ad pœnitendum, ita modus, & spatia pœnitendi: fortasse etiam authorem disciplicisse quod Germanus, aut Gallus, & non è natione sua Italus erratorum admonuisset. Exoriri aliquando inter ipsos posse, cujus authoritate non pudeat ad sanitatem reverti, jacturamque potentiæ suæ pacì terrarum condonare: Id modo quantulumcumq; spei relinqui ita fore, quod in Capitibus ipsis fidei non ultra peccaverint quam quod ea non nimium nosci patiantur. Conditiones concordiæ esse, Si Pontifex Rom. omnes eas opiniones velit deserere, ex quibus pecunia sit: nihil egrius populo persuaderi, quam Christum servatorem Ecclesiæ suæ, pecuniæ artes, & mundinationem sacrorum præcepisse. Si abrenunciet seculo, neque sibi aut juris, aut negotii quicquam in alienis Regnis esse existimet. Si contra adversarii ejus non recusent aliquem esse, qui in re Religionis principem consilijs & administrationis locum inter Christianos obtineat: eam rem postquam metus abfuerit, multas secum utilitates afferre: neque contra Ecclesiam Rom. quin ea præseratur, debere magis valere, quod aliquando ceciderit, quam pro ea facere, quod prima floruerit. Hæc autem quo rectius fiant Concilio Christianorum permitti debere, cujus ea æquitas sit, ut neq; ex loco in quem conveniatur, neq; ex numero suffragiorum, cujuspiam unius potentia, aut gratia quicquam sibi in reliquorum injuria possit pollicari.

Inte-

Interim dum hæc fiant pertinere multum ad famam celeritatemq; componendi; sic hominum mentes deinceps informari, ut utring; de alteris melius & sperare & sentire incipiant: Præcipue autem debere homines ejus pertinaciæ oblivisci, qua utraq; pars, dum se solam Ecclesiam esse vendicat, excludit alteram: id enim non impium modo, sed & contumeliosum summe in Deum esse, existimare, eum sic mandata sua hominibus dedisse, ut obtemperantibus in perniciem vertantur: quod necessario futurum, si cum omnes homines idem sentire nolint, qui plus aliis intelligendo dissenserint, ab iis reliqui arceantur: An igitur solis intelligentibus, & magna rerum scientia præditis cælum servari? Ubi igitur fatuos seculi futuros, ubi pueros, quos Christus sibi se posse fuit? quanto, rectius Deum coli, exequendo ea quæ manifesta sunt, quam interpretando quæ sunt ambigua? quanto, probabilius esse tantam videri Dei misericordiam, ut convenientibus de summa obsequendi nihil aliud fraudi esse possit? eam vim obedientiæ esse, ut ea sola omnes inæqualitates apud Deum exæquet: quod si par omnium ratio non sit, sanè apud Deum longe potiores eos esse, qui modestius judicarint.

Ab inimicis ad amicitias Foxii transeo; inter quas dictum est, quanto semper studio ab Duce Norfolcio dilectus est, cujus & opibus vivi, & pensionibus mortui alebatur, quas nimirum ratas fecit liberalitas Filii ejus, Illustrissimi Comitis Suffolciensis, ad quem ii reditus pertinebant. Auxit fortunam ejus Wilhelmus Cecilius, Thesaurius Regni, vir omni oratione major, quem tanti Elizabethæ intererat, ministrum sibi habere, quanti Regni interest, Elizabetham habere Principem, certe q; dignissimus, qui in ea patria, & sua & posterorum fortuna floreret, quam is omnium florentissimam sapientia & consilio suo effecerat. Prætereo multos, quos fortasse contigit eundem in Foxii amicitia locum habuisse, neq; id mihi vitio verti debet, si omnium vel meminisse, vel notitiam consequi minus potuerim. Illud præterire non debeo, cujus etiam præcipue causa præfatos summos viros memorari volui; hos fuisse, ab quibus demonstratum est, pecunias Elemosinæ nomine Foxio largissime suppeditatas fuisse pauperibus dispensandas: Quod cum illi ita clam facerent, ut nec internunciis viderent, neq; in eo beneficii gratiam respicerent, cujus conscientiam sufficere sibi intelligebant; non tamen id mihi in Foxii Historia dissimulandum fuit, aut committendum, ut si illi tantæ liberalitatis fructum negligendum sibi existimarent, at non ab Foxio veritatem facti proditam esse quisquam argua, præsertim cum utrisque alundi ad laudem sit, ut illi fuit, hic non nisi fuit facti nosceatur.

Multa deniq; comitate inter amicos fuit. Id severitate gravitatisq; condimentum sibi indulserat. Rogatus quondam in Convivio, quondam afferri sibi ferculum juberet, unde prandium inciperet: respondit ultimum. Acceptaq; comiter vox est, tanquam lectiores dapes, quæ ultimo fere poni solent immisset; cum ille ad finem convivii & ad abeundi voluntatem adhuderet. Forte habuit in via obviam mulierem quandam, satis sibi cognitam. Ea prolato quem gestabant libro, cum dixisset. Vides quo profectura sum, nempe ad Concionem: respondit, At ut Sacer domum abi, hodie enim apud Deum nihil effecerit: & cum illa quereret, quando igitur ire me jubes; cum (inquit) nemini dixerit. Accidit in mensa sua, ut quidam de Leycestrio Comiti liberius obloqueretur: Id cum Foxius audivisset, statim pateram quandam, quam inunerat impleri vino, & afferri sibi jussit, qua allata, Hæc inquit patera mihi ab Leycestrio dono missa est: cohibuit q; hominis intemperantiam, neq; reprehendit. Ingratum hominem mari comparabat, quod cuncta ingesta voraret, neq; signum relinqueret. Adolescenti cuidam audaculo, qui multis astantibus, dixisset, se nihil in antiquorum lectione percipere, quod homines adeo mirarentur: Nihil inquit mirum est, nam si percipere miraveris. Infinita mihi hujus generis memorandi copia est: sed nolo formam operis excedere.

Cum autem per talia facta, atq; mores Foxius ætatem exegisset, plenus annorum, amicorumq; nondum exacto septuagesimo cursus sui anno excessit, nulla nota valetudine oppressus, sed multum ob senium. Præsensit tamen tempus exitus sui, neq; filios suos, quos ardentissime tamen dilexit, interesse supremis suis voluit: sed alterum acciri prorsus vetuit; alterum nudiustertius dici quo mortuus est ab se dimisit; & utrumq; revocavit cum vel festinantes parum in tempore adfuturos sciret: sive impares eos acerbissimo spectaculo fore credidit: sive animum suum turbari domesticis desideriis nolebat: Quod fratri meo mihiq; ominum miserrimum contigit, ut neque oculos componere, neque supremæ ejus mandata excipere, neque satiari ultimo ejus aspectu nobis liceret: quietiore fortasse animo deficientis momenta toleraviss mus, quam morientis exemplum in eo amisimus. Ad famam mortui indoluit civitas, clatumque permodico fumere nigenti multitudinis suæ concursu honoravit: neque alia lugentium specie, quam si in tanto populo parentem, aut fratrem suum singuli sepelissent.

A TABLE OF TABLES,

Shewing to a whole Alphabet of sundry sorts of Readers; To each kind a particular Catalogue of Instances: Giving him an account, wherein the reading of this great Book of MARTYRS may abundantly give contentment to his vein of Study, and recompence his pains.

The References of which Table let the Reader thus understand,

UNderstand, studious Reader (what is not considered by most) that this large Book of MARTYRS, is not a Legend of Fables, nor a Chaos-rude-heap of worthless rubbish; but Bibliotheca literarum & literatorum, A Library of learning and learned mens Works, making this Book, for the prime and choice Subject thereof, justly to be esteemed (as the learned confess) the next of all human penn'd Books to the sacred Bible; as may appear in regard either of the Form or Matter thereof.

For Form, it is:
- Methodical; keeping time, as so great a variety of Story would permit, in the Histories of many Kingdoms belides our own.
- Certain in the proof; from eye-witnesses intent upon the things in the doing; and ancient Records, legally drawn, safely preserved, and faithfully produced.
- Well qualified for stile and expression; keeping in medio dicendi genere, a middle strain, yet varying the phrase of speech to the matter in hand. When this Book speaks otherwise, it speaks the words of another man, either relating or acting the matter of that Story. And then what is wanting in our best phrase, is recompensed there with certainty, patheticalness, and pleasure of hearing the Dialects of plain and ancient times and men.
- Rich in variety; ever and anon, after a more serious narration, fetching the Readers spirits fresh again (like the witty Comedian) with a sudden winding in, not impertinently, of some chearful discourse.

For Matter, As a Library it abounds with Treatises, each Page mostly being as a several Book; yea, one Leaf many times as a Shelf of Authors, for most points and persons: We will give but a taste in some few particulars, in an Alphabetical order.

O.

Old age may here with its dim eyes see plain patterns to lead him in the plain way; and encourage him, seeing he is so nigh his end, rather to be dissolved (if he be called unto it) in flames of fire to be with Christ, then in this last period of his life to deny him, and by and by at his death be denied Christ, Heaven, and any thing else but only Hell and damnation.

Politicians may be hence furnished with many observations touching matters of State and Government of Commonweals, not only laid down in the rule, but proved in the practises; For example,

- Decay of Religion decays a Commonwealth. vol. 1. p. 113. c. 2. overthrows the Government, as may be seen in Richard the Second. vol. 1. p. 580. c. 2. Compare p. 585. c. 1.
- Greatness of a State without true Empire of Government is a weakness to the same, as is plain in the Turkish Dominions, by the story of them.
- The mischief of several factions in a State, exemplified in Henry the Eight his Government. vol. 2. throughout. A particular instance, see vol. 2. pag. 474.
- Dissention in a Kingdom opens the door to foreign invasion; see in the example of Christians thus letting in the Turk, vol. 1. 827. c. 1.
- The Roman Empire, and
- The Jewish Nation
} ruined by refusing Christ, vol. 1. pag. 34. c. 2. 35. c. 1.
- The many changes of State, and the causes of them may be seen in this story more than in most; as in the coming in of Saxons, Danes, Normans, Scots, Picts; as also in Richard the Second his Reign, Henry the Sixth, &c.

OF

Master FOX his Martyrology.

An Advertisement to the Reader,

THAT here is presented unto him a compendious Chronological Table of the most remarkable things contained in the whole Book of Martyrs, (according as they are set down after Master Fox his Method and Computation) digesting them into several Columes; The First and smaller Colume making report of time.

Four next larger of persons.

Sixth and largest of matters, concisely anatomizing the whole body of the story into the master veins, arteries and sinews.

Seventh, last and least, pointing to the place in the large Volumes, where the Contents of all the other Columes are to be found, and filled up with flesh, bloud and spirits of larger Discourses.

To which we have added this brief Chronological Digest, that it may serve the studious Reader, either as a perspective, whereby to view what ground he is to travel, and where the several turnings are, before he begins to read; or as a Register or Note-book, whereby to recollect his thoughts and observations after so long a travel in reading so voluminous a Work: And at all times to be both as a Map of the limits, a Sceleton of the limbs, and Pourtraiture of the face of so rare a Story and a right Martyr; as also a Methodical Index to find and fetch in the main bulk of any special piece of the Story (out of the heap of prolix circumstances wherein it is covered) when it is to be remembred or perused. In all which thus projected, and with extraordinary care and pains effected, if any Reader from his knowledge of other Histories, conceive that many touches of additions or alterations of things, names or times, would have done well; let him remember that Master Fox his Book of Martyrs was the Copy set before the Pen to write after, both for matter and method. As also, that the scope of the Pen-man was, to make this Model a Key to the same; so that if we had any ways set this and the great Volume at difference and odds, we had set the Son against the Father, many references of this to that would have misreported things, and the whole Project had been ruined. This Child then, though a tender little weak one, comes abroad under the Parents Wing; and is modestly bold to speak and go on this way, because in its word it doth (as we speak) say after the Father; Sequiturque patrem quamvis non passibus equis, and follows the Fathers footsteps, though it cannot stride so wide. The hope is that that Nail will not score this Paper with dislike, whose Finger never felt the pains of carrying the Pen through so troublesome a business; and that the exercised hand in penning things of this nature will be merciful in censuring this Chronographizing of Master Fox his Story; whose parts, though belonging to the same time, are oft so far dispersed, and the same things at sundry times so frequently repeated, that it could not but be a great labour to gather them into times Method.

four evils,
1. Prophaneness: As, simony, murthers, poisonings of each other. 3. c. 1.
2. Omission of ministerial duties, as of preaching, &c.
3. Schisms and factions, to the number of eighteen since Pope Damascen.
4. Covetous injustice to get mony, by fifteen unlawful practices, Viz.

for
1. Annats and vacancies of Archbishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbacies, and spiritual places.
2. Retaining of other livings, besides that the incumbent now pays for.
3. New Annats upon change of the incumbents.
4. Preventions of Benefices before the fall.
5. Resignations upon favour.
6. Commendams.
7. Compositions with them that are non-resident, attending at Court.
8. Dispensations for any condition or sin.
9. Exemptions and Priviledges, and the continuations of them.
10. Mandats to the Ordinaries.
11. Penitentiaries and Absolutions from the Pope.
12. Pardons and Indulgences.
13. Making Notaries and Protonotaries, &c.
14. Bulls and Commissions for new foundations.
15. Giving the Pall to Archbishops newly elected.

Secondly, Jurisdiction and Power, in 5 particulars.

1. Elections of Bishops and such Offices. For whereas in the Apostles days, the Apostles with prayer and imposition of hands elected Bishops and Ministers: as James was made Bishop of Jerusalem by the Apostles, &c. as may be seen in the 4th Page of this Volume. After in the increase of the Church, the Elections of Bishops and Ministers stood by the Clergy and the People, with the consent of the chief Magistrate of the place, and thus it continued till Constantine the fourth Emperor, and after: But when Alexander the second came, he was chosen without the Emperor, and after him Hildebrand and his followers ordered the matter, that first the Empetor, secondly the Lay-People, lastly, the Clergy, for the most part were excluded. 4. c. 1.
2. Judiciary Power. For whereas in the Primitive times the Bishops debated all causes of Faith only by Scriptures, and other questions of Ecclesiastical Discipline by the Canons of ancient Councils: Now Scriptures and Councils are set aside, and all things are determined by the Popes new Decretals in his Canon Law. 5.
3. In Collation of all Ecclesiastical Promotions. For whereas anciently, according to sacred Councils, the holy Fathers, and the common Law, Bishops, Doctors, Patrons, &c. might bestow the Benefices, &c. in their own Precinct, now the Romish Church encroacheth upon, and getteth all into her own hands and power.
4. Binding and loosing. In which what the Scripture gives generally to all the Church, Rome arrogates to her self, and she only will alone have the Keys. Whereas again, the Scriptures give authority to no Church in some things, there Rome will enlarge her self, and fit the wards of her Keys, so as she will unlock and lock those things which never came into Gods mind to allow. As, to loose and discharge Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance to their Prince; and any man from Perjury for Money; and to bind with Excommunication persons for petty matters, as breaking Parks, not ringing Bells, &c.
5. Secular power over Emperors, Kings and Civil Magistracy whatsoever, to excommunicate depose, &c. and put in others; making all subject to him. Whereas it was not so from the beginning, no not of later times; but Gregorius Magnus was subject to Mauricius, and to Phocas though a wicked Emperor.

3. The Titles and Stile of the Bishops of Rome. Anciently the word Pope was common to all Bishops (as it is common in signification, coming of παππας, that is, Father.) Saint Austin being called Pope of the Council of Africk; Jerome so called of Boniface, and Cyprian of others. And the highest Bishops anciently were not called more than Patriarchs (as were four so called) or Archbishops and Metropolitans; but now the Pope will have the 7. 10. 9.

					shew'd 6. The name Bishop of Bishops forbidden by Cyprian.
					7. Gregory his refusal of the name Universal Bishop.	14.
					8. Objections for the name Universal Bishop, answered.
					9. Arguments proving the equality of the Apostles.	15.
					10. Answer to arguments for Peters Supremacy over the Apostles.	16.
					11. Certain demands, which answered, overthrow Peters Supremacy.	19.
					12. Thirteen causes of the Roman Bishops coming to this height.	20.
					4. Doctrine. For Paul the Apostle, and Peters Successor flatly differ in nineteen summary points, viz. touching Justification, Merit, strength of nature, and mans will, distinguishing of Law and Gospel, distinguishing the righteousness of God and of us, Traditions, subtil speculations, mans being in the first and second Adam, imputation of the first and second Adams condition to man, the glory of a mans condition in Christ, difference of days, difference of meats, limitation of marriage, sacrifice for sin, the holy Communion, the number of the Sacraments, what language to be used in the Church, obedience to Kings, the armour of the Church. In all which whosoever knows Saint Pauls judgment, let him suppose the clean contrary opinion, and that is the tenet of the Church of Rome; the several differences may be couched into this one; Paul advanceth Christ, and casteth down man: The Church of Rome casteth down Christ, and advanceth man.	22. 23.
1. 27.	Augustus Cæsar.	Cunobellinus, alias Cimbellinus.			Secondly, The Author of this History comes to the Body of the Story, That Christ is rejected, and crucified by the Jews, choosing Cæsar for their King in the seventeenth year of that Tiberius.	33.
33.		Gulderius			Gods judgment on the Jews for it.
	Tiberius Cæsar.				Tiberius Cæsar hearing of Christs Miracles, Resurrection and Ascension, moves the Senate to receive and adore Christ as God.
34.					The Senate of Rome refuseth to receive Christ for God, because contrary to the Law of the Romans (as they said) he was received for God, before the Romans decreed the same. This Tiberius lived six years after Christs Passion.
					Gods judgment on the City of Rome for refusal of Christ, their Emperors turning extreme Tyrants against them, almost to their utter subvertion.
					And for three hundred years after Christ, in which time were thirty two Emperors, was there scarce one Emperor but came to an ill end.
					Tiberius and his Tyranny described. By whom he was executed.	35.
					Gods judgment on Pilate that condemned Christ; which Pilate was deposed from his place, banished, and at length he slew himself.
35.					The stoning of Stephen the Proto-martyr, at which Paul was a persecuting agent. This day (saith Dorotheus) suffered also Nicanor one of the seven Deacons, with 2000 Christians more.	35.
39.	Caius Cæsar. Caligula.				Paul is Converted.
					Tiberius Cæsar having reigned twenty three years dies, after whom succeedeth C. Cæsar Caligula: commanding his Image to be set up in the Temple of Hierusalem; which was the beginning of The abomination of desolation to stand in the Holy place. He took the Romans wives violently from them; and having deflowred three of his own sisters, banished them. By this C. Cæsar Caligula,
					Herod that mocked Christ, and murthered John the Baptist, was banished, and dies miserably.
					Caiaphas also was deposed by the said Caligula.
43.	Claudius Nero.		Aviragus		Caligula being slain, leaves in his Study two Bills or Notes of them whom he did mean to persecute and kill, which Notes he called the Sword and Dagger; which were used for cruelty by him that followed, viz.
					Claudius Nero, who reigned thirteen years a grievous Tyrant.
					James the Apostle, the Son of Zebedee, martyred.
					Simon and Parmenas, two of the seven Deacons, martyred.
					Thomas the Apostle, preaching to the Medes, Persians and Parthians, Germans, &c. was slain with a Dart.
					Simon Zelotes preaching in Africk, and Britany, was Crucified.
					Andrew the Apostle preaching at Patræ in Achaia, was by Egeas the Governour Crucified.
					Matthew the Apostle wrote his Gospel to the Jews in the Hebrew Tongue. He is martyred with a Spear.	36.
					Matthias the Apostle preaching to the Jews, was stoned.
62.					Philip the Apostle having much laboured among the Barbarous Nations in preaching, was crucified and stoned to death at Hierapolis.
					James

Anno Christi	Roman Emper.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol.1. Page
					James the younger, the Son of Alphæus, the brother of the Lord, Bishop of Hierusalem, was thrown down from the battlements of a Church, and afterward stoned, and so martyred to death.
					With James many more were stoned, as may be collected out of Joseph. l.6. 20. &c.	37.
					Mark the Evangelist martyred at Alexandria, as Reusner affirmeth.
63			Claudius the Emperor falls into Britain, and subdued part of it to the Empire.		The description in general of the Ten Persecutions in the Primitive Church, under the Roman Emperors: Wherein, first, the wonderful many kinds of torments of the Christians are described by Rabanus: Secondly, the admirable patience of the tormented declared by S. August. Thirdly, the infinite number of those patient tormented ones, set forth by S. Hierome and Helodorus.
67	Domitius Nero.				Under this Emperor was the first of the ten Persecutions, by which (as Eusebius reports) whose Cities were filled with the dead bodies of all ages, sexes, and sorts.
					This Nero was so wicked, that St. Hierome upon Daniel saith, he was thought to be Antichrist. For so prodigious a monster was he, more like a beast, or rather a Devil than a man, that he caused his Mother, his Brother-in-Law, his Sister, his Wife great with child, and his Instructors, Seneca and Lucan, with divers more of his own kin to be put to death. He fired Rome in twelve places, and sang the while the verses of Homer.
69					His end, after he had reigned fourteen years, was by the Senate proclaimed an enemy to all mankind, condemning him to be drawn through the City, and to be whipped to death, for fear whereof he fled and flew himself.	34.
					Under him suffered Peter and Paul for Christ, about the later end of his reign.
73					A question moved whether St. Peter were ever at Rome.
			Marius.		Another question concerning Paul, whether he wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, and that to Laodicea.
					Paul declares the sum of that Doctrine which he preached.
81		Anacletus alias Cletus.			Vespasian was the quiet Prince that put the distinction between the first and second persecution; in that he did not proclaim Persecution against the Christians. Howbeit he with Titus destroyed the Jews for their rebelling, killing many above 11000, selling into slavery 17000, and leading 2000 in triumph, to be torn with wild beasts, and cruelly to be slain.	39.
96		Clemens.				34.
					Domitian, Brother of Titus, beginning his reign mildly, turned a blasphemous Idolater against God (commanding men to worship him) and a cruel tyrant against Christians; for by him was moved the 2d Persecution.
					Simeon, Bishop of Hierusalem was Crucified.
					John the Evangelist is banished into Patmos. But after the death of Domitian, he was released under Perstinax the Emperor, living to the time of Trajanus, governing the Churches of Asia, and penning his Gospel. He converted a thief. And dies out of a Bath, because wicked Cerinthus was there. St. John could not (as the Papists say) be the Virgin Maries Confessor, seeing according to them, she was without sin.
		Domitianus.			Domitianus fearing the coming of Christ, commanded all that could be found of the stock of David in Jewry to be slain. Another cause inciting Persecution, was false accusation of the Christians. But however the inquisition was this, Swear the truth, whether thou art indeed a Christian. If they confessed they were, the Law condemned them for that alone.
			Evaristus.		This Bishop of Rome was a martyr, and flourished as Reusner counts, Anno Christi 102.
			Alexander.		This Bishop of Rome was also martyr, see in the reign of Adrian Emperor.
					Traditions of holy water, &c. are falsly fathered on him, he flourished as Reusner will, in the year 110, in the later end of Trajans reign.	42. 43.
100	Nerva.				Saphira and Sabina, martyrs.
	Trajanus.				Nerva with his quietness put a period of peace for one year between the second and third Persecution.—Trajanus caused the third Persecution.
					Pliny writes to Trajan to stop the Persecution.
					Trajan feels not and puts to death the stock of David.
					Certain Sectaries of the Jewish Nation accuse Simeon Son of Mary Cleophas, that he was of the line of David, and a Christian; whereupon he was crucified; but the accusers escaped not being condemned for being (as the Emperor supposed) of the stock of David.
					Phocas B. of Pontus, mar.	Sulpitius, Servilianus, Euphrosius, Theodora, Mart.
111					Nereus and Achilleus, Martyrs.	Ignatius Mart. being devoured of wild beasts.
	Adrian, or Hadrian.				Publius, Bishop of Athens, Martyr.	45.
					Under him suffered Alexander Bishop of Rome, with his two Deacons.
					Zenon, a Nobleman of Rome, 10260 more slain for Christ.
					Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus Carcerius, prime Martyrs.
					Eustachius, with his Wife and Children, Martyrs.
					Calocerius seeing the patience of Faustinus and Jobita suffering the cruel torments, cried out with these words, Vere magnus Deus Christianorum, i.e. Great is the God of the Christians, whereupon he was presently apprehended, brought to the place of their execution, and was made partaker of their Martyrdom.
					Eleutherius with his Mother Anthia, Martyrs.
					Fustus & Pastor, Brethren, Mart.	Symphorissa with her 7 Children, Martyrs.
					Sophia with her three Children, Martyrs.
					Apologies made to the Emperor by { Quadratus Bishop of Athens: Aristides a Philosopher. } of the Christians

Anno Christi	Roman Emper.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England.	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. 1. Page.
					The succes was that the Emperor writeth and flacketh the Perfecution, charging that none be perfecuted barely for Chriſtianity. Hereby then began to come in the reſpite of peace between the third and fourth Perfecution.
					Howbeit this Adrian underſtanding of the Jews rebelling, ſent Julius Severus againſt them, who overthrew fifty two Caſtles in Jewry, burnt and demoliſhed 9080 Villages, and ſlew fifty thouſand of the Jews.	46.
					After this Adrian the Emperor repaired Hieruſalem, calling it Heliopolis.
124.	Aurelius				Adrian dies by bleeding at the noſe, as he had ſhed Chriſtians blood.
140.	Antonius Pius.		Collus.		This Emperor Antoninus reigned twenty three years, continuing that peace with the Chriſtians he found begun in Adrians laſt days; for which he had the name of Pius. Yet by the peoples tumult, without the Emperors conſent, ſome were martyred.
					His ſaying was, He had rather ſave one Citizen, than deſtroy a 1000 of his adverſaries.
					He writes in behalf of the Chriſtians, to the Perſecutors, notable arguments to ſtay perſecution, as being conquered by the patience of the Chriſtians.
					An Edict of peace for the Chriſtians is proclaimed at Epheſus.
162.	M. Antonius Verus, who joyned with him in the Government of the Empire M. Aurelius Commodus.				This quiet Emperor in life, of all other Emperors of thoſe times, died the moſt quiet death.
					This Antoninus was ſtudious of Philoſophy, but ſevere againſt the Chriſtians, moving the fourth perſecution.
					He moveth much perſecution. { In France, ſee pag. 50. In Aſia, where Polycarpus Biſhop of Smyrna was Mart.
					In this perſecution, Chriſtians were whipped until their veins, arteries and bowels did appear.	46.
					Germanicus, a famous Martyr for patience.
					Quintus a Phrygian, being raſhly hardy, ſuffers for it.
					Polycarp at firſt by perſwalion, did fly perſecution, at laſt offered himſelf willingly to thoſe that beſet the houſe to ſeek him, and was martyred.
					Twelve Martyrs at Smyrna. Of Polycarps Epiſtle to the Philippians.
					Irenæus was converſant with Polycarp, and Polycarp with the Apoſtles.	48.
					Difference of Ceremonies brake not amity in the Primitive Church.
					Socrates deceived in his Tripartite ſtory.	Metrodorus Martyr.
					Corpus, Papilus, Agathonica, Martyr.
					Felicitas with her ſeven Children, viz.	Januarius, Felix, Philippus, Silvanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis — Martyrs at Rome.
					Juſtinus Martyr, learned in Philoſophy, and godly in practiſe.
					Creſcens a Philoſopher, procurer of Juſtins death.
					Praxedis and Potentiana two godly Virgins, bury the bodies of the dead Martyrs, and ſpend their Patrimonies to relieve the living.	49.
					Ptolomeus and Lucius, Martyrs at Alexandria in Egypt.
					A place in Gratianus ſuſpected.	50.
					Concordus, Martyr; ſpitteth in the face of the Idol.
					Vincentius his ſtory ſuſpected.
					In France were many Martyrs, at Lions, and Vienna, whoſe Hiſtory is ſet forth under the hands of the brethren of France, in their Letter to the brethren in Aſia.	51.
					Vetius Epagathus, a young man, is a couragious Martyr, unto wonderment.
					Ten Chriſtians as weak as he was ſtrong, fainting, to the great ſorrow of the ſtronger.
					The Chriſtians are accuſed of keeping the Feaſt of Thyeſtes, and Inceſt of Oedipus.
					Blandina, martyr, is ſo patient in ſuffering all manner of torments, that ſhe wearies her tormentors.
					Sanctus, Martyr, was ſo able patiently to bear all manner of torments, that none could make him anſwer to many queſtions put to him, but only this in Latin to each of them, I am a Chriſtian. His firſt torments making him ſo ſwollen and ſcorched, that his members had loſt their ſhape and uſe; the ſecond contrary to his enemies intent reſtored his limbs in regard of both.	51.
					Biblides, a woman Martyr, having denied Chriſt, returns and confeſſeth Chriſt in the midſt of thoſe torments which were inflicted to make her blaſpheme Chriſt.
					Divers Martyrs ſtrangled.
					Martyrs die in priſon.
					Pbotinus a Deacon, eighty years old, Martyr.
					A deſcription of the comfort of confeſſing, and the diſcomfort of denying Chriſt.
					Maturus and Attalus martyred in a red hot Iron-chair, could not be made by ſetting them in it, to confeſs any thing, but what they had willingly before.	52.
					Deniers of Chriſt return and become Confeſſors.
					Alexander a Phrygian, beckoning at the Bar to the Chriſtians to ſtand to the Confeſſion of Chriſt, is queſtioned, confeſſeth Chriſt, and is martyred.
					Blandina, a woman, and Ponticus a youth of fifteen years old, Martyrs, could not be forced to ſwear, with all the witty cruelty of the tormentors.	53.

					Juſtinus a deep Philoſopher, a godly man, an Apologizer for the Chriſtians, and a Martyr.
					Grounds of crediting the Prophets. The profit of reading them.	53.
					Epiphanius found in a fault.
					Moſt worthy Martyrs pronounce themſelves unworthy of the name of Martyrs.	55.
					Alcibiades rebuked for over-ſtrict faſting.
					Apollinaris and Melito exhibit Apologies to the Emperor in behalf of the Chriſtians.	55.
					The Books of the Old Teſtament anciently received for Authentick.
					Chriſtian Soldiers get rain by prayer in a time of their great want of water in the army: for which the Emperor favours them, writing Letters in behalf of all the Chriſtians, to the aſſwaging of the Perſecution.
175.	Lucius Antoninus Commodus.				This Commodus was (though incommodious to the Senators of Rome) commodious to the Church; giving ſome peace univerſally throughout the ſame. Mean while the Goſpel ſpreads, and many Noble families in Rome adjoyn themſelves to the Chriſtians.
					Notwithſtanding there was ſome perſecuted in his time, for although there was a Law made by the Emperor, that none ſhould falſly accuſe the Chriſtians upon pain of death, yet in caſe any Chriſtian were once accuſed, the ancient Law was that none that were arraigned for profeſſion of Chriſt ſhould be releaſed without recantation of his opinion. Hereupon it followed, that Apollonius a Noble Senator of Rome being accuſed of his ſervant, the ſervant by the Law againſt accuſers, was executed, and had his legs broken; and Apollonius himſelf by the Law of not diſmiſſing accuſed Chriſtians without recantation, was beheaded; becauſe inſtead of making a recantation, he made an Apology of Chriſtian belief.
					This Emperor, Antonius Commodus was very skilful in caſting Darts, and took great pride to be called Hercules, and to wear oft times a Lions ſkin, in both intimating what a Protector he was to the City, and chiefrain over the people; Hercules being a Giant, and a Lion the King of Beaſts.
					This Emperor on his birth-day, clothed in his Lions skin, and ſacrificing to Hercules and Jupiter, commanding alſo the people to do the like, Vincentius, Peregrinus, Euſebius, Potentianus, learned men, and inſtructors of the people, diſſwaded them: for which cauſe, and for that they would not ſacrifice to Idols at the command of the Emperor, were with ſundry devices tormented, and at laſt with the preſſure of leaden weights, were martyred to death.
					Julius with his family are baptized, and after martyred.
		Xiſtus I. alias Sixtus I.			This Xiſtus or Sixtus Biſhop of Rome is counted the ſixth, Biſhop after Peter. The Epiſtles, and in them the Ordinances fathered upon him, very probably are falſly put upon him. He ſat in his Seat about nine or ten years.
129.		Teleſphorus.			This Teleſphorus ſat in the Seat eleven years, and died a Martyr. Many Ordinances touching Gloria in Excelſis, Lent-faſt, not permitting of Laymen to accuſe the Clergy, are falſly fathered upon him.
140.		Higinus.			This Higinus died a Martyr. The Ordinances of Cream, of one Godfather and Godmother, of Dedications of Churches, &c. are falſly put upon him.
		Pius.			The inflicting penance forty days upon the Prieſt, for letting fall one crum of the Lords-Supper: and if a drop did fall, that it ſhould be licked up, or elſe the place waſhed or pared, &c. all which, put on this Biſhop Pius by Platina, found as unlikely as they are in themſelves trivial. He made a Decree of changing Eaſter-day from the wonted day, viz. the fourteenth day of the Moon in the firſt Month, to the Sunday after.
159.		Aniectus			This Aniectus ſat in the Seat eleven years, and died a Martyr. He determined the ſame about Eaſter-day, as Pius his Predeceſſor had.
		Soter.			This Soter ſat in the Seat eight years: He alſo concludes the ſame order touching Eaſter, as Pius and Aniectus had.
178.		Eleutherius.			He ſat Biſhop of Rome fifteen years. His determination touching Eaſter is the ſame with his three Predeceſſors. See more in p. 37. in the Hiſt. of Victor.
			Lucius.		Divers Writers report that this Biſhop of Rome ſent Damianus and Fugatius at the requeſt of King Lucius, King of England, to him into England, by whom the ſaid King ſhould be converted and baptized. But as they vary in time, ſome making this ſending to be a year or two under 180, and others as much over: ſo is there a juſt difference between them, whether theſe were the firſt that tranſported the Chriſtian Faith into England, ſome of them avouching the coming of Simon Zelotes into England, others the coming of Joſeph of Arimathea firſt founding Chriſtian Religion in this Iſle. Whoever was firſt, Petrus Clunicenſis, Origen and Tertullian do witneſs that Chriſtianity was much more ancient than Eleutherius, yea and then the converſion of the ſaid King Lucius.
					Beſides thoſe mentioned above, were theſe learned men, confounding the Perſecutors by writing, in the time of this preſent Emperor Commodus.
					Seraphion Biſhop of Antioch.
					Egeſippus a Writer of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtory from Chriſts Paſſion to his own time. None of his Books remain ſave only five. De Excidio Hieroſol. And thoſe are not mentioned by Hierom.

					Miltiades wrote an Apology for the Chriſtians.

Anno Christi	Roman Emper.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. 1. Page
					Heraclius about this time began to write his Annotations and Enarrations upon the New Testament.
					Theophilus an Ecclesiastical writer, Bishop of Cesaria.
					Dionysius Bishop of Corinth, famous for learning, writes divers Epistles to several Churches. He writes to one Penitus a Bishop, Ne grave ferxandæ castitatis onus, &c. i.e. That he laid no yoke of necessity of keeping Chastity upon his Brethren.
					This Dionysius writes an Epistle of Dionysius Areopagita, declaring (as it is storied in the Acts) his Conversion by Paul, but speaks not a word of his Book De Hierarchia; yet doth he speak more of him touching his being first Bishop of Athens. This Dionysius of Corinth doth shew us that it was the custom in his time, that the Epistles that were sent unto Congregations by learned men, should be read in the Churches in the audience of the Assemblies.
					Clemens Alexandrinus also wrote in the time of this Emperor Commodus, whose Books some are yet extant, declaring the order and number of the Books of the New Testament.	59.
					A man of these times too, was Pantenus, the first publick professor in Schools in Alexandria, occasioning by his example Christian Universities. This Pantenus for his great Learning, was sent for by Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, to preach to the Indians, where he finding St. Matthews Gospel in Hebrew, left there by St. Bartholomew, brought it from thence to the Library of Alexandria.
					Whiles the Christians had any respites of peace in this Commodus his time, they jangled about the celebration of Easter. Yet differing in this Ceremony, they brake not off Charity. The difference of their Easter-days.
					He reigned but a few months Emperor.
195.	Pertinax Severus.	This same Severus extended his Empire over Britain at this time.			This Severus raised the fifth Persecution, of the eighteen years of his reign, the first ten were favourable to the Christians, the other eight through false accusations of the malignant, by Proclamation drew blood upon the Christians, see Euseb. Lib. 6. about the year 205.
					The accusers branded them with sedition, murther, &c. with worshipping of an Ass his head, because they believed the story of Samplons slaughtering the Philistims with a Jaw-bone: and with worshipping the Sun: because before Sun-rising they met and sung Psalms, praying towards the East: But the true quarrel was their not worshipping the Roman Idols.
					The Captains and Officers in this Persecution were Hilerianus, Vigelius, Claudius, Hormianus.
					The places of this Persecution were Africa, Alexandria, Cappadocia, and Carthage.
					The persons persecuted and martyred were,
					Leonides Father of Origen beheaded, with whom his son Origen, being then of seventeen years, would have suffered Martyrdom, but that his Mother by force hindred him.
					Origen encouageth his Father to Martyrdom, saying, Cave tibi ne quid propter nos, &c. that is, Take heed you turn not your purpose of Martyrdom for our sakes. His Father being slain, and his goods confiscate to the Emperor, he maintained himself, and mother, and her children; being in great poverty, by teaching School. He was very learned, conferring the Hebrew with the Translation of the Septuagint; and finding out the common Translations of Aquila Symmachus and Theodotion; adjoyning to them four other Translations. His Books he penned, were by St. Hieroms account, 7000 Volumes, which he sold for a little above three pence a piece for his relief.
					Plutarch, a Scholar of Origens, martyr.
					Serenus his Brother, a hearer also of Origen, martyr, burned.
					Heraclides, another hearer of Origen, martyr, beheaded.
					Heron, Origens scholar, martyred by beheading.
					Serenus a frith of Origens scholars, martyred by beheading.	60.
					Rhais and Pontamiena were tormented with pitch poured upon them, and so martyred.
					Marcella, mother of Pontamiena, martyred with fire.
					Basilides, an Officer that saw execution done upon Pontamiena, afterwards denied to give an Oath in a matter whereunto he was called, because he was to swear by the Idols, professing himself also to be turned Christian, by means of Pontamiena, who said as the went to martyrdom that she would pray that God would have mercy on him, after which she had seen a Crown put upon his head, whereupon he was martyred by beheading.
					Alexander by his great strength of body and grace, surviving many great torments inflicted on him for Religion, was by the repute thereof, adjoined Bishop of Jerusalem to Narcissus the former Bishop of that seat being 163 years old, and unwieldy to govern alone.
					Three malicious false witnesses acculing this Narcissus, confirmed it with imprecations of burning, deaths sickness, and losing both the eyes to themselves if their false accusations were not true: which being false, those several imprecations were truly executed upon them by the Lord, to each his own wish.
					Andoclus sent by Polycarp into France for his spreading the Gospel there, was beaten with staves and bats, and beheaded, and so martyred.
					Asclepiades a persecuted Confessor, Bishop of Antioch.
					Irenæus, Bishop of Lions, Martyr; commended by Tertullian to be the greatest searcher of all kind of Learning.

He

					He as his name signifies, a man of peace, compoling by his great Learning many differences, and suppressing many errors wherewith the Church in his time did swarm.
					Not long after this Irenæus, flourished Tertullian, an Ecclesiastical writer, commended by Vincentius Lirinensis, to be the Flower of all Latine Writers, and one that by his eloquence of stile compelled assent, having in it as many sentences as words, and as many victories as sentences. This Tertullian made a singular Apology for the Christians, touching every particular false accusation, shewing the impossibility and improbability of any truth in them.	60
				victor.	This Victor is reported (though Platina saith the contrary) by Damasus, and the followers of the common Chronicles, to die a Martyr. But he moved some stir about the time of Easter, which the Apostles had left as indifferent, who by reason of their intentiveness of Preaching, gave no heed to times and days; nor did they bind the Church to any Ceremonies saving of strangled things, and blood. Which of blood seemeth to be given to the Church, to prevent the scandal the heathen Gentiles laid upon the Christians eating blood, and so to continue only whiles the Persecutions of the heathen Gentiles continued. Also Pius, Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutherius, having changed Easter-day, from the fourteenth day of the moon in the first month, to the next Sunday after, and being opposed by Melito Bishop of Sardis, Egesippus and Polycarp, sent by the brethren of Asia to Rome to Anicetus, to confer with him about it, and not agreeing in opinion, the learned Men of those Times, with those now named, keeping Charity, left the time of Easter, as Adiaphorom, a thing indifferent in the Church till the time of this Victor. Now this Victor was so violently set upon upholding the Romish determination of his former Predecessors, as a necessary: that he would Excommunicate all the Bishops and Churches of Asia as Hereticks, unless they would be of his Opinion, had not Irenæus restrained him. Yet was Irenæus, also Theophilus, Bishop of Cesarea, Narcissus Bishop of Jerusalem, Palmas of Pontus, Bacchillus of Corinth, &c. of the judgment of Victor, touching keeping Easter upon the Sunday after the fourteenth of the Moon in the first month, for these two Reasons: First, because they would differ as much as might be from the Jews; Secondly, because the Resurrection of the Lord fell on the same day. On the contrary opinion were divers Bishops in Asia, chiefly Polycrates Bishop of Ephesus, alledging Scripture, the example of some of the Apostles, and custom of other Fathers. But Irenæus still took off the edge of sharp Contentions; and so the Controversie remained free till the time of the Nicene Council. And other Doctors of Christian liberty were free till Victors time, about Anno 200.	62
203			Zephirus.		The two Epistles in the first Tome of the Councils, fathered upon this Zephirus Bishop, may justly be suspected to be fained. And that those and other ordinances spoken of before, were invented by some to advance the Papacy, and naming them with the names of those Fathers. The same we may think of the patins of Glass ascribed to the said Zephirus. For that time of his sitting Bishop, some Writers make it 8, some 16, some 17 years. The most agree between 17 and 18.
		Bassianus.			This Severus invades England, he casts up a Ditch of 130 miles, from Sea to Sea, beginning at Tine, and reaching to the Scottish Sea.	62
			This same Bassianus extends his Empire over England.		He removing thence to York, was there by the Northern men and Scots besieged and slain.
214					Severus leaving behind him two Sons, Bassianus and Geta, Bassianus slays Geta, and governs the Empire alone about six years, and then was slain of his next Successors.
		Macrinus with his son Diadumenus.			These two, Mac. and Diad. having Reigned one year, were slain of their own people.
219		Varius Heliogabalus.			This Heliogabalus affected pomp in his life exceedingly; burning balm for oyl in his Lamps, filling his Fish-ponds with rose-water, wearing apparel of gold, and most costly silks, those set with precious stones, feeding himself with variety of dishes every second day, furnished with whatsoever was rarest and dearest; He affected too a pompous death, providing (in case his wicked life should make his enemies besiege him) swords of gold, silken ropes, cups of Jacinths to hold poyson, pavements of precious stones, wherewith to stab, hang, poyson and brain himself. He affected Luft as well as Pride, having 600 chariots of bauds and harlots to attend him in his progress. He was slain of his Souldiers, being an enemy to all honesty, and advancer only of base ones.	63
224		Aurel. Alex. Severus.			This Severus was adopted by Heliogabalus, being without Issue. He was learned, and in his actions constantly advised by his Senate; he so hated bribed Judges, that he would vomit when he saw them; and was ready with his two fingers to put out their eyes. He dismissed all idle and needless servants from his Court. He favored the Christians, saying of a place where they did meet for good Duties, which the Cooks and Tiplers would have taken from them, It was fitter for Gods service, than the use of Scullians, and so restored it to the Christians. Observe hence, that as yet there were no Christian Churches in Rome.
					He put to death Turinus with smoke, for taking mony of People, to get for them the Emperors favor, which he, lying, boasted he had at command; The Cryer proclaiming at his execution, Smoke he sold, and smoke he is punished with.	63

Anno Christi	Roman Emper.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. 1. Pag.
					His mother Mammea hearing of Origens fame, sent for him from Alexandria, to hear him, who came to her and the Emperor her son.
					Though he favored the Christians, yet some were martyred in his time, as Historians affirm, giving this reason; That by him no Proclamation was set forth for the safety of the Christians.
		Calixtus.			The persons persecuted under him they reckon to be,
					Calixtus martyred. Many Ordinances of the Fast of Ember-week, of not accusing Bishops, &c. fally put upon him.
227		Urbanus.			Urbanus Martyred. His Epistle decretal of Church-goods, Confirmations, &c. may justly be thought to be feigned.	64
					Tiburtius and Valerianus, Converts of Urbanus, and Noble men of Rome, Martyred.
					Cecilia, wife of Valerianus, a great confirmer of him and his brother Tiburtius, and a means of the Baptizing of 400 persons (as the story reports) Martyred.
					Agapetus of fifteen years, who could neither be made to sacrifice to Idols, nor be killed with whips, hot water poured upon him, or wild Beasts, was by Beheading Martyred.
236		Pontianus.			The Executioner of this Agapetus, named Antiochus, in the executing of this Martyr, fell down from his Seat, crying, That his inward Bowels burned within him, and so dyed.
					Many more (as Authors affirm) as well of the Senate and chief of Rome, as others were martyred under this Emperor, and their Heads were hanged over the City gates, to terrifie others from the profession of Christ.
					Albeit, as touching the time of these fore-named Martyrs, I suppose they suffered rather under Maximinus or Decius, than under Alexander.
237	Maximinus.				This Emperor Maximinus, was chosen Emperor rather by the wilfulness of the Souldiers, than the will of the Senate. He caused the sixth Persecution, especially against the Teachers, hoping that when they were smitten, the Sheep would soon be scattered. And therefore it is the more likely that Urbanus, and the rest above-named in the former persecution, suffered rather under this Maximinus, than under that Alexander.
					Origen, under this Emperor, wrote his Book De Martyrio.
					Pontianus the Bishop of Rome banished.
240	Gordianus.				This Gordianus was a learned and quiet Prince, and governed with much peace.	65
					Pontianus the Bishop of Rome dyes. His Epistles decretal, touching the hyperbolical dignifying of the Clergy, probably are feigned.
					At this time were raised in the Church other famous Fathers, as, Philetus Bishop of Antioch. Zebenus Bishop of Antioch.
					Ammonius the School-master of Origen, who wrote divers Books in defence of Christian Religion: and continued himself in the Profession thereof.
					Julius Africanus, who was (as Nicephorus writes) a Scholar of Origen, and a great Writer of Histories.
					Natalius, who had suffered as a good Confessor, much persecution, but being hired with preferment of being a Bishop, and by many, viz. 150 pieces of Silver every month, he turned to be of the Sect of Theodocus. But being much afflicted by the Lord, he repenting, returned to the Christian Congregation, and was received.
		Anterius.			Eusebius saith, That because this Bishop of Rome, Anterius did cause the lives and deaths of Martyrs to be written, that he himself was Martyred by Maximinus the Judge.
					Hippolytus a Bishop, a great Writer, Eusebius and Hierome mentioning his Books, and a Martyr, by being drawn with wild Horses through the Thickets.
					Gordianus Emperor, is slain; Philip Emperor, after him.
246	Philippus the first Christian Emperor.				This Philippus Emperor, took to himself his Son Philip assistant in governing. This Philippus, with his Son and all his Family, being converted by Fabianus and Origen, were Baptized: And howsoever Pompinius Letus writes, he was a dissembling Prince; this is certain, that for Religions sake, he and his Son were slain by Decius one of his Captains.
250	Decius				This Decius Emperor, moves the seventh Persecution, which was a most terrible one, because, besides Philippus his Christianity, he had committed his Treasure to Fabian the Bishop.
		Fabianus.			This Bishop Fabian was a married Man, and chosen Bishop, as Eusebius reports, by the lighting of a Dove upon his head, as he stood among the Assembly met to choose a Bishop of Rome. He was Martyred by Decius.
					The Ordinances of burning the old oyl, and consecrating new once a year; of not Marrying within the fifth Degree, &c. may justly be suspected of feigning.
					To this Fabian wrote Origen de Orthodoxia fidei suæ, that is, Of the righteousness of his Faith.
					Origen living to this Decius, suffered under him many bands, torments, rackings, &c. for Religion. After all which, being brought by the Officers to the Altar, whereon lay an Ethiop, and commanded to Sacrifice to the Idol, or else he should have his Body defiled by the Ethiop; he chose rather to Sacrifice, for which he was Excommunicated of the Church; and for his calling upon the Christians to carry those Boughs which he had in his hand, in honor to Christ, which the Heathen used to honor their gods withal, was by the Church of Alexandria removed from their Communion, and so departed thence for shame to Jewry. Where being importuned by the Congregation to make some exhortation to the people, after long denial, he stood up and read the Verse of the fifth Psalm, and so sat down and wept. What became of him at last, is not known, but only that, as Suidas saith, he dyed and was buried at Tyrus, and ended his life, as Eusebius saith, in great misery and poverty.

					This Origen Usher in the School at Alexandria, was one Heraclas; who for his excellent parts was Master of that School, and afterward Bishop of Alexandria, next after Demetrius.
					After Heraclas succeeded Dionysius Alexandrinus, Bishop of Alexandria, as he succeeded him before in the School. This Dionysius writes of Heraclas thus, Hunc ego, &c. that is, This Canon I received from blessed Heraclas our Pope. Yet observes, that this Heraclas was no Bishop of Rome.
					Nicephorus saith of this Persecution, that it was as easie to number the sands, as the Martyrs under this Decius. The more famous were these,
					Asclepiades Bishop of Antioch, a persecuted Confessor under Severus, dyes a Martyr under Decius.
					Babylas Bishop of Antioch, for not suffering the Emperor, having committed a Murder, to enter into the Christians Temple, was martyred. Being buryed in the Temple of Apollo; he causeth the Oracle that was there to cease. Whereupon his Body was taken up again.
					Babylas Bishop of Nicomedia, Martyr.
					Forty Virgins in the City of Antioch.
					Martyrs in Phrygia.
					Confessors at Babylon carryed to Spain to be Martyred.
					Divers Martyred in Cappadocia.
					Divers Martyred in Perside.
					Many Martyred at Alexandria.
					A Sooth-sayer was a great stirrer up of this Persecution (being a great friend to Idolatry) by whose means the multitude was so inraged against them that would not sacrifice to their Idols, that they stone Metra a Christian Priest, and dragged Quinta a godly Woman through the streets, and killed her. They went into Christians Houses, and took away their goods of price, and burned the rest in the Market-place.
					Apollonia a Martyr, had her teeth dasht out. And being threatned with a fire made before her to burn her, unless she would commit Idolatry, she voluntarily leaped into the fire.
					Dissention among the Persecutors, turned Persecution for a time from the Christians upon themselves.
					Revolters being perswaded to Sacrifice to the Idols, come trembling, as if they themselves should be Sacrificed.
					A Souldier taking part with the Christians against them that rail at them, is Martyred for the same.
					Ammonarian was tormented for telling the Judge she would not yield to his wicked commands for any torments he would inflict. Which the accordingly performed; and the Judge was ashamed to be overcome of a Woman.	68
					Knights and Warriers standing by the Tribunal, where the Martyrs were condemned, made signs to the fearful, imboldning them to Confession and Martyrdom. They being espied, and about to be questioned, pressed in to the Bench, professed Christ, and were Martyred.
					Chæremon a married Bishop, fled with his Wife in this Persecution in the Mountain of Arabia, and was never seen more.
					Dionysius charged by Germanus Bishop, for flying in Persecution, cleareth himself, calling God to witness, that he regarded not his life, but the Souldiers that kept him, leaving him through a fear, by the shreeking of some not far off, he was left alone, and escaped.
					Christophorus, of twelve cubits high, as Writers report, was martyred in this Persecution; whether he be that Christopher of whom the speech goes, he carryed Christ, &c. it is uncertain.	69
					Abundance in this Persecution wandred in Mountains, and were starved, or devoured of Beasts.
					A Souldier out-facing all threats to draw him to Idolatry, is by the Pretor put into a soft bed in a pleasant Garden of Lillies and Roses, and a beautiful Harlot sent in to him with Inbracements, inticing him to Adultery. But he bites off his tongue whiles she was kissing him, and spit it in her face, and rejected her wicked offers.
					Theodora Virgin, for refusing to sacrifice to Idols, was adjudged to the stews. A Christian Souldier going thither, as if (as the people hoped) he would have been one of them that would have abused her, changed his habit for hers, he sending her to escape, and staying there himself to dye in her stead; who being condemned, Theodora to release him, declares her self to be the right party. The Pretor cutting off their hands, burns both him and her.
					Nichomachus in his torments renouncing his Christianity, and offering Sacrifice to the Idols, was, when he was released, taken estoons with a wicked Spirit, thrown on the ground, that he bit off his tongue, and so died. Many more examples there were in this Persecution of Gods Judgments on revolters.	71
					Upon these revolters rose first the Heresie of Novatus, viz. that revolters for fear of Torments, might not be reconciled nor admitted to the Church, though they repented. This Novatus makes three Bishops drunk, that they might Ordain him Bishop of Rome against Cornelius the then lawful Bishop of that See.	71

Upon

Anno Christi	Roman Emper.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. Page.
					Upon these two Bishops of Rome set up together, doth Cyprian so much write of Unity and one Bishop, and not otherwise is he to be understood as any way to speak for a Pope.
255		Cornelius.			A Synod is held at Rome against this upstart Bishop, Novatus.
					This Cornelius is highly commended of Cyprian for his worthiness, of Hierome for his eloquence, and of others for his Martyrdom. Hence conceive all the trivial Decretals to be fained.
					This most Tyrannical Decius having reigned a very short time, viz. between two or three years, was slain of the Barbarians.
	Gallus and Volusianus his son reign together.				After Decius his death God sent a Pestilence on the Empire of ten years continuance. In it the Christians visited each other, though Infection did kill the Visiters next in short space. But the Gentiles being cruelly uncharitable, neglected their Brethren, being sick, and cast out their dead Bodies to the dogs.	72. 73.
					Upon this Pestilence, Cyprian wrote his Book, De Mortalitate.
					Gallus and Volusianus succeed by Treason next to Decius, and reign but a short time for their persecuting. Gallus setting forth Decrees for Persecution, banishing many Bishops and Pastors from their Flocks, condemning others to the Mettal-mines.
					To this time I refer the banishment of Cyprian, he being then Bishop of Carthage. Who in his absence from his Flock by this Exilement, made supply by his many excellent Letters, which are yet in a great part extant.
256		Lucius.			This Lucius was also banished under these two Co-Emperors. This Lucius is said to Ordain, That two Priests, with three Deacons, should always be with a Bishop to witness his conversation; which Order may be very good and useful. But it seems not to agree to Lucius his time, wherein there was not such Greatness of Bishops to retain and maintain such Retinue; nor such freedom from Persecution, as that they durst be seen openly abroad. Other Ordinances put upon him are suspected of faining.	73.
		Stephanus.			This Bishop is said by many Authors to dye a Martyr. Many Decrees fathered upon him: but they are feigned.
					These two Roman Emperors reigning covertly together, were very courteous to the Christians, by reason whereof, and the greatness of the Pestilence in the Empire, Persecution was extinguished for some two or three years, insomuch that the Emperors Court was full of Christians. But after Valerian having an Egyptian a chief Ruler of the heathen Synagogue, and chief of the Inchanters, being hindered by the Christians Prayers from his feats and charms, complaining and incensing thereupon the Emperor, the said Valerian was moved by him to move the eighth persecution.
259	Valerianus and his son Galienus.				Cyprian adds in his fourth Book, and fourth Epistle, certain causes on the Christians part of this Persecution; viz. The sins and dissentions of the Christians.
					Finally, That wicked Accusers caused this Persecution, by accusing the Christians of being the causes of the evils of Famine, Pestilence, &c. on the Empire.	75.
					Against all these Cyprian writes an eloquent Apology, entituled, Contra Demetrianum, as Tertullian had done before, Contra Scapulam.
					In the time of this Persecution was Cyprian Martyred, whose name was alias Statius, whose Country was Carthage in Africa. Who was made first a Priest, then the Bishop of Carthage. He was very careful of the afflicted Brethren, a great reader of Tertullian, and a man that had many godly Visions, as of future Persecutions, &c. At last, refusing to offer to Idols, this Persecution took off his Head, and crowned him with Martyrdom. For the excellent Sentences penned by him, his Books tell the World of them sufficiently. He had his blemishes, as other Fathers were not free (though the Papists fault is to make too much of every thing.) Origin had something that the Church now holds not. Polycarp, observed Easter after the Jews custom. Ignatius makes fasting on the Sabbath as bad as killing Christ. Irenæus held that man was not made perfect in the beginning, and seems to defend Free-will. Tertullian is noted for a Chiliast, and a Montanian. Justin seems to incline to Chiliasm, to the opinion of Angels falling by concupiscence of Women, and to the Doctrine of Free-will. And this Cyprian held contrary to the Church, Re-baptizing of Infants Baptized by Hereticks; whereupon fell great contention between him and Stephanus Bishop of Rome.	76. 77. 78.
					Besides this Cyprian, there was a second, who of an Idolater, and a practiser of Magick, was converted to a Christian, made a Priest and Bishop of Antioch, of which he was a native Citizen, and after was Martyred under Diocletian. Lastly, a third Cyprian, long after both these, there was in the time of the Emperor Julius Apostata.
					This Bishop of Rome is in this Persecution Martyred with six Christians, for being Christians.
		Xistus the second, alias, Sixtus the second.			Laurence, in this Persecution was Martyred, between whom and Xistus the Bishop, was love and words, as between the dearest Father and Son, especially when he saw Xistus going to Martyrdom. This Laurence was a vertuous Levite, a Minister of the Sacraments, and a Disturber of the Churches riches. Whereupon the covetous Emperor demanding where he had bestowed the same, after three days respite gotten of the Emperor for answer, he brings the poor, saying, These are the precious Treachery of the Church. The Emperor conceiving himself mocked in this Answer,	79.

Anno Christi	Emper. of Rome.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. Page
					swer, commands Laurence to be tormented to death, by pinching him with fiery Tonges, girding him with burning Plates, laying him on the iron Grate or Grid-iron red hot, rosting, broiling, toffing and turning him. In the suffering of all which, this is all that Laurence said,
					This side is now rosted enough, turn up, O Tyrant great. And see whether rosted or raw thou think'st the better meat.
					By this suffering of Laurence, thus patiently suffering death in so great torments, a Roman Soldier was converted, desiring to be baptised; thereupon he was martyred.
					Dyonisius Bishop of Alexandria, with certain brethren, was banished in this Persecution to Cephro, for not worshipping the Heathen Gods, and proving that there was one only true God whom they ought to worship.	80
					In this Persecution were Martyred, Men, old and young, Women, Wives and Maids, and young simple innocents.
					Eusebius the Deacon, notwithstanding his many persecutions, lived, ministring to the living fettered Confessors, and burying the dead Martyrs, and after was made Bishop of Laodicea, and after died in peace, about the year 268.
					In Cesarea Palestine suffered Martyrdom, Priscus, Malchus, and Alexander, who became Martyrs by seeing the Christian courage of others Martyred.
					In the City of Carthage at this time were martyred 300.
					In Simela of Italy Pontius was Martyred by being first hanged on the Rack, then cast to the wild Beasts, then these not hurting him, was cast too into the fire, of which, as Vincentius saith, being not hurt, he was laft of all beheaded and cast into the flood: His tormentors were so vexed after with spirits, that they bit off their tongues and died.	80
					Bergonensis is here to be reproved, for writing in his 8th Book in the story of this Emperor Valerianus, that Philippus was Bishop of Alexandria, and beheaded under the same Valerian, which is clean contrary to approved Authors, and the course of time.
					At this time was one Philippus made President of Alexandria, who had a Daughter named Eugenia, of rare beauty, who to avoid Marriage with a Pagan and Heathen Persecutor, fled from her Father, going in Mans Apparel, calling her self Eugenius, and for her parts was made Head of a Society of Christians, where a lustful Matron being enamoured with her beauty, supposing her to be a man, laboured to draw her to incleanness with her; but Eugenia not consenting, this Matron accuseth Eugenia to have laboured to deflower her; whereupon the matter was brought before Philippus the President, who according to allegations, being about to condemn her to death, Eugenia, seeing no other evidences would serve, discovered her self to Philippus, to be an innocent, a Woman, and his Daughter, and so was restored and received of Philippus as an innocent and a Daughter, who not long after converted her Father to Christianity, who after died also a Martyr, and after his death Eugenia returning to Rome was also martyred.
					In the 6th year of Valerianus and Galienus were Victor and Victorinus, having been imprisoned three years, martyred.	82
262					Fructuosus Bishop of Tarracona in Spain, with his two Deacons, Argurius, and Eulogius were martyred at this time in the fire, for calling Idols dumb gods of stocks, and professing his worship, and opinion of the true God. It is reported by some that a Soldier saw the Heavens opened over them as they were in the fire, receiving them, a Soldier and the persecuting Presidents Daughter beholding the same.
					This Emperor Valerian having thus persecuted the Church, two of the seven years that he had reigned, he was taken in War by the King of Persia, and made his block to take Horse to his dying day.
					Claudius his persecuting President was so vexed with the Devil, that he bit off his tongue and died.
					Galienus the son of Valerian, for his part in persecuting, had many Earthquakes, and 30 Rebellions moved in his Empire. Whereupon he mitigated Persecution, yet some were somewhat troubled. His Father reigned seven years together with him; and he reigned nine alone, somewhat more quietly.	82
266		Dionysius.			The Ordinances put on that Dionysius are feigned. Some say he was Bishop 9 years, others 6 years and 2 Months.
272	Claudius Quintillianus. Aurelianus.				This Claudius was also a quiet Emperor. He reigned about two years.
					This Emperor was also quiet. He continued but seventeen days.
					This Aurelianus begins mildly, but anon after moves the ninth Persecution.	83
					In his mild time there was a Council of Christians at Antioch, he seeming not to be against it or them.
					In the beginning of his Tyranny, he makes his entrance into bloud with the death of his Sisters Son.
					As he was about to seal an Edict for Persecution, he was so terrified with Thunder and Lightning, that it stopped his Tyranny. About the fifth or sixth year of his Reign he was slain.
278	Pub. An. Tacitus. Florianus.				his Emperor Tacitus reigned but six Months.
					his Florian reigned but sixty days.

280	Mar. Au.	Felix			In the first year of this Probus was Felix Bishop, who died a Martyr.
281	Probus.	Eutichianus.			This Emperor Probus was a quiet Prince, and an enemy to idle soldiers; keeping his soldiers to diligent labour; whereupon his soldiers slew him, having reigned about six years.
284	Carus with his two sons Carinus and Numerianus.				This Carus warring against the Persians was slain with lightning. Numerianus immoderately lamenting for his Father, by much weeping made his eyes sore, whereby he being constrained to keep within doors, was slain of Aper his Father-in-law, which Aper would answer, when any asked for Numerian, that he kept private because of his sore eyes. Thus was he justly slain by Aper, who had slain godly Cyrillus for refusing to admit him an Idolater into the Christians Temple.	84
285	Aper usurps the Empire.	Caius who was martyred in the 10th Persecution.			These two Car. and Num. being slain in the East parts; Carinus the other Son reigned alone in Italy, with much wickedness. At last the Army set up Diocletian to be Emperor, and the Tribune slays Carinus, whose Wife Carinus had defiled. Thus these three Car. Num. and Carin. reigned not above three years.
289					Thus the Church had much peace all this while, till the 19th year of Diocletian: For
290			Carausius alias Carausius.		The Church being in peace with the Heathens, dissents within her self, and lying still, gathers corruption; anon therefore to quiet and purge her in her self, Gods just wisdom sends them more Persecution, the tenth time.
	Diocletian he chooseth Maximianus fellow Emperor with him.				This Diocletian being nominated (as we said) to be Emperor, and being told by Druas his Concubine, he must slay a Bore before he could be Emperor, he runs with his sword upon Aper, for that, as he said, he had unjustly slain Numerian, and so slays him, and comes fully to the Crown.
296			Alectus.		As Diocletian for the troublousness of the Empire had joyned to him Maximian; so these two chose to them
					Galerius and Constantius } Cesars under them.
304			Asclepiodatus. Coilus.
		Marcellinus who was cited up, made to appear, and condemned by the Council of Sinuess, Martyr. Marcellus Martyr. Eusebius Martyr. Miltiades Martyr.			About the nineteenth year of this Diocletian, doth he begin the tenth Persecution, which lasted ten years together, exceeding the rest in length and sharpness. His first act in this Tragedy (after the abovesaid peaceable preface) was to pull down the Christian Churches to the ground, to burn the Scriptures, and displace all Magistrates that would not abjure Christianity.	85
					The second Act was to affay by all possible torments, to make Bishops and Elders to sacrifice to Idols.
					In the third act he comes to the common Christians; but first begins in his Camp, where many of his soldiers valiantly and voluntarily died to be soldiers of Christ, under the colours of Martyrdom. An infinite number of others were martyred. Nay, the very places and torments where and wherewith they were martyred, arise to a mighty multitude.	86
					At Nicomedia, a Christian, a Nobleman born, seeing the Edict of the Emperor set up for Persecution, takes it down, and tears it, the two Emperors being in the City, for which he was miserably tormented.
					Diocletian tyrannizeth in the East, and Maximinus in the West.
					Serena, the Wife of Diocletian the Emperor, is martyred for Christianity.	86
					20000 Martyrs burned together in one Church.
					Martyrs in Phrygia are burnt with the whole City.
					Divers in this Persecution were martyred in France, in Spain, Britany, so that in these Countries some Rivers were coloured with the bloud of Christians.	87
					Eusebius an eye-witness of torment-Martyrdom executed on divers in Thebaid, and of tormentors wearied with exercising cruelty on the invincible patience of Christians, singing Psalms in torment to the last gasp.
					Marcellinus revolts, anon he repents, and dyes a Martyr.	88
					An hundred Martyrs slain at once in one day, of men, women and children.
					17000 Martyrs in one month slain.
					300 Martyred at one time in Alexandria.
					Mauritius the Captain, with 6666 of his soldiers martyred.
					Victor with 360 martyred.
					Christians increase in persecution.	88
305					Diocletian and Maximinian, tyred with persecuting, give up their Empire, and lead a private life, having reigned about one and twenty years, or near upon.
					These two, Maximinus and Constantius before Cesars, now become Emperors; Maximinus in the East, and Constantius in the West.
	Maximinus and Constantius.		This Constantius extends his Empire over England.		Maximinus chooseth his Sons Maximinus and Severus Cesars under him.
					Constantius chooseth Constantinus his Son Cesar under him.
309	Maxentius set up by the soldiers.				Against this Maxentius thus set up by the soldiers, Maximinus sent his Son Severus, which Severus being slain; he chose Licinius Cesar in his room.
					These thus set up, come to be Emperors, viz. Maximinus, Constantius, Maxentius, and the rest as Cesars, continued the decennal Persecution, after Diocletian and his Partner had given over. Saving that Constantius, and especially his Son Constantinus were kind to the Christians.

Con-

Anno Christi	Emper. of Rome.	Bishops of Rome.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. 1. Page.
311		Silvester the First.			Constantius seeming to be willing to most advance those that at a certain appointed solemnity, would most readily offer Sacrifice, and thereby according to his desire, discovering who were Heathenish Idolaters, and who Christians, he commending the Christian refusers and deriders of that idolatry, chose them for his Court, banished the others from him, as unfit for his service, that were Traitors to God.	90
					Contrariwise, Maximinus was very wicked in idolatry and cruelty; where God struck him with a swelling and Fistula in the belly and secret parts; which putrifying, brake out with swarms of Lice, with such a stink, that his Physician could not endure the same; wherefore he was slain of this Maximinus. But by anguish of his Disease, he slacked Persecution, as being conscious, and accordingly making confession that his persecuting had brought this upon him; and so acknowledging his offences to God.
					The Infidels themselves extol the only true God of the Christians.
					Anon, by the wicked device of Theotechnus an Inchanter, bringing the Christians out of credit with the Emperor, and of Præfectus Castrorum, who got certain Women to say in writing, that once they were Christians, and what lascivious acts they knew the Christians did upon the Sundays; the Emperor was incensed to set up Decrees of fresh persecution, in brass, whereby many Bishops and others were martyred.	91
					Upon this followed great Famine and Pestilence on the Heathen; to whom the Christians then shewed great relief, when the Heathens forsook each other.	92
					By this some peace came again to the Church; Maximinus revoking his brazen Decrees, and punishing his Enchanters that incensed him against the Christians.	93
					Maximianus pretending to ask aid of Constantinus, to depose wicked Maxentius his Son, set up by the Soldiers to be Emperor (as we said) but intending indeed to slay Constantius (for Maximianus would have fain resumed the Empire) was slain by Constantine's Officers. Hanged as some say.
					Maxentius this whiles goes on his wicked tyrannical reign, at Rome, murthering Husbands to be naught with their Wives: so that one Gentlewoman, her Husband being slain, slew her self to avoid his ravishing of her.	93
			This Constantinus is created Emperor also over Britain.		Constantinus, intreated of the Romans, came against Maxentius for his wickedness, warring upon him; and upon a Bridge made of Boats over Tibur (which Maxentius made to intrap and drown Constantine) was Maxentius intrapped and drowned.	94
	Constantine the Great, and Licinius, of Cesars are made Emperors				Constantine sets forth Decrees of favour to the Christians.
					Licinius feignedly joyns with Constantine in that act; for at the first there was great familiarity between them, Licinius marrying Constantine's Sister. But all Licinius his love was feigned, who, as he was an enemy to learning, calling it poyson; and an enemy, to honesty, loving all base vices; so he was an enemy to Constantine secretly (plotting against his person) and to the Christians, because he said that they prayed for Constantine, and not for him. And so he banished some Christians from his Court, and as covertly as he could, for Constantine persecuted divers Bishops and other Christians, very sorely, for about six years.	96
		Marcus.			For these things, at last, Constantine and he joyn Battel, and after many Battels, wherein still Licinius was beaten, at last was slain. Anno 324.
					Constantius the good Emperor, the Father of Constantine died a natural death, and was buried at York.
		Julius.			Diocletian died (as some write) by his own poison. Others say with sorrow of Constantine's prospering.
331					About the time of this Persecution was St. Alban, who was the first that I find that suffered Martyrdom in this Kingdom.	98
					Romanus, a rare Martyr, suffered at this time, who said, that so many wounds as he had, so many mouths he had to praise God.
					A very young Child is a Confessor of Christs God-head, and is martyred, the Mother rejoycing in the same.	99
					Menas, a famous Martyr, in the midst of great torments, cried out, that there was nothing to be compared to the Kingdom of Heaven.	100
					Martyrs put in a cold Pond all a Winters night.
					A Schoolmaster martyred by his Scholars. The story is in Verse.	101
					Eulalia, a singular Martyr, in the midst of her torment praiseth God.	102
					A place of Platina confirmed.	103
					Great Persecution there was in Persia, where were slain sixteen thousand Martyrs.	109
					Constantinus writes to the King of Persia in behalf of the Christians.
					Also he sets forth Edicts in his own Kingdom, of all peace and liberty (the Persecutors being now vanquished) and sets up Schools, prescribes Prayers, establisheth Religion, &c. in his Empire; conferring many privileges upon the Clergy.

In the time of this Vortiger, the Picts and Scots so spoiled this Land, that Vortiger was feign to crave aid of the Saxons; which Saxons, at last growing strong, began to subdue the Land to themselves. Whereupon the Britains complained to Vortigern against the repairing of so many Saxons. But he not hearkning to them, was after seven years reign depoſed by them, and Vortimer his Son is chosen King in his room, as followeth in the Table.	121
447			Saxon Kings begin to Invade, and prepare for the setting up in England their Saxonish Heptarchy. Vortigernus. alias Vortigerm.
454			Vortimerus.		This Vortimer in some good measure suppresseth the Saxons. At length he was poisoned of his stepmother, having reigned six years.
456			Vortigernus alias Vortigerm.		Then the said Vortigern, before depoſed, having again obtained this Kingdom, Hengistus enters it with abundance of Saxons. And when he saw the Britains too strong for him, he concluded peace with them; and under that covert, works Treason, slaying the Barons at Salsbury Plain; and thereby took the King Prisoner: And so in this Kingdom of England began the Kingdoms of the Saxons, until they came to seven Kingdoms, all Saxonish. Yet so, as though the Britains were thus deceived of their Land by the Saxons, the Britains were not utterly driven out, but that a certain Kingdom remained amongst them in some part of the Land; namely, about Cornwal and the parts of Cambria, which is divided into two parts, viz. South-Wales, called Demetia; and North-Wales, called Venedocea. Yea, many time the Britains did win upon the Saxons, till the time of Carecius; at which time the Britains were utterly vanquished out of Britain to Wales by Gormundus, whom they themselves sent for out of Ireland for their help.

He sent for Aedanus into Scotland to preach, which as he did in Scottish, the King expounded into English. He gave much alms —Oswius fighting against Penda, vowed to make his Daughter a Nun, giving with her twelve Lordships to build twelve Monasteries. — Oswius slays his partner Oswinus, and chooseth another. —Egfred married Etheldrida, who after twelve years could not be allured to ly with him, getting licence of him to be made a Nun, and after an Abbess. She made but one Meal a day, and never wore linen. —Alfrid (as Beda saith) was exactly seen in the Scriptures. —Osred began his Reign at eight years old. Celulfe, after he had reigned eight years, was made a Monk. To him Beda wrote his History. —Mollo was made away with by Alfredus his subtil Train: Which Alfredus also after ten years was expulsed of his own people. Ethelbert was also expulsed. —The two last Kings were slain. This Kingdom lasted 409 years.

Of the Kings of Mercia. Penda was a great conqueror of others, viz. of Edwin and Oswald Kings of Northumberland. Also of Sigebert, Edrike

Lastly, knowing their King to be called Alle, he saith, That Alleluia ought there to be sung to the living God. But Pelagius gius would not permit this Gregory to effect these allusions, but after, being Bishop next to Pelagius, he sent over Austin, with other Preachers about the number of forty. Austin sends to the said Gregory, to be resolved of divers doubts about the behaviour of Bishops, Marriage of Priests, &c. which Gregory answers, granting Wives to the Priests that could not contain.	131

600										Austin, of a Monk, by Gregory his Pall made Archbishop of Canterbury: After he had baptized a great part of Kent, he made two Archbishops by the command of the said Gregory, viz. the Archbishop of London, and the Archbishop of York. This Austin chargeth the said Bishops to assist in preaching to the English men, and that Reformation should be made in the Scottish and British Churches, in divers things; particularly, to change their time of Easter, to the custom of Rome: But the Scots and Britains utterly refused to change their custom. Austin was so proud, that he would not bow to seven Bishops, and one Archbishop, coming to a Council at his command; whereupon the said Bishops and Archbishop was so perverse, that they denied to assist him to convert the Idolatrous Saxons. A great fault on both sides.	132
604										2. Laurentius.	Austin baptized (as Authors say) 10000 in one day, viz. the Feast of Christs Nativity. Observe, Fonts were not then in use; nor were there many Trinkets used about Baptism, as now at Rome; else Austin could not have baptised so many in one day. Austin sate some fifteen years Archbishop. He ordained Laurence Archbishop. See also Page 173 of the great Volume.
610		Sabinianus.									About this time departed Gregory Bishop of Rome, of whom it is said, he was the basest of all his Predecessors, and the best of all his successors. About this time died David, Archbishop of Cairleon. About this time was Job. Patriarch of Alexandria: who of a hard sparing man became bountiful in Hospitality to the poor. He would twice a Week sit all the day at his Door, to take up matters, and make unity where was any variance. He lamented much one day becaufe none came that day to him, as having done no good. But his Deacon perswaded him rather to joy, that he had brought the City into that good order, that there needed no reconcilement. He was a malicious detractor of Gregory and his works. He continued scarce two years. See Page 173 of the great Volume.	133
		Bonifacius the third.								3. Mellitus.	He did more hurt in his one year being Bishop, than Gregory could do good in many. He obtained of Phocas the wicked Emperor, that he and his successors in that See should have an universal head-ship over all the Churches in Christendom.
		Bonifacе 4.									This Bonifacе the Fifth sent Letters and Presents to K. Edwin of Northumberland, a Pagan, to win him to the faith.	134
										4. Justus.	Justus ordained Paulinus Archbishop of York. Of him see also Page 173 of the great Volume.	134
627											K. Edwin being wounded by Treason with a Sword, was thereupon moved to cause that his Daughter should be baptized, and twelve more of his Family, in token that he also would be christened, as he promised to Christ, if he should give him Victory in Battel over the King of the Westsaxons. But when he had the Victory, he neglected his promise, excusing himself, that he might not clearly deny his old Law which his Forefathers had kept so long, and suddenly be christened without authority and advice of his Council. But by preaching of Paulinus, the first Archbishop of York, he left his Mahometry. At last by Peculinus his earnest prayers to God, and pressing the King with his promise, he received the faith, and was baptized with many of his Subjects with him. After this the said Paulinus baptized daily many multitudes. And great peace was throughout the Kingdom, so that a Woman laden with Gold might have gone quietly.
634										5. Honorius.	Of Honorius Archbishop, see Page 173 of the great Volume. Six years after Edwin's Baptism (who brought in the faith in the North parts) was he slain in Battel by Cedwalla the British King and by wicked Penda King of the Mercians, in the Field called Hatfield. Edwin being dead, and Cedwalla with his Britains and wicked Penda with his idolatrous Mercians, spoiling the Country, Paulinus, with the Queen Edelburg, was fain to fly by water into Kent, where Paulinus was Bishop of Rochester nineteen years: No Bishop being in Northumberland for thirty years after. But Paulinus had left James, a godly Deacon, who preached and baptized many, till peace and the former condition of that Country returned. By means of Edwin, Erpwaldus King of the East-angles, was reduced to Christs Faith.	135

636		Honorius 1.			After Edwin and his Son, slain both in Battel, Osricus and Enfridus reigned there, the one in Deira, the other in Bernicia. These two being first Christened in Scotland, after being Kings returned to their Idolatry, and so the year following were both slain by Cedwalla and Penda.
					After whom succeeded Oswaldus, ruling both Provinces, Deira and Bernicia; whom when Cedwalla and Penda thought to slay also, he being smaller in number, cried to God in prayer, to help him, for the salvation of his people, against those two enemies, and so in the field called Denesburg, he conquered Cedwalla and Penda.
					This Oswald disdained not to expound and preach the Gospel to his people.
					By this Oswald's means, Kinigilsus, King of Westsaxons was converted, through the preaching of Berinus, who was sent by Pope Honorius into England to preach; which Berinus was made Bishop of Dorchester, by whom Kinigilsus was baptised.	135
					Kinigilsus made the same day, the same Oswaldus to be both his Godfather and his Son-in-law.
643					Oswald, having reigned nine years is slain by Penda.
					Penda is slain by Oswie the Brother of Oswald, King after him in the Kingdom of Northumberland. He married his Daughter to Wenda, Son of Penda, and made him King of South-Mercia, upon condition he should become a Christian, which when Penda his Father was dead, he performed.
					Wolferus his Brother succeeded, who was christened, and is counted the first christened K. of Mercia.
					Aidanus a Scottish Bishop, having a stately and princely Horse given him with Trappers, by K. Oswine of Deira, to the end that he might not so much travel on foot: meeting a poor man asking alms of him as he rode, and having nothing else to give him, gave him his Horse trapped as he was. The K. rebuking him for parting with that choice Horse, when other meaner might have served the Begger; the Bishop replied, Dost thou, O King, set more by an Horse, the foal of an Horse, than by the Son of Mary, yea, the Son of God? At which words the King fell at his feet, promising never after to gainsay any charity he should shew.
651		Vitellianus alias Vitalianus.			Benedict or Benet, simamed B. (who brought up Bede from seven years old, all his life in learning) a Nobleman, and in great favour with King Oswie, left all honour and preferment to serve Christ; and furnished the Kingdom with good Books fetched from Rome. He also brought in Glasing into England.
664				Adeodatus alias Deus dedit.	Cuthertus, Bishop, is said to live about this time, with divers other godly Bishops. But the said Cuthert is not by Writers said to be Archbishop of Canterbury till after Anno 735. See after that year.
					A Synod about this time is held of divers Bishops, wherein many held against the Britains and Scottish Bishops for the observing of Easter. For Colman, Archbishop of York, and the Britains, according to Aidanus Finianus, and the other Bishops their Predecessors had held, and as the Scottish Bishops then did hold, did observe contrary to the use among the Romans and Saxons, the time of Easter from the fourteenth day of the first month, till the eight and twentieth of the same Month; whether it were Sabbath or no. The other side, as Wilfrid the Priest, who spake for the rest, as Agilbert, &c. held that according to the custom of Rome, Italy, France, Asia, Affrick, Egypt and Greece, Easter should not be kept on the fourteenth day, unless it were Sabbath; but to be respited to the next Sabbath between the fourteenth and the one and twentieth day. The former side alledged for their Tenet, Saint John the Evangelists example. This latter alledged St. Peter's. The King concluded thus. For so much as St. Peter is the Door-keeper of Heaven, I will not gainsay him, but obey his orders, lest when I come to the Gates of Heaven, he shut them against me. To this reason the multitude yielded. But Colman in displeasure left the Realm, and went into Scotland.	136
					Wolferus converting the Southsaxons that they had received Baptism, presently they had Rain, which they had wanted three years, causing a great Famine, insomuch that the people would go forty together upon the Rocks, and take hands, and throw themselves down into the Sea.	137
666					Wilfrid taught the Southsaxons the art of fishing with Nets.
					About this time the detestable Sect of Mahumet, began to take strength and place. Of Mahumet came the Kingdom of Agarens, whom he after named Saracens; to whom he gave sundry laws patched of many Sects. He taught them to pray with their faces to the South. As we keep Sunday, so they keep Friday; which they call the day of Venus. He permitted them to have as many Wives as they were able to maintain; and to have as many Concubines as they listed; to abstain from Wine, except on some solemn days of the year; to have and to worship one God Omnipotent; and to esteem Moses and the Prophets great, but Christ as greater; as being	138

					ing born of the Virgin Mary, by the power of God, without mans seed, and at last was taken up to Heaven, but was not slain, but another in his likeness for him; with many other wicked blasphemies in his Law contained. At length this Kingdom of the Saracens began to be conquered of the Turk, and in process of time wholly subdued unto him, as we shall declare in the years following, in which those several passages were done.
668				7. Theodorus.	This Theodore was sent from Italy into England, by Vitellianus the Pope, to be Archbishop of Canterbury, and divers other Monks of Italy to set up here in England, Latin service, Masses, and such other Romish ware. This Theodore plays Rex, displacing Cedda and Wilfrid, Archbishops of York, pretending they were not lawfully Consecrated; notwithstanding they were sufficiently authorized by their Kings, and were placed against their wills.
679					In the time of this Theodore, a Synod was held at Thetford, ordaining that Easter should be kept throughout the Realm upon one certain day, viz. Prima 14. Luna mensis primi. That no Bishop should meddle in anothers Diocess. That Monasteries should be free from Bishops Jurisdiction. That Monks should not stray from their own Monastery to another: Nor a Clergy-man from his own Bishop to anothers Diocess. That Synods Provincial should be kept in the Realm at least once a year; with divers other Ordinances of like nature.

689		Serglus 1.			In the next year after that Synod, was held the sixth General Council at Constance: At which was Theodore under Pope Agatho present, where it was permitted that Greek Priests should have wives, and forbidden to the Latin.
705					In the sixth year of Iva, beginning to reign about this time, most valiantly warring against the Kentish Saxons, was one Cuthlake a Confessor, who first was a Monk, and after an Anchorite.	139

		Constantine.			In the 16*th* year of Iva, Ethelred King of Mercia having reigned 30 years, was made a Monk, and after Abbot of Bardney.
					P. Const. is mentioned pag. 143. ☜
717					This year being about the 18*th* of King Ive his reign, died that learned Bishop Adelmus, first Abbot of Malmesbury, after Bishop of Shirbourne; which See was after united to Winton.
					John of Beverly, Bishop of York, dieth.
					In the time of Ive, who reigned 37 years, began first the right observation of Easter-day by the Picts and Britains: in which observation three things are necessary: 1. The full Moon of the first Month, (1) of March. 2. The Dominical Letter. 3. The Equinoctial day, which was wont to be counted, in the East Church, and especially among the Egyptians, to be about the 17*th* of March.
					So that the Full Moon, either on the Equinoctial day, or after the Equinoctial day, being observed, the next Dominical-day following that Full Moon, is to be taken for Easter-day. But then two things must be noted, 1. That the fulness of the Moon must be perfectly full: So that it be the beginning of the third week of the Moon, which is the fourteenth or fifteenth day of the Moon. 2. That the said perfect fulness of the Moon, beginning the third week, must happen either in the very evening of the Equinoctial day, or after the Equinoctial day: For else, if it happen either on the Equinoctial day before the evening, or before the Equinoctial, it belongeth to the last month of the last year, and not to the first month of the first year, and so serveth not to be observed.
					This rite in keeping Easter being received in the Latin Church, began now among the Picts and Britains, through the busie travel of Theodorus Cuthlacus, but namely of Elbert the holy Monk, as they term him, and of Colfrid, Abbot of Sirwin.
					This Colfrid wrote also to Narcanus, or Naitonus the King of the Picts, concerning the shaving of Priests Crowns, as necessary to the Vow of a Monk, or degree of a Priest, for restraint. And thus began this Ceremony, without any proof of Scripture.
		Gregor. 2.			Pope Gregory the second is mentioned pag. 143. ☜
724					King Ive yet reigning, being the 37*th* year of his reign, is importunately perswaded by his Queen Ethelburga to turn Monk at Rome; to which, when he did not at first yield, the King departing to some other place, the Queen caused all the Kings glorious Palace to be smeared and filled with Hogs, and dung, and filth, and in their lodging Chamber was put a Sow with young Pigs. Then the Queen brings the King to that Palace, saying, I pray you my Lord, behold this house, where are now all the rich hangings, and clothes of gold, &c. that were left here the other day? be not all these gone? In like manner shall we vanish away, and our bodies, now delicately fed, shall turn to the filth of the earth; wherefore remember my words, and purchase that Palace	140

that is eternal. Thus ſhe did win the King to go to Rome in the habit of a poor man, and become a Monk; and ſhe her ſelf became the Abbeſs of Barking Nunnery, ſeven miles from London. Vol. 1. Page

This Ive was the firſt I read of, of all the Saxon Kings, the which did ſet forth any Laws to his people.

Next to Oſricus followed Celulfus, who was a very learned man, and his time nouriſhed many learned men; among whom was Beda, who dedicated his ſtory, intituled, Anglorum Hiſtoria, not only to be ratified, but alſo to be amended, as ſome Writers affirm.

This Beda (becauſe we have now mentioned him) was (as he witneſſeth in his Hiſtory) a Prieſt of the Monaſtery of Peter and Paul at Wire, and born in the Territories of the ſame Monaſtery. He was from ſeven years bred up by Benet, and became a Deacon at nineteen years, and at thirty a Prieſt: From which time to the nine and fiftieth year, he interpreted the Works of Ancient Fathers, and wrote Treatiſes to the number of thirty ſeven Volumes, which he digeſted into ſeventy eight Books.

For this Beda wrote Pope Sergius the firſt, requiring Celfrid Abbot of Wire-Abbey, to ſend up the ſaid Beda to Rome, for the fame of his learning: The Church of Rome (as appears by that Sergius his Letter) making uſe of Beda for diſcuſſing of many controverſies in learning; all the Latin Church giving him the maſtery in judgment and knowledge of the Latin Fathers. In all his explanations he omitting curioſity of skill, mainly endeavoured to inform his Reader in the love of God, and of his neighbour. Thus Beda continued to the age of ſixty two years. He tranſlated the Goſpel of St. John into Engliſh. He made a comfortable and godly end.

Of Conſtantine the ſixth. See the firſt great Vol. pag. 686.

Pope Zachary is mentioned following in this page.

See alſo pag. 137. of the great Volume, how he forbad all Funeral Exequies, and lamentations to be made for him.

Egbert King of Northumberland erected a Noble Library in York.

This Cuthbert collected this year a great Synod of Biſhops and Prelates, in the month of September, at Cloneſho: there decreeing that Biſhops ſhould be more diligent in admoniſhing the people, live in peace, viſit yearly the Pariſhes of their Dioceſs: That Prieſts ſhould not be ordained till their lives were examined, being ordained, ſhould not meddle with ſecular affairs: with divers other Ordinances touching Monaſteries, Baptiſm, the Holy Supper, Prayer, &c.

Of Leo the Fourth, Emperor of Greece, beſides this page, ſee p. 147.

A Copy of theſe Ordinances Cuthbert ſends to Boniface Biſhop of Mentz, an Engliſh man, which Boniface died a Martyr, as Popiſh ſtories term him. 142

This Boniface, Biſhop of Mentz, writes to Ethelbald King of Mercia in Latin rebuking him, that whiles he contemned lawful Matrimony, he did defile the ſacred Nuns.

This Boniface being admitted Archbiſhop of Magunce by Pope Gregory, the ſecond, brought divers Countries of the Germans under the Pope, and ſet up abundance of Popiſh Prelates and Ceremonies, as worſhipping of Reliques, &c.

☞ In the time of this Archbiſhop, Pope Gregory the ſecond, Pope Gregory the third, Pope Zachary, and before theſe, Conſtantine, the firſt, wrought great maſteries againſt the Greek Emperors, Philippicus, and Leo, and others; for the maintaining of Images to be ſet up in Churches: of whom Philippicus loſt both his Empire and both eyes; and Leo loſt the Popes bleſſing, being Excommunicated by Gregory the third. This Gregory the third was he that penned the four Books of Dialogues in Greek, falſely bearing the name of Gregory the firſt: Which Books after Zachary his ſucceſſor tranſlated into Latin. Of Leo the fourth, ſee in Ann. 775.

Alſo by the authority of the ſaid Archbiſhop Boniface, which he had received from Pope Zachary, Childericus King of France, was depoſed from the right of his Crown, and Pipinus the betrayer of his Maſter, was confirmed.

From this Boniface proceeded that deteſtable Doctrine regiſtred in the Popes Decrees, Diſt. 40. That though the Pope were ſo wicked in himſelf, and towards others, that he led innumerable ſouls to Hell, yet no man ought to rebuke him, having power to judg all men.

Kenulphus ſucceeds ſlain Sigebert, defending his Lordſhip ſtrongly againſt his enemies, till he reſorting to a Paramour he kept at Merton, was there beſet and ſlain.

Offa King of Mercia winning victories of the Kentiſhmen, took ſuch diſpleaſure againſt Canterbury, that he moved the Primacy, the Archbiſhops See, and Lands of Lambrith (by the agreement of Pope Adrian) to Lichfield.

Stephanus Predeceſſor, viz. Pope Zachary, gave the Kingdom of France to Pipinus, depoſing Childerike; and now Pipin gratifies the See of Rome, in giving this Stephanus his time, to that See, the Exarchat or Princedom of Ravenna, the Kingdom of the Lombards, many other great poſſeſſions of Italy, with all the Cities thereto adjoyning, 144

To this Pipinus was ſent into France the invention of Organs out of Greece, by Conſtantine, Emperor of Conſtantinople.

This Pope Paul thundred out Excommunications againſt Conſtantine Emperor of Conſtantinople, for pulling down Images in Churches: but the ſaid Emperor fighting the Pope, held on in his practice, deſtroying Idolatry to the end of his life.

Of this Archbiſhop, ſee pag. 173. of the great Volume.

This Pope Conſtantine was a Lay-man: for the which he was ſhortly depoſed, his eyes thruſt out, and he thruſt into a Monaſtery.

This Pope made a Decree that no Lay-man ſhould be Pope. Alſo he condemned the ſeventh Council of Conſtantinople, as heretical, for condemning worſhipping of Images.

This Pope wrote a Book of the worſhipping and utility of Images, calling them Lay-mens Kalenders, holding a Synod againſt them that ſpeak againſt them.

King Celuphus as his Father turned Monk, dies this year; wherein many Cities, as London, Wint. York, Doncaſter, were burned with ſudden fire, pag. 85.

Till this time the Liturgy of St. Ambroſe was much uſed in the Italian Churches. But now this Adrian confirms the Maſs of St. Gregory above the Maſs of St. Ambroſe, by a pretended revelation and miracle, that when Ambroſe his Maſs-book, and Gregories Maſs-book were put upon an Altar in a Church, the doors ſealed up, the morrow the leaves of St. Gregories Book were ſcattered abroad in the Church, and the other Book lay open upon the Altar: which Adrian expounded, that Gregories Maſs ſhould be diſperſed throughout the Church, and not that of St. Ambroſe.

Carolus following his Father Pipins devotion, did confirm his Fathers Donations to the See of Rome, adding alſo thereunto the City and Dominion of Venice, Hiſtria, &c. The Pope to requite his kindneſs, makes him to be intituled, Moſt Chriſtian King. This Charles makes the Pope Prince of Italy and Rome; and makes Charles Patricium Romanum, and moreover ordained him only to be taken Emperor of Rome. 145

In this year 780, it rained blood at York; which is thought of ſome Expoſitors, to betoken the coming of the Danes into the land, who entred about ſeven years after, in the ninth year of Brightricus King of Weſtſaxons.

Edelburga poyſoneth King Brightricus her Husband, and after playing the Harlot with a Monk, ended her life in great penury and miſery. 146

Irene Empreſs of Greece, takes up at Conſtaminople the body of Conſtantine Emperor of Conſtantinople, her Husbands Father, and having burnt it, caſteth the aſhes into the ſea, for that he diſanulled Images.

Egbert of the blood royal, is baniſhed by Brightricus now raigning over the Weſtſaxons in England; becauſe the ſaid Brightricus feared Egberts coming to his Crown.

The Archbiſhop Ethelard, by his Epiſtles to Pope Leo, obtained the Metropolitan See again to Canterbury, ſee pag. 173. of the great Volume.

King Offa dies. After him ſucceeds Egfert, then Kenulphus, after him his ſon, who in his tender age was wickedly murthered by his ſiſter Quinreda.

Thus far of the troubleſome ſeven Kingdoms of the Saxons; of whom obſerve theſe general obſervations.

1. That they brought in the firſt Croſs and Altar into this Kingdom, Anno 635.
2. They ſet up Schools at Cambridge, Anno 630.
3. They ſet up about { Eleven Monaſteries, beſides four built by King Edgar. / Four Nunneries. / Fifteen more noted Abbeys, beſides many of leſs note.
4. That Queens and Kings daughters, amongſt them in all to the number at leaſt of eighteen, have turned Nuns.
5. That at leaſt nine of thoſe Saxon Kings became Monks.

In this time came in the Danes firſt into the North parts of England, and were driven out again.

Egbert,

Anno Christi	Emp. of France.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England.	Archbishops of Canterbury.
					Egbert, of the blood Royal, being chased into France by Brightricus, as we said, for safety of his Crown from so near a blood; and Brightricus being now dead, he speeds from France into Westsax, obtaining by his wife behaviour the said Kingdom. Bernulphus King of Mercia, and other Kings deriding him with scoffs and rimes, provokes him to bid Bernulph battel, wherein he conquered him, and possessed his Kingdom. Then made he war upon the Kentish Saxons, and conquered them. He also subdued Northumberland. Thus he brought these three Kingdoms to be tributary to him, and joyned them to his Kingdom. Also this Egbert was from the Britains the Town of Chester. Thus these victories being gotten, he calls a Council at Winchester, and is Crowned King over this land, which before was called Britain: but he sent out command and Commissions, that from that day forward the Saxons should be called Angles, and the land Anglia.

The 7 Kingdoms of the Saxons are united into a Monarchy.	Ulfredus.

826			EGBERT.
					A General Synod is held at Aquisgrane, by the command of Ludovicus the Emperor, King of France. There Pope Gregory the Fourth decrees that Priests should have maintenance of Lands belonging to their several Churches, and not go about begging. All glorious apparel, rings, &c. forbidden Priests.
832
833				Feologeldus, alias, Theogild.	About this year the Heathenish people of the Danes (who a little before in Northumberland had murthered the Ministers, and ruined the Churches) came the second time with a great host into England. Egbert gave them battel, but had the worst.
834				In the same year, viz. 832 was, Colambus.	The Danes are incouraged by their success against Egbert to enter again this year into England; and in long time and many years after could not be utterly beaten out.
					Thus this Kingdom hath been hitherto plagued with five sundry Nations: Namely, 1. By the Romans. 2. By the Scots. 3. By the Picts. 4. By the Saxons. 5. By the Danes.
837	Lotharius.
840			ETHELWOLFUS.		Ethelwulfus the Son of Egbert, and in former time a Deacon, and after a Bishop of Winchester (as some will) is King after his Father, by dispensation of the Pope, but still in mind devout to his Order, giving the tenth of his goods and lands in Westsaxons to the Clergy.
844					He gave also Peter-pence to Rome, (i.e.) a peny of every fire house thorough his Kingdoms, with many more Donations to Rome. 151
					He married Judith the Daughter of Carolus Calvus, the French King: whom he restored to the title of Queen. For before it was a Decree of the Westsaxons, for Queen Ethelburga's poysoning of her Husband King Brightricus, that no Kings Wife should have the title of Queen.
843		Sergius the second.			In the later end of the reign of this Ethelwulfus the Danes brake into England, doing great spoil on the land and lives, and blood of men.
846					This Pope, whose name was Os Porci, for the shame thereof, was the first that brought in the altering of Popes names. 153
		Leo the fourth.			This Pope Leo was Tutor or Guardian to Alured, committed to him by Ethelwulf the Father of Alured.
					This Pope ordained that no Bishop should be condemned under seventy two Witnesses. An example was practised in condemnation of Stephen Gardiner.
854					This Pope Joans proper name was Gilberta. She was a Dutch woman of Magunce; who going out of the Abbey of Fulda, with an English Monk in mans apparel to Athens, and becoming learned, by her wit came to sit Pope two years and six months. At last in an open procession fell into travel with her child, and so died. Ever since the Cardinals come not by that part of the street where this shame was.
		Joan, called John the eighth.
		Benedict 3.
856					This Benedict ordained Dirge for the dead.
857			Ethelbald.		Ethelbald the first Son succeeds Ethelwulfe his Father in the Kingdom of Westsaxons. He is infamous for lying with, and marrying of his step-mother. 156
			Ethelbrit, alias, Ethelbertus.		Ethelbrit the second Son succeeds his Father Ethelwulfe in the Kingdom of Kent.
					After these two, the third son of Ethelwulfe, viz. Ethelred, succeeded; who was mightily troubled with the Danes.
858		Nicholas the 1. or Magnus.			This Pope Nicholas enlarged the Popes Decrees, equalling them to the writings of the Apostles. He decreed that Service should be in Latin: He began the forbidding Priests to marry: against which Hulderick Bishop of Ausburgh wrote a learned Epistle to the said Pope, proving the lawfulness of Priests marriage.
867		Adrian, alias Hadrian the second. See p. 180. of the great Vol.
870			Ethelred.		After Ethelbald and Ethelbrit succeeded Etheldred their Brother, the third son of their Father Ethelwulfe.
871				Edmundus, alias, Athelredus.	In the later days of King Ethelred, the Danes invaded this land, spoiling and murthering.

This

Anno Christi	Emper. of Fran.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.
					This John, succeeding next to Hadrian the second, and preceding next before Marinus or Martinus the second (as Mr. Fox calls him) is counted by others, as Rensner, and others, John the eighth. Of this Pope see 208. of the great Volume. Vol. 1 Page.
876	Carolus Calvus.	John the 9.	Alured, alias Alfred, brother to Ethelred.
879					Alured was eminent above his Predecessors, for Valor, Vertue and Learning. He was the first English King. He was much vexed with the Danes, who did win from him all the North part of England, from the River Thames. 157
					But after, they laboring to chase him out of the South part, he flying for the present, after a while beat them, and chased them from those parts, see p. 183. of the great Volume.
882		Martin the 2.
					Others call him Marinus, without any first or second. See Rensners Chronol. and Helvicus. Of this Pope, see pag. 180. of the great Volume.
884		Adrian, alias Hadrian. 3.			By this Hadrian the third (of whom see pag. 180.) it was decreed, that no Emperor after that time, should have any thing to do in the Election of the Pope. Thus the Emperors began to decay, and the Popes to increase.
885		Stephen 5.
889				Plelmundus alias Plegmund.	Of this Pope Stephen, see p. 180. of the great Volume.
					Ethelred having thus overcome the Danes, and having made them to yield to the Conditions that he propounded, one of which was, to baptize their Prince Gutrim, he naming him Athelstan: he permitted the said King Athelstan to hold all Eastangles in Fee from him. Which Athelstan, having reigned rather as a Tyrant then an under King, eleven years, dyed this year. Not long after which, the Danes landed in this Land, in four places. But they were valiantly beaten back. 158
896
897		Formosus.			King Arnulphus, for rescuing of Pope Formosus from his Captivity among the Romans, is Crowned by the said Pope, Emperor
		Bonifacius 6. 9			This Boniface was Pope but five and twenty days.
					This year the Danes come again into England, but some of them were slain; some of them, and thirty Ships, were taken; and others of them were hanged. 162
		Stephen 6.			This Pope Stephen, for hate of Formosus, dissolved his Decrees, took up his Body after it was buryed, and cut two Fingers off his right Hand, and cast them into Tyber; and buried the Body again in a private mans Sepulcher.
898		Romanus. Theodorus 2.			Pope Romanus continued Pope but three months. Theodor the second was Pope but twenty days.
899					Alfred having reigned twenty nine years and six months, dyes. He is reputed for a man of a liberal Heart and a godly Life. He caused Schools of Learning to be set up, especially in the West parts. For amongst the Britains, long before, in King Arthurs time, in the Town of Chester, was taught Grammar, Philosophy, and other Arts and Sciences. After, in Egberts time (as Writers affirm,) Philosophy began to flourish in England. About which time, as some think, Granchester Univerlity by Cambridge began to be founded by Beda. Sigebert also Founded Schools in England, as Alchuinus will. And yet before these, some think that Greeklade, a Greek University; and Latinlade, a Latine University in this Land, was Founded.
					Alfred Translated many good Books, and made one of his own, in the common Language of this Land.
898		John the 10			That Pope John which next succeeded Pope Theodor, and preceded next before Pope Benedict the fourth, was Pope about this year; whom Mr. Fox terms John the tenth: but others, John the ninth.
		Benedict. 4.
	Emp. of Germ.				Of this Translation of the Empire, see p. 169. of the first great Volume, col. 2. lin. 34.
	About this time (saith M. Fox) the Empire is translated from France to Germany among the Almains, where it is to this day.
903			EDWARD the elder.		This King Edward was inferior to his Father Alfred in Learning; but more eminent in military Affairs: Conquering this Land to himself from petty Kings, and from invading Danes.
904		Leo the 5.
905		Christophorus the 1.			Ethelwoldus, King Edwards Uncles son, rebels against King Edward, joining with the Danes. But first he was made to fly into France; after, he returning with more Forces of Danes, is slain.
		Sergius 3.			This Pope Sergius beheaded Pope Formosus after his death; as Pope Stephen the sixth before had disinherited him after death.
906					Of this Comadus, whom Mr. Fox calls Conracus, see p. 169. of the first great Volume.
912		Anastasius 3
913		Lando.			King Edward assaulted of the Danes, he slays two Kings, two Earls, and many thousands of Danes. 163
915		John 11.		Athelmus.	Of others he is counted the tenth Pope John. This Pope was smothered with a Pillow.
924			Adelstan, or Ethelstan.	Wilfelmus.	This Adelstan was King Edwards son, by her of his three Wives that was called Egwin. Adelstan was wise and valiant.
					Duke Elfred conspires to put out Adelstans eyes. He is sworn at Rome upon accusation of it. He forswearing that he intended it not when as he did, fell down, and in three days dyed.
927					Ethelstan, for peace sake with the Danes, he marryed to Sithericus their Kings sister. But Sithericus dying in a year, he seiseth that Province into his own hands.
					Constantine, King of Scots, breaks Covenant with Ethelstan, and thereupon beaten by Ethelstan in War.

Of

Anno Christi	Emp. of Germ.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. 1. Page.
932		John 12.			Of others this Pope John is called the eleventh. This Pope John was the son of Marozia an Harlot. He is deposed by the Clergy and People of Rome, not agreeing to his Election, and Leo the fixth is put in his room.	282
933					Bristanus is Bishop of Winchester; of whom its feigned, that to him praying for departed Souls, as he stood in Winchester Church-yard, many Souls answered, Amen: which if it had been so, how were those Souls in Purgatory?
	The translation of that Empire to Germ. is perfected in				Of this Otho Emperor, see Vol. 1. p. 145. and p. 192. col. 2. of the great Volume.
934		Leo 6.			Of others, as Reusner, &c. he is termed Leo the seventh. He is Pope seven months.
				Odo
935	Otho M.	Stephen 7.			Touching this Stephen to be the seventh, see Vol. 1. p. 162. with p. 162. in the margent.	162
		John the 11 restored.			This Stephen having been Pope two years, according to Mr. Fox, was poisoned. Pope John the twelfth (as Mr. Fox reckons him) is restored to the Popedom again.
940		Leo the 7. Stephen 8.	EDMUND.		Edmund was brother to Athelstan, succeeds in the Crown, Athelstan dying without Issue.
					Monks are put out of Eusham Monastery, and Canons put in their place.
					Odo Arch-bishop of Canterbury lived to this Edmunds time, and called a Synod to stir up Ministers to Preach.
941					Dunstan is now Abbot of Glastenbury, in this Kings time, before he was Archbishop of Canterbury.
		Martin 3. alias Marinus 2.			Of Pope Martin the third, and Agapetus the second, see the first great Vol. p. 189.
942		Agapetus 2.		Elfius.	King Edmund is slain by Pulcher Church. See the first great Vol. p. 196. col. 1.
945			EDWIN.		Edwin the eldest son of King Edmund, succeeds in the Throne after King Edmund.	169
955					This King Edwin kept a strange Woman, the Wife of a man whom he had slain (as some say) to which Woman he on the first day of his Coronation, breaking from his Lords, and going into the Chamber; Dunstan Abbot of Glastenbury, follows him, brings him back by the hand, accuses him to Otho Archbishop; Otho separates him from the Woman, and suspends him out of the Church. For this Dunstan is made fly over the Sea, and the Monks, as well in other Monasteries as Dunstans of Glastenbury, are thrust out, and Secular Priests put in their room.
		John 13.			This was Pope John the Twelfth (as others reckon.) He was an Adulterer, a Whore-master, an Incestuous person, an Extortioner, a Gaimster. From his wicked merriment in these Evils, came the Proverb, As merry as Pope John. He cuts out the Tongues, puts out the Eyes, cuts off the Noses and Fingers of his Cardinals. He himself at last is deposed, but after restored. Of him see the first great Vol. p. 205.
959			EDGAR.		Edwin is hated for his misdemeanors of his Subjects, chiefly them of Northumberland and Mercia, by whom he is removed from his Kingly Honor, and Edgar received in his stead. So that the River Thames divided both their Kingdoms. Edwin having reigned four years alone, dies without Heir, and so Edgar his Brother succeeds.
					He began his Reign this year, being fifteen years old; but was not Crowned till fourteen years after. He calls home exiled Dunstan, makes him Bishop of Worcester, then of London.
				Dunstan.	Otho or Odo Archbishop dying, King Edgar makes Dunstan Arch-Bishop.
		Leo the 8.			This Pope Leo, (of whom see the first great Volume, p. 205.) was substituted Pope in the room of the former deposed Pope John. But the said John being restored, this Leo was deposed. Of this Pope Leo, see pag. 205. of the first great Volume col. 2.
963					Dunstan gets the King to make Oswaldus, Nephew of Otho (as it is said) Bishop of Worcester.
					Not long after, the said King Edgar, at Dunstans intreaty, made Ethelwoldus first Monk of Glastenbury, then Abbot of Abendon, to be Bishop of Winchester. Of him is related a Vision, appearing to him, of a Tree, whose Branches covered the four Quarters of the Kingdom, and were covered with Monks Cowls, and with one master Cowl on the top, &c.
					Whether this Dream be feigned or no, it was made good in effect, Dunstan, Oswald, and Ethelwold, making Monks to swarm in this Edgars time in England.	170
964		Benedict 5.			The Romans setting up this Benedict after Pope John, and not setting in and restoring again Pope Leo the Eighth, deposed contrary to the Emperor Otho his mind; the said Emperor besieged Rome, and puts in again Leo the Eighth, who gratifies the Emperor, with giving to him and his Successors in a Synod, the power of Electing a Pope.
965		John 14.			Alias John the Thirteenth: of him see the first great Volume, p. 205.
969					Oswald (made Arch-bishop of York) by policy makes many Priests turn Monks, or to leave their place.
					Monks anciently were but strict Lay-men; insomuch as they were forbidden to meddle with Ecclesiasticals.	171

Basilius,

Anno Christi	Emperors of Germ.	Roman Bishops.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. 1. Page.
					Basilius magnus, and Nazianzenus, were Monks.
					The ground of mens Founding Monasteries of later times, was, that Monks might pray for them when they were dead; or else by way of satisfaction for some murder committed by the Founders.	172
					King Edgar was a good Justitiary, in execution of Laws justly.
					This King made this Land one perfect Monarchy.	173
					This King having subdued men, drives out too the Wolves out of this Land.
					He was exceeding Watchful, and well provided for the Defence of the Seas.
					To prevent Drunkenness in his Subjects, he caused to be made Cups with pins to be set in them; adding a Law, that he that drank at a draught beyond his mark, was to pay a penny: half to the Accuser, the rest to the Ruler of the Town.
					Eight Kings called Subreguli, did Homage to this Edgar, whom in pomp he made to row him in a Boat, himself holding the Helm.
					He was given to Women, and a great Monk-maker, and a deflowrer of a Nun. For which Dunstan refused to take him by the hand, when the King offered it; and injoyns the King Penance for seven years, of wearing no Crown for that time, of Fasting twice in the Week, of Liberality to the Poor, and building a Nunnery.	174
971					Doting Dunstan was drowned in Superstition, if not a Sorcerer too.	174
972					He is said to catch the Devil by the Nose with a pair of Tongs red hot.
	Otho the 2.	Benedict 6.			Pope John aforesaid, ordained the first Christening of Bells.
		Donus the second. Boniface. 7.			Of Pope Ben. the Sixth, see the first great Volume, pag. 206. where he is cast into prison, and slain.
974					Of Pope Donus, see the first great Vol. p. 206.
975					Of Pope Boniface the Seventh, see the first great Volume, pag. 206. col. 1.
		This Boniface the 7 and this John the 15. are both Popes at once.			This Boniface fearing Conspiracy, flyes to Constantinople; mean while Pope John the Fifteenth, alias the Fourteenth, is made Pope. Then Boniface returns, and so are two Popes at the same time. See the said p. 206.
					Much stir at this time about placing and displacing Monks, caused stir about the Crown, Monks aiming at such a King as would be a Monk favorer: at last, this Edward by Dunstans means was chosen.	175
976			EDWARD the martyr.		This Edward was not, in truth, a Martyr, as the common opinion goes; but was truly a Bastard.
Others count 8 years more.		John the 15.			Of this John the Fifteenth, alias (as others will) John the Fourteenth, and Boniface, had their ends, see the first great Volume, pag. 206. col. 1. John having his eyes put out, and he himself famished in Prison, Boniface dyes, and after is dragged through the City, the people triumphing in it.
977					An Image of the Crucifix of Rood, by Dunstans device, is made to answer to a Council met and praying to this Image, such art answer as might carry the conclusion as Dunstan would; in these words, Absit hoc ut fiat, &c. (i.) Far be that, far be that: you have well judged, you would not do well to change.	177
					Dunstan was a great enemy to Priests wives.
					King Edward his Step-mother, offering him as he sate on Horse-back a cup of Beer, whiles he was drinking, caused her Servant to stab him; whereupon he rides away towards his Company, falls down dead, and so was found; but not known who he was, nor how he dyed, his Horse having dragged him through much dirt, his Foot hanging in the Stirrup, as he fell dead off his Horse-back. Two Nunneries are Founded upon his Blood, that that murtheress Queen had shed.	177
		Benedict 7.			This Benedict (whom Reusn. and Helv. put before the former Pope John, yea though he be taken for John the Fourteenth) was made Pope by consent of Otho Emperor, the second of the name.	178
					In the time of this Benedict, Gilbertus a Necromancer is made Archbishop of Rains, by Hugh Cappet the French King.
979			EGBERED or ELRED.		Edward being murdered, the Crown comes to this Elred his younger brother. This Elred reigned long, viz. thirty eight years, but very unhappily. As he was Christned, being a Child, by Dunstan, somwhat falling cross, Dunstan swears by the Holy Virgin, that this will be an untoward Prince.
985	Otho the 3.
988				Ethelgar.	He is Crowned this year by Dunstan, who pronounced (as they say) at his Coronation, that because he came to the Crown by the murder of his brother, the Kingdom should not be without blood-shed, till a people of a strange tongue did inthrall them.

993					John the fixteenth, alias John the fifteenth.
		John 16.			He sat Pope eight months.
				Elfricus.	The Danes understanding of discord in this Land, and the subjects to be disaffected towards their Prince, invade this Kingdom, doing great spoil. See the first great Vol. p. 207.
		John 17.			Alias John the sixteenth.
995				Siricius. Sandtus. Alfredus.	This year the Bishop of Duresme began, upon occasion of B. Aldulfus his carrying Saint Cuthberts Body thither. See the first great Vol. p. 207.

Against

Anno Christi	Emp. of Germ.	Popes of Rome.	Kings of England.	Kings of Britain in Wales.	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. 1. Page.
						Against this Gregory, maliced because he was a German, was set up this John the eighteenth, alias John the seventeenth, by Crescentius Consul of Rome. Whereupon Otho the third Emperor, to whom Gregory the fifth flyes, comes with an Army, apprehends John, puts out his eyes, and after puts him to death: and apprehends Crescentius, cuts off his nose and ears, and after so led through the City, having his Members cut off he hanged upon a Gibbet.
		Gregory 5. and John 18. both Popes together.				Gregory is restored, reigns Pope four years.
						This year London is belieged of the Danes.
						The Danes spoiling the Land, caused the English levy of Danegilt, amounting from 10000 per annum, to 40000 per annum, paid to the Danes to buy peace of them.
						Now came in the Lurdane, i. the Lord Dane, who was Lord of the English mans House, Goods, and Wife too.
997	The Empire established in Germany by ordaining seven Electors by the Pope.					Pope Gregory the fifth, being restored to the Popedom, calls a Council at Rome, by the advice of Otho the third, Emperor; and there to confirm the Empire in Germany his own Country, Decrees those seven should be Electors of the Emperor, which are to this day: viz.
						The Bishops of Mentz, Triers, Colen do Elect the Emp'ror; are his Chancellors too. Bohemia's King elects, and bears his cup: And Saxons Duke elects, his Sword holds up. Archsewer is Elector Palatine, And Marquess Brandenburg his Chamberlain. These Verses in Latine, see the first great Vol. p. 206.
1000		Silvester 2. made Pope by Magick.				The years of Christ amounting to a thousand, Religion began much more to decay than in former times: Pope Sylvester the second being a Sorcerer, and a most hainous wicked Instrument. See the first great Vol. p. 215.
						This year the Saxons that had driven the Britans from their Land, make way by Elreds joyning in Marriage with the Normans (taking to Wife Emma the Daughter of Rich. the first of that name, the third Duke of Normandy) for a new plague to come upon themselves. For Alred, in confidence of his affinity, gave secret and strict charge to all Towns in England, upon St. Brice his day, at a certain hour, the Danes should be all slain; which caused much trouble.	180
1003		John 19.				Alias John the eighteenth. He brings in the Feast of All-Souls. See the first great Vol. p. 216.
1004						For upon tydings of this at Denmark, King Swanus of Denmark comes into the Land, beats down Exeter, and so came on, spoiling the Country. At length they are beaten out by Duke Uskatel.	180
		Joh 2.				Herein Mr. Fox differs from others, who put no John between All-Souls John, and Pope Sergius the fourth.
1004						The Danes land again in this Kingdom, at Sandwich. The King at last was fain to pay them a Tribute of 30000 pounds.
1006					Elphegus, or Elphege.	Many times after, in this Kings time, did the Danes invade and spoil. They stone to death, at Greenwich, Elphegus Archbishop of Canterbury, because he would not pay to them such Taxes as they would impose.
1012		Benedict 8.				The King is driven out of the Land to Normandy by the tyranny of the Danes, they, mean while, laying intolerable Taxes on the people of this Land, whereupon they fell to Prayer and to Fasting; so that shortly Swanus the Prince of the Danes dyed suddenly, yelling and crying. In fear whereof, Canutus his son Reigned here, with shew of much favor to the people. Of Livingus Archbishop, see the first great Vol. p. 215.
1013					Livingus, or Lifwing.	Egelred returns, hearing of Swanus his death, and coming upon Canutus the son, being unprovided, caused him to fly into Denmark.
						But afterward Canutus came again, and took West-saxon.
1016			Edmund Ironside a Saxon, and Canutus a Dane, Kings together in England.			After Egelreds death, much Faction being moved whom to choose for King, Londoners being for Edmund Ironside, Egelreds eldest Son: Others, and chiefly the Clergy, being for Swanus Son, viz. Canutus; having sworn to Swanus his Father. Edmund and Canutus fight many Battels for the Kingdom; and at last a Duel between themselves: Last of all, they agreed to divide the Land between them, and so lived in love till Edmund was stabbed in the Fundament, by the Traiterous Son of Duke Edricus, as he was at the draught house. Then Duke Edricus himself, liking his Sons Fact, it should seem, carryed Edmunds two Sons to Canutus, with these words, Ave Rex solus, (i.) God save thee King alone. Canutus sends them to his Brother Swanus King of Sweedland, to be murdered: but he abhorring that Bloodineſs, sent them to Salomon King of Hungary, where the one dyed a natural death: The other, named Edward, was married to Agatha, Daughter of his Brother Henry the fourth, Emperor.	181

						This Archbishop Eadsin is not named by Master Fox, as we can find; though he names him before and after him. See the first great Vol. pag. 215.
						Canutus governed this land twenty years, in all which time the Danes began by little and little to be Christian men.	182
1039						Canutus dies. Harold Harefoot (so called for his swiftneſs) his son, reigns in England in his stead.
						This Henry the fourth, Emperor, was Excommunicated by four Popes. See the first great Vol. p. 245.
						Hardeknutus his Brother, King of Denmark, was after him King of England.	182
						Of Henricus the third, Emperor, see the first great Vol. p. 216.
						About this time, wicked Earl Godwin played his feats.
						King Hardeknute, the last of the Danish Kings of England, having reigned here two years, dies without issue.
1043			Edward Confessor.			The Danes from their first landing (in Brightricus time) having vexed this Land 255 years; and having reigned as King twenty eight years; now the last of them being dead without issue, the Crown comes to Edward, the younger son of Egelred, a meer Englishman; returning from his banishment in Normandy, caused by the Danish Kings. He was sent for by the Englishmen, and Crowned this year. His dispolition was much averse from war.
		Silvest. 3.				Pope Benedict the ninth, as we said, coming to be Pope by Magick, and opposing Henricus the third, Emperor, and putting in his room Petrus King of Hungary. After fearing Henry the fourth prevailing against him, sold his seat to Gregory the sixth for 1500 pounds. Of this Gregory see the first great Vol. p. 216.
1045		Benedict 9. restored.
		Gregory 6.	All 3 Popes at once.			Contention moved between this King Edward and Earl Godwin, happened about this time; in which Earl Godwin and his five sons were outlawed.
1046						Of these three Popes, see the first great Vol. p. 216. where Henricus Niger Emperor, displaceth these three, and puts in Clement the second: and thereupon inacting, That no Bishop of Rome should be chosen without the consent of the Emperor. And the Romans swore their assent to this act.
		Clement 2.				William Duke of Normandy comes to see the King, and is welcomed; he promising him (as some write) that if he died without issue, he the said William Duke of Normandy should have this Kingdom.
						The Romans forgetting their Oath to the Emperor, in nine months poyson this Pope. See the first great Vol. p. 216.

King Edward sends to Henry the fourth Emperor, praying him to send to the King of Hungary, that his Cousin Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, might come into England, for as much as he intended to make him King after him. This request was fulfilled, and he came into England, with his wife and children.	184
	Henricus 4.	Stephen 9.				This Henry Emperor, began his reign, being a child. Of him see the first great Vol. p. 211. and p. 217.

1058						Then the King thought to make that Edwards son Edgar Adeling his heir; but fearing (by the pride of Harold the son of Godwin, and the mutability of English hearts) he should not effect it, sent Ambassadors to William Duke of Normandy his Kinsman, affigning him to be lawful heir next to succeed him to the Crown.
						Not long after (Godwin being dead) his son Harold grows so wickedly proud, that he ruled all as King, by reason that the King somewhat favoured him. At length he failing towards Flanders, and being driven by tempest into Normandy, there William Duke of Normandy makes him to swear he would marry his daughter, and that after King Edwards death, he should keep the land of England to his behoof, according to the will and mind of King Edward, and so to live next to him in honour and dignity, in the Realm. At his return to England he tells King Edward what he had sworn to Duke William of Normandy, with which the King was well pleased.
1059						Pope Nicholas the second having called a Council at Sutrium, and by the help of Hildebrands device having made Benedict the tenth to unpope himself; now he calls a Council at Rome, which is called the Lateran Council; in which he undermineth the Emperor of his jurisdiction, and conferreth the Election of the Pope upon a few Cardinals.

						King Edward dies.
						This year Aldredus Biſhop of Worceſter being to be made Archbiſhop of York, comes with Earl Toſtius of Northumberland to Pope Nicholas to Rome for his Pall, inſtead of which (for ſome pretence) was deprived of all his dignity; and as he was returning home, was ſpoiled of that he carried with him. At laſt Toſtius with rough words to the Pope, makes the Pope give the Biſhop his Pall, for all his loſſes.

But becauſe Duke William's daughter was dead, King Harold thought himſelf diſingaged from that agreement. He alledged alſo that thoſe promiſes were compelled, and without conſent of his Lords, which ought not to be.
						Hereupon, and for two other reaſons, namely, to be revenged for the blood of his Nephew Alfrid, King Edwards brother, and of the Normans, of all whoſe deaths Harold was reputed the principal cauſe, and to revenge the exſilement of Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whereof Harold was cauſe, Duke William invades this Kingdom, and conquers Harold in battel, wherein Harold was ſlain; and ſo Duke William (who was Couſin German to *K. 					Henry the fourth, Emperor, attends upon this Pope, with his wife and children barefoot, at his Palace-gate, three days and three nights, before he could be admitted in; then too he is made to ſwear unreaſonable ſubjection to the Pope in all things; and when all is done, the Pope gives away his Crown to Rodulph Duke of Suevia, with theſe words,
					The Rock to Peter gave the Diadem, And Peter gives it unto Rodulphs Realm.
					Hildebrand is accuſed of grievous crimes in a Council called at Brixia, by Henry the fourth, Emperor, who had been ſo wronged by Hildebrand.
1083		Clemens 3.			In this Council, called by Henry, Hildebrand is condemned to be depoſed, and Clement the third is choſen Pope in his room.
1088					About this time, or not much after Hildebrand the Pope, dies K. William the Conqueror.	204
		Victor 3.			Of Popes ſee the firſt great Volume, pag. 239.
					Great Peſtilence is in England.
		Urban 2.			Rats ſwim over to a Biſhops Tower, that was cruel in time of famine to the poor, and devour him.
					William Rufus is Crowned by Archbiſhop Lanfrancus, his elder Brother. Duke Robert in Almaine comes to fight for the Crown; whereupon William Rufus mildly quieted him, by taking the Crown from him at 3000 Marks per Annum, and agreeing that the longeſt liver of them two ſhould take the Crown.	207
		Pope Paſchalis 2.			The King did not much favour the Pope, becauſe as Matthew Pariſienſis writes, They follow not the ſteps of Peter, but hunt for reward; and had not the power of him, whoſe holineſs they did not imitate.
1091			Will. Rufus is entire Monarch.		Lanfrancus Archbiſhop of Canterbury dies (Polydore much commends him, I ſee not for what.) After whom the Archbiſhoprick is void four years.
1092					Extream tempeſts in England burn a Church, break the head of a Crucifix, throw down the Lady, at Wincomb, and blow down ſix hundred houſes, as alſo the roof of Bow-Church at London.
1093					Pope Urban calls a Council at Rome; in it he Excommunicates Lay-perſons that conferred ſpiritual livings.	208
					Pope Urban calls a Council at Claremount, where he by an Oration moves 30000 to go to Hieruſalem, to ſuppreſs the tyrannizing Heathens that were over the Chriſtians.
1095				Anſelm.	This being about the ſixth year of King Rufus, Malcom King of Scots invades England, and is ſlain (himſelf having been a great murtherer) with his ſon Edward, and Margaret his wife.
1096					This ſame year alſo, he, after he had kept Canterbury Archbiſhoprick four years, gave it to this Anſelm, who for the Kings kindneſs, much croſſed him in many things for a long time, all Biſhops holding with the King againſt Anſelm. Many of thoſe that went to Hieruſalem, in the way are by ambuſhment ſlain by the Bulgars, near to the Town Civitot. Yet at laſt when all the armies met, they went on, won ſome Towns, as Antioch, and ſlew many Saracens.
1098					Corbona, Maſter of the Perſians Chivalry, is ſlain by the Chriſtians that went in the ſaid Voyage to Hieruſalem; with whom were alſo ſlain 100000 Infidels. Shortly after the Chriſtians take Hieruſalem. Robert Duke of Normandy was choſen King thereof, but he refuſed it, becauſe he heard of the death of William Rufus in England; wherefore he never proſpered after.	209
					Earl Ludovicus rebells againſt Henry the fourth, Emperor; againſt whom and which, Waltramus Biſhop of Merburgh writes an Epiſtle, exhorting him to obedience.	214
					The Earl writes an anſwer.	ibid.
1099		Paſchalis 2.			This year 1090, (as Gisburn reports) a ſpring boils out bſood three weeks together. See the firſt great Volume, pag. 256.
					Of this Pope Paſchalis ſee the firſt great Vol. p. 242.
					He ſets up again Henry the fourth Emperor, having Excommunicated him, as did Hildebrand, his ſon Henry, making him Emperor, called Henry the fifth; as it follows in Anno 1105. See pag. 254, 255. of the firſt great Volume.
100			Henry the 1. ſirnamed Beauclerk;		This King Henry the firſt was William the Conquerors third ſon, who now ſucceeds his brother Rufus. He had his name of Beauclerk, for his knowledg in the ſeven Liberal Arts.	216
					Duke Robert the eldeſt brother of K. Henry, and firſt ſon of William the Conqueror, comes to challenge the Crown of this Henry, as he did of William Rufus. And this Henry promiſeth him the three thouſand Marks per Annum, as Rufus had before; and ſo Duke Robert returned to Normandy ſatisfied. After Duke Robert and K. Henry fall out, and Duke Robert was taken in war a priſoner, brought to England, and kept in priſon while he lived. And Normandy was ſubdued to King Henry the firſt.
1101					This King Inveſted Biſhops without the Pope.
					About this year 1101, the Biſhop of Fluence began to preach of Antichriſt to be there born and manifeſted. Pope Paſchalis hereupon calls a Council, wherein the Biſhop, and condemns his Book. See the firſt great Volume, p. 254.

	Henry 5.				Great variance between Anselme and the King.
1103					Of this Henry the fifth, Emperor, see before in Pope Paschalis the second, and his time and story; and in the next year here following.	217
1105					Henry and Christian two famous Archbishops of Mentz, right vertuous men, were about this time cruelly and tyrannically handled by the Bishop of Rome.	221
					This same year Anselm getting leave of the King to call a Council, in it by his Decrees cuts off the authority of any Lay-persons investing spiritual persons, the freedom of Bishops to bear office in secular mens businesses, and the power of Priests to marry. See the first Volume, p. 251.
1106					The Emperor Henry the fourth being conquered in battel of his rebellious son Henry the fifth, set against him by Pope Paschalis the second, is so poor, that he intreated the Bishop of Spire (to whom he had been kind) to have a Prebend there; having some skill to serve in the Ladies Quire: but the Bishop swearing by the Lady a flat denial; the Emperor forlorn of Son, Kingdom, Bishop, and all, goes to Leodium and there dies (having reigned fifty years) whose body buried, Paschalis takes up again, and causeth it to be kept unburied five years.	222
1107					Henry the fifth coming to be Crowned at Rome, could not obtain it, till he ratified it, that no Emperor should have to do in the Election of the Roman Bishop. Afore he yielded to it; and about other things, there was such opposition between this Henry the fifth and the Pope, that unlesse he had defended himself with his own hands, he had been slain.
1109					Anselm Archbishop died. The See is void five years. The Bishoprick of Ely first founded. Henry the Bishop.	223
1110					Trent river dried up about Notingham, from morning till three in the afternoon, that men might go over dry-shod. Gisburn.
1113					Thames this year, from the Tower to the Bridg, from midnight to next evening, scarce knee deep: innumerable people and children wading over; the Tyde falling short of its custom ten miles.
1114					This year Worcester is burnt.
1115				Radulphus.	This Pope Gelasius was set up by the Cardinals, without the Emperor.
1118		Gelasius 2. and Gregory 8. both Popes together.			Thurstinus chosen Archbishop of York; will not make his procession of obedience to the See of Canterbury, where he was consecrated, for which the King deprives him. Hence rose great ado between the Archbishop Thurstinus and the King.
		Gregory 8. and Calixtus 2. (Gelasius being gone) are both Popes together.			This Pope Gregory is set up by the Emperor.
1119					Pope Gelasius is driven into France.
					This Pope Calixtus is set up by a few Cardinals. He first excommunicates the Emperor Henry the fifth, then drives P. Gregory out of Rome.
					The Emperor is again forced to ratifie his consent, of passing away his right of chooling the Bishop of Rome; and moreover to ratifie this Pope Calix. to be Pope, though the Emperor, P. Gregory was yet alive.
					Pope Calixtus in the business about Thurstin Interdicts the Church of Canterbury and York, and all the Parishes within the same; unless Thurstin without exacting subjection to Canterbury be admitted to the See of York; and that the King (saith the Pope in his Epistle to England) should be excommunicated, except he consented to the same.	224
1122					Thurstin is received to his See, and reconciled to the King.
1125	Lotharius Saxo.	Honorius 2.			The King calls a Council at London, where he gets the Clergy to give him the punishment of married Priests; which granted, for money the King lets them have their wives.
1128					The Order of the Knights of the Rhodes, called the Johannites, and of the Templars, rose up at this time.
1130					The Priory of Norton founded.
		Innocent 2. and Anacletus 2. both Popes together.			The King is troubled with three Visions, the first of multitudes of Husbandmen flying on him with their Mattocks; requiring the debt he owed unto them. The second of Soldiers, falling upon him. The third of Bishops, threatning him with their Episcopal staves. To prevent the coming to pass of these, he vowed three things: first, repentance, secondly, alms, and thirdly amendment of life.
1131					The King is in a great tempest at Sea in this year 1131. He releaseth to the Commons Danegilt: he gave to the Churchmen much; and looked to execution of justice, as after his deliverance from the tempest, to fulfill his three Vows.
1135			Stephen.		King Henry dies, being in Normandy.
1136					Notwithstanding the Oath of Stephen and of the Nobility to Maud formerly, before her Father, they set not up her, or young Henry the son: but this Stephen, sisters son to King Henry, takes upon him the Crown, and him the Nobility Crown on St. Stephens day.	226
					The King takes the Bishop of Sarum, and the Bishop of Lincoln, and puts ropes about their necks, and led them to Castles held against him, threatning to put to death the Bishops, unless the rebels would yield.
1138	Conradus 3.
				Theobald.	This Conradus Emperor, is the only man, among many Emperors, that did not receive his Crown from the Pope.	228
1140					Maud the Empress comes with a great army into England, being aided by the Earls of Gloucester and Chester, and wars on King Stephen, and takes him prisoner. Then the Kentishmen and Londoners war against Maud

					Maud, and takes the Earl of Gloucester Prisoner. So he and King Stephen are freed by exchange. Then King Stephen in all hafte gathers another Army, and chaseth Maud the Empress out of the Land.
					But the Earl of Gloucester and Chester were so strong, that they in Fight had almost taken King Stephen.
					Eustace, King Stephens Son, wars against Normandy, but in vain.
					Henry Duke of Normandy makes War in behalf of his Mother Maud, with great puissance in England, winning the Tower of London, and many other places.
					Eustace, King Stephens Son, dies.
1143					Peace is made between King Stephen and Henry of Normandy; upon this condition, that Stephen should enjoy the Kingdom his life-time; and mean while Henry should be proclaimed in the chief Towns of the Kingdom, Heir apparent to the Crown.
		Celestine 2. Lucius 2.			The Jews Crucifie a Child in Norwich.
1144					This year also comes in, the curfing with Bell, Book and Candle.
		Eugenius 3.			These two Popes, Lucius and Eugenius, much withstood the Romans this time, in their laboring to recover the old manner of chooling their Consuls and Senators.
					In the time of King Stephens Reign (its not set down distinctly in what years) flourished as some Authors affirm. Gratianus, compiler of the Popes Decrees. Petrus Lombardus, master of the Sentences. Petrus Comestor, writer of the Scholast story. Hugo de Sancto Victore. Bernardus Clarevallensis. Hildegare the Nun, a Prophetess. Johannes de temporibus, who (as most of our old Authors affirm) lived 361 years: He lived the last of his days in this Kings time. } Brethren.
					In this Kings time, by Theobald Archbishop it was Decreed, that Bishops should teach their Flock more diligently, that reading of the Scriptures should be more frequented in Abbies, that Priests should learn and teach the Lords Prayer and the Creed in English.
1152	Fredericus Barbarossa.				Being the sixteenth year of King Stephen, Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury and Legate to the Pope, began in the Council at London, the new found appellations from Councils to the Pope, invented by Henry Bishop of Winchester.
1153		Anastasius 4 Adrian 4.	Henry 2.		This Pope Adrian was an Englishman, his Sir-name was Breakspear, he belonged once to St. Albons, he kept much ado also to put down the Roman Consuls, Senators, &c.	228
1154					This King Henry, was the first year of his reign, subdued Ireland; and not long after made Thomas Becket Lord Chancellor of England. He subdued William King of Scotland: He subduing Wales, cut down many woods to make the way plain. He also had in his Rule the Iles Orcades, also Poictou and Guien, Normandy, Gascoine, Angeou and Chinon. Also Alverne and the City of Tholouse he won. Lastly, by the Title of his Wife Elenor, Daughter to the Earl of Poictou, he obtained the Mounts Pyram in Spain. None of his Progenitors had so many Countries.
1157					Two Suns seen in the Firmament in England.
1158					Three Suns seen three hours in Italy.
					Three Moons appear, whereof the middle had a red Cross overthwart the face: which bestowed (as some conceive) the great Schism between the Cardinals, for the election of the Bishops of Rome: or else rather the business between Fredericus Barbarossa, Emperor, and the Pope, Adrian, of which more will follow by and by.
					After the appearance of those great Lights in the Firmament and Air, appeared in the Church Gerhardus and Dulcinus, Preachers against the Antichrist of Rome, as he that was prefigured by the Whore of Babylon in in the Apocalyps. These two (as Robert Guisburnes story affirms) brought thirty with them into England; who by the King and Prelates were all burnt in the Fore-head, and so driven out of the Kingdom, and after (as Illyricus writeth) were slain by the Pope.
					The business between Pope Adrian the fourth, was: first, that the Emperor held the Popes stirrup on the left side; who excused himself to the offended Pope, by telling him, That he had not been used to hold stirrups. The next day the Emperor makes amends by holding it on the right side. Secondly, that the Emperor having marched into Italy, subduing some Rebels, he was informed by the Pope, that according to the former custom of Carolus Magnus subduing the Lombards, Otho the Berengarians, and Lotharius the Normans, who left for the See of Rome some token of benevolence, for the obtaining their Victories, he should likewise upon this Victory of his, leave a benevolence; and in particular, it must be Apulia; which at his own cost and pains he must win from Duke William, that it might be restored again to the Church of Rome. This business was so resolved upon by the Pope, that until the Emperor promised the same, he could not receive his Crown from the Pope. For the Popes in those days had the Em-perors at this a-bey, that for to be Crowned they were fain to yield to any thing.

					But the Pope himself in stirring in the execution of this Plot, was so besieged by William the Duke, that before intreated peace of the Pope, which would not yield it upon any terms, that they were forced to intreat the Duke for peace; which was granted, with profitable conditions to the Duke.
					The Emperor this while sitting quietly at home, and considering how the Pope had wrested his power in Election of Popes, investing of Prelates, &c. how he had pilled and polled all Nations by the Legates, and sown discord in his Empire: Hereupon he requires Homage and Oath of Allegiance of all his Bishops; and forbids the Popes Legates to enter into the Empire, without his sending for, and all Appeals to Rome. Finally, In his Letters he prefixed his name before the Emperor.
					Hereupon the Pope writes a rebuking Letter to the Emperor. The Emperor writes back, in defence of his doings, an Apologetical Epistle. The Pope replies with a Bull of Excommunication. The Emperor makes answer to that with accusatory Letters against the vilenes, pride, &c. of the See of Rome. Then the Pope writes to the German Bishops to work against the Emperor. The Bishops they write their excuing of the Emperor.	229
					This Pope towards the end of his life (who dyed amidst those broils, being chouked with a Fly as he was walking abroad) was wont to say, That there was no more miserable kind of Life in the Earth, than to be a Pope.	230
					This Pope, being set up by the Popes Faction. } The two Popes made great Schism and Tumult. This Victor was set up by the Emperor and nine Cardinals. }
1159		Alexander the third, and Victor the fourth, both Popes together.			The Emperor to quiet them, sent for them to appear before him. Alexander scorns the motion; Victor doth appear: him therefore the Emperor aids to the City, and settles him to be Pope. Alexander then flying to France, to Secil and Venice, works by mony and cunning; gets the City of Rome on his side to set up such Consuls as were for his turn. Also of the French, and Venetians, and Apulians, he got force of Ships and Arms on his side: against which the Emperor sends his Son Otho with Ships and Men well appointed, against the Venetians and the Pope; charging him to do nothing till he should come to him. But he not tarrying for his Father, was beaten and taken: for the delivery of whom, the Emperor was fain to submit himself to the Pope; who putting his Foot upon the Emperors Neck, spake these Words: Thou shalt walk upon the Adders and Basiliks, and shalt tread down the Lyon and Dragon. Mean while the Emperor speaking to the Pope from under his Foot, Not to thee, but to Peter: The Pope answers, Both to me and to Peter. Thus the Emperor having subjected himself, promising to take Alexander for the true Pope, and to restore all he had taken away from Rome, departed.
					Pope Alexander the third, sitting Pope one and twenty years, calling divers Councils at Turo, ratified the wicked acts of Hildebrand.	231
1160					This year many chief Men of Lyons walking together, one whereof falling down dead, to the amazement of them all, one Waldus a rich man, was above all the rest, by Gods Spirit working together with the example, stricken with a sound inward repentance, a new life following thereupon, with great study of the Word of God, wherewith he much instructed his family, others also resorting to him to be taught; and so he became the original of the Waldenses.
1161				Tho. Becket	This Becket lived in the time of this Pope Alexander. He did not (as some affirm) dye a Martyr, but a stubborn man against his King; who had preferred him from an Arch-deacon, to be Lord Chancellor of England, and after to be Arch-bishop of Canterbury.
					The Pope, viz. Alexander the third, holds with Becket in his obstinacy	234
					against the King and his Laws.	235
					The Bishops generally counselling Becket to submission to the King, are	236
					sharply rated by him.	247
					This year a child was Crucified by the Jews.	263
1167					This year a Collection of two pence in every pound, was gathered throwout all England and France, for the succor of the East Christians against the Turks.
1169					This year, being about the fifteenth year of King Henry the second, so feared, lest the Arch-bishop would proceed to Excommunication of his own Person, that he appealed to the Pope, intreating him to send down two Legates to England, to take up the matter between him and his Arch-bishop.
1170					This year the Doctrine of the Waldenses (coming of that Waldus an able and learned man in the Scriptures and true Godlines, as hath been seen

Anno Christi	Emper. of Germ.	Popes of Rome.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol. I. Pag. seen in old Parchments, and Records of things of his penning) sprang up more and more in the time of this wicked Pope Alexander, who with his Faction much set against these Christians, whose tenents are ordinarily to be seen to be very Orthodox and sound.
					This year William King of Scots, with David his Brother, do Homage to England.
					This year Babylon was destroyed (and never built again) by Almaricus King of Jerusalem.
					Becket this year bare another grudge against the King, because King Henry the second, by Authority of the Parliament, Crowning his Son King, by the hands of the Arch-bishop of York, and other Bishops, not sending for him. Also he makes the Pope to suspend the Bishops.	252
					This same year also Ludovike the French King, came with a great Army against the King to Normandy, for not Crowning Margaret his Daughter, with her Husband.
1171					Becket is slain by four Souldiers. Many Authors alleadged that condemned Beckets carriage towards the King.	253
					Abundance of strange lies are reported touching Beckets miracles.	255
					Of him was made this blasphemous Anthem:	256
					For the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did spend, Grant us Christ to climb Where Thomas did ascend.
					The Pope is angry, and more incensed by Ludovike the French King, for the death of Becket.
					The Pope injoyns the four Knights that killed Becket such hard penance of going to Jerusalem barefoot in linen Breeches, with much Fasting and Prayer, that in few years after they are said to dye.
				Richard.	The King subdued Ireland, and four of the five Kings thereof: the King of Tomeia in that Land, denying to be subdued; keeping in Woods and Marishes.
1172					The Legates from the Pope, being come into Normandy, touching the death of Becket, the King repairs to them, swears he neither assented to, nor assisted in Beckets death; but only spake rigorously against his Knights which did not avenge him of Becket. For which the Legates injoyn the King great penance, of fighting against the Turk, and obliging himself to the Pope.
1173					All England almost diseased with a Cough.
1174					William King of Scots, is Imprisoned in England, being taken in War. See the first great Vol. p. 302.
1175					This year Canterbury City is almost all burnt.	256
					A Convocation of Bishops is held this year about the subjection of Bishopricks to the Arch-bishop of York, and of York to Canterbury.
					This year King Henry the second divides the Kingdom into six parts, appoints for every part three Justices of Assise.
1176					The ancient Custom of exempting Priests from the temporal Sword, in case of Murther, inflicting on them only Excommunication: this year, in this King Henries time, began to be altered, by the procurement of Richard Arch-bishop of Canterbury.
1177					Ireland this year is subdued to the King of England.
					Hovenden in this year brings in Letters of Pope Alexander to Roger Arch-bishop of York, and the Bishop of Duresm.
1178					Contention between the Arch-bishop of York and Canterbury revives.
1179					The Popes Commissioners persecute sorely some in Tholouse, holding against Transubstantiation.
					Pope Alexander, in some of those many Councils held at Laterane, whereof was one this year, and in France, &c. Decreed, That no Arch-bishop should receive the Pall, unless he would first swear. The form of giving the Pall and taking the Oath, see the first great Volume, p. 298.
					Under the Reign of this Henry the second, the Dominions and Crown of England extended farther than ever before in England.	258
					Viz. He is King over { Scotland. Ireland. England. Normandy. Aquitan. Gant, &c. To the Mountain of Pirenei, which be the uttermost parts of the great Ocean in the British Sea.

					Pisanus Burgundo, a very Learned man in Greek and Latine, presents to Pope Alexanders Council, Chrysostoms Homily on the Gospel of John, translated out of Greek into Latine.
					He is Protector of France; Philip the French King yielding himself and his Realm wholly to his Governance.
					He

					He was offered to be King of Jerusalem, but he refused it, fearing the rebellion of his sons in his absence.
					Princes from most parts of Christendom came to this King, for his wisdom to be advised, and have questions determined.	258
					He maintained great Wars much of his thirty five years he reigned; yet never put he any Tax upon the Laity, or First-fruits or Appropriations upon the Clergy; and yet dyed worth 900000 pounds, besides Jewels, precious stones, and houshold Furniture.
					This many-ways-happy King, was unhappy in his Sons, who stood in armor against him, taking part with the French King against him; causing him with extreme grief to fall sick, and in four days to dye.
					The King being dead, bled afresh at the coming near one of his Sons; whereby the Beholders concluded, that he was the Author of his Fathers death.
					His Sons (their Kingly Father being dead) unsuccessful in their Designs, as what else could be expected of such Sons? lose all their Fathers Dominions beyond Sea.
1184				Baldwinus.	Great contention was between this Baldwinus and the Monks of Canterbury. See the first great Vol. p. 309.	267
1185		Urban 3.			Pope Urban writes to Arch-bishop Baldwin, sharply rebuking him, and upholding the Monks. In few days after he dyes.
1187					This year King Henry pays to Rome 40000 marks of Silver, and five thousand of Gold, for the death of Becket.
					Arch-bishop Baldwin begins the building of the new House at Lambeth, with the Church.
1188		Gregory 8.			Pope Gregory dyes with sorrow for the loss of the Holy Cross.
		Clement 3.			This Pope Clement forbids Arch-bishop Baldwin to proceed. And also sharply writes (as did Pope Urban) to rebuke him as an oppressor of the Monks of Canterbury.
1189					This Pope Clement sends another more sharp Letter to this Arch-bishop, by his Legate Radulphus, to the same effect.
					This year Pope Clement writes a third Letter to Arch-bishop Baldwin.
			Richard the first, surnamed Cœur de Lion.		This King forbidding any Jews to approach his Palace at his Coronation, the Jews notwithstanding pressing on, were by the Gate-keepers smitten, and at last many, on boldship of the Kings command of keeping them out of the Palace, flew many of them; on which was raised a report, that all the Jews must be destroyed; insomuch, that the Londoners fired divers houses of the Jews, and the Inhabitants in them.
					The King strongly took part with the Arch-bishop against the Monks.
					The King sorrowing for his rebellion against his Father, for satisfaction agrees with King Philip of France to go to the Holy Land, to recover Christ his Patrimony, as they called it. In which Voyage, as he had much contention with the unthankful hearted French King, so he had divers Victories against the enemy; as against Isakius King of Cyprus, and against Jechon and others. See following, Anno 1192, &c.
1190	Henricus 6. son of Fredericus Bar. 5.				The manner of the Popes Crowning this Emperor, see in the next year.
					In this year was a great Northern brawl, on Twelfth-Even, between the Arch-bishop elect of the Church of York, and his Company on the one side, and Henry Dean of that Church, and his Chanter and Singing-men on the other side; because the Dean and his Quirefters presumed to begin their Service before the Bishop came: whom they conceived to stay too long in attiring himself, or some such occasion. The Arch-bishop bids them stay their over-forward Service, now half done at the Bishops coming in: The Dean and Chanter bids them proceed on. At last, the Arch-bishop silenced the Service, and makes them begin again the first part, which he had not yet heard: The others, seeing the Bishops Authority to make the Service begin again, put out the Lights; whereby these Popish Devotions, which cannot be done without Candle-light, were for the present extinguished.
1191		Celest. 3.			King Richard sends over his Gallies to Naples, there to meet his Mother Elenor, and Berengaria the Daughter of Sanctius King of Navar, whom he purposed to Marry, who shortly after meet together.	275
					Henry Emperor is Crowned (upon condition of restoring many things to St. Peter, pretended by the Pope to have been taken away) the Pope holding the Crown between his Feet, and so the Emperor stoops with his Head to take it on: the Pope setstoons with his Foot striking it off (intimating his Power to Depose him as well as to Crown him) the Cardinals taking up the Crown thus kicked off, and putting it on again.	276
					In this absence of the King of England, by reason of his Voyage to the Holy-land, the King had appointed the Government of the Realm to Hugo Bishop of Durham, and William Bishop of Ely. To Hugo of Durham was committed Windsor Castle: to William of Ely the Tower of London. To these two Bishops were adjoyned four chief Justices: Hugh Bardolf, William Marshall, Geffery Peterson, and William Brure, to have the hearing and overlight over all Causes. But above all these, the Bishop of Ely (being Chancellor, and by his Mony got to be the Popes Legate) took upon him mightily, taking away Windsor Castle from the other Bishop. It is incredible to think how intemperately this Bishop and Chancellor misused themselves after the Kings departure into	278

					into Syria, in excess of pride, and in cruel exactions and oppressions of the Kings Subjects.
					A great contention arose between John Earl of Morton, the Kings Brother, with other States of the Realm, and the said William Bishop of Ely, through his pride usurping all the government of the Kingdom to himself. In short, he was at variance with many of the great persons of the Kingdom, till by Earl Johns means and others, he was for his ill behaviour fain to disguise himself in Womans apparel, make to the Sea side, and to sail out of the Kingdom, complaining to Pope Celestine, and sending Letters to the King, complaining to him likewise.
1192					The King gets Victories against the Saladine, got Sclavonia from the Saracens.
1193				Hubertus.	The French King not agreeing with King Richard, returns home, invades Normandy, perswades John the Kings Brother to take upon him the Crown of England in the Kings absence; whereby he made League with the French King, and did him Homage.
					King Richard hearing this, makes peace with the Turk for three years, and returns homeward; who, as he was coming, by Tempest was driven to Histria, to a Town called Synaca, and taken by Lympold Duke of that Country, and by him sold to the Emperor for sixty thousand Marks; which Emperor writes his triumph therein to the said French King.
					The King is thus a Captive a year and three months.
					This while the French King wars upon Normandy, and makes Earl John, King Richards Brother to invade England. But by the Barons he was made fly into France. At last for 100000 pounds to the Emperor, the King was released; that mony being made up of Chalices, Crosses and other Church-plate.
1195					This year the Pope granted that Priests might administer with Latin and tin Chalices (the Silver and Gold being gone to redeem the King) and so it continued long after.	281
1196					Lympoldus Duke of Austrige fell in displeasure with the Bishop of Rome, and died excommunicate.
1197					Philip King of France breaks his Truce made with Richard King of England, so that King Richard was fain to sail over into Normandy to withstand him.
					Fulco, alias Gualter, Archbishop of Rome, rebukes the King for his three Daughters. The King in a rage calling him mad man, and saying, I have no Daughter. Fulco replies, telling him that his three Daughters were Pride Covetousness and Luxury; and that unless the King did marry them away they would undo him and his Kingdom. To which the King calling the Nobles, reciting Fulco his Parable, and confessing his fatherhood of such Children, makes this answer, Here before you all I give my Daughter Pride to Wife unto the proud Templars; my Daughter Avarice to the covetous order of the Cistercian Monks: and my Daughter Luxury to the riotous Prelates.	281
1198		Innocent the third.			King Richard the first, viewing a Castle, is hit with an Arrow in the Arm, with the setting of the iron whereof he dies.
1199	Otto the fourth.				This King John was the Brother of King Richard, and Earl of Morton; being crowned and sworn with a strict charge of the Archbishop to keep the Laws, he sails over into Normandy, and makes truce with the French King for a time.
			John.		King John being divorced from his Wife, Daughter of the Earl of Glocester, being in the third degree of kindred; by the counsel of the French King, he marries Isabel, Daughter of the Earl of Angulla; and then Arthur of Britain did Homage to King John for Britain and other places.	282
1200					About this time arose divers contentions between King John and the Archbishop for sundry things.
1202					Philip the French King in a communication between him and King John, requires King John to part with all his Lands in Normandy, and Pictavia, which he had beyond the Sea, unto Arthur his Nephew, the Son of King John's elder Brother, and that presently, or else he would war against him. King John denying it, the French King warring, and Arthur assisting, King John takes Arthur Prisoner, and scarce leaves any of the French to carry back tidings.
1203					This year King John for lack of rescue lost all his Holds, (as Writers affirm) and Possessions in Normandy, through the force of the French King.
1205					Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury deceaseth. The younger sort of Monks at midnight choose their superiour Reignold, and without the Kings licence, privately placeth him in the Metropolitical Seat, singing Te Deum, and after post him away to the Pope.
1206					The next year the contention between the Suffragans and Monks of Canterbury about the said Election, is brought before the Pope, who passed sentence on the Monks side, charging the Suffragans and Bishops of Canterbury henceforth to meddle no more with that Election, but to let the Monks alone.
1207					The Monks of Canterbury now having the said Elect of an Archbishop in their own hands, fall at odds between themselves, the younger against the elder; the younger standing for Reignold, the elder choose another.	283
				Stephen Langton.	They

					They bringing their cause, their Elections and Allegations before Pope Innocent the third; he condemning both their Elections, commanded them to choose Stephen Langhton, then Cardinal of Saint Chrysogen, for their Archbishop, which done, though with secret muttering of many the Monks, they sung Te Deum.
					The King was content to let this Election thus to pass, so as he might have his Sovereignty entire. But this Archbishop Langhton was so proud and stubborn against the King, that the King sent abroad into all parts of the Kingdom Letters Certificatory of the same. Whereupon the Pope mightily setshimself against King John, interdicting and cursing King John, and all that should eat, drink, talk, &c. with him; insomuch that at last the King was fain to pass over his Crown to the Pope.	285
1212	Frederick 2.				The French King makes an attempt in hope to get the Crown of England, but the English take 300 of the French Kings Ships, and so defeated his project.
1215					Pope Innocent the third calls a Synod at Rome, called the Council of Lateran, upon this occasion. Princes now beginning to resist the Pope, whereby many Princes were excommunicated, as Otho the Emperor, John King of England, Peter King of Aragon, Raimund the Earl of Tholouse, Aquitania, Sataloni, &c. The Pope now to prevent any future increase of oppositon, inacts in this Synod, that the Pope henceforth should have the correction of all Christian Princes.	287
					In this Council also was first invented Transubstantiation; and forbidding Priests Marriage was confirmed.
					To this Council were these great men in England summoned to appear, who would not consent to the expulsion and tyrannical deposing of their King. But the other side and faction of the Nobility opposed their King lustily, desiring Philip the French King to send his eldest Son Ludowick with a great power, and they would choose him for their King, and so he came and was chosen; howbeit against the Popes consent, who charged the French King rather to help King John against his rebellious Subjects, for that (saith the Pope) King John is my feudary Tenant. But this hindred not.	288
1216		Honorius 3.			Simon Langhton is chosen Archbishop of York. But that choice was anon dissolved, information being given to the Pope, that he was Brother to that Stephen Langhton that had made that tumult in England.
					This year K. John was poysoned by one Simon a Monk, who being absolved of his Abbot afore-hand for doing this fact, he finds a Toad in the Garden, pricks him with a Pen-knife, until he had made him vomit up all his poyson, which he having conveyed into a Cup of Wine, began to the King with a smiling countenance, speaking these words, If it shall please your Princely Majesty, here is such a Cup of Wine, as you never drank a better, I trust that Wassil shall make all England glad. The King having drunk, and anon being ill, inquired for Simon the Monk, to whom some answering that he was departed this life (for his Guts gushed out of his Belly) the King replys, Then God have mercy on my soul; and so he died, much repenting of his former life.	290
					In this Kings time was the Bridge of London, being of Wood, built of Stone and the power of chooling a Mayor in London was first granted.
			Henry 3.		Henry the third being King John's eldest Son, began his Reign in the ninth year of his age. Against him, some that hated the Father, stood for Lewis the K. of France his Son. But W. Earl Marshal resting to the Nobles, that the French Kings Son was the shame of their servitude, and that hatred of the Child for the Father, was unjust persecution of the innocent Child; Hereupon they all gave consent to choose this young Henry for their King; who is crowned at Glocester, because the French held Westminster.	290
1217					Upon the choice of the Son of King John to be King, Lewis the French Kings Son makes War upon England; Earl Marshal and others gives him Battel, and win the Field of him. Then Lewis takes London for his safety, thutting the Gates till great aid from France was sent him in 100 ships, but they were encountred with upon the Sea, most of them taken, and Eustace the chief of them, and his Head was smitten off; so that the French Kings Son Lewis agreed for 1000 pound of Silver he would depart out of the Kingdom never to return he nor his.
1218					A Parliament is held in England (now Lewis and his French are gone out of the Land) in which King Henry the third confirmeth all the priviledges that had been granted by John his Father.	292
1219					The Kingdom on the other side grant to the King two shillings of every Plow-Land.
					Thomas Becket is shrined.
					This year Order was proclaimed, that all Aliens should depart out of the Realm, except Merchandizers, going in and out under the Popes safe conduct. It was conceived that the device was to make divers great Men strangers, that held Castles and Holds of the King against his will, to go out of the Kingdom.
1220					About this time the young King was crowned again at Westminster.
					This year the Pope of Rome stirs up Ludovike the French King to lay Siege against the City of Tholouse to extinguish the Albingenses. Vol. 1. Page 302.

1221					The Lord keeps the Albingenses that the French King and his Host could not touch them; but strikes them with a sore Pestilence and Famine, forcing them to retire home again to France, Vol. 1. p.
					This year the King went to Oxford, where he had something to do with William Earl de Albemarlia.	303
					The Gray or Minorite Friers enter first into England.
					The House of the Carthusian Monks is founded.
1222					In England are such violent Tempests, that many Trees, Towers, Churches, are thrown down, and some persons slain in an House.
1223					Philip the French King dies, his Son Ludovike succeeding him.
1224					The Order of Friers Minorites is confirmed by Pope Honorius the third.
1226		Gregory the 9th.			Pope Honorius the third, a great adversary to Frederick Emperor, dies, after whom succeeds Gregory the ninth, more grievous than his Predecessor.
					Franciscus Patron of the Frier Minorites dies.
					Ela foundeth the House of the Nuns at Lacock.
					W. Bishop of London gave over his Bishoprick.
					The Pope works Raimundus the good Earl of Tholouse great trouble.
1227					This year the King of England makes the Londoners to pay the sum of 1000 Marks to him, because they had given or lent the like sum to Lewis the French King his adversary, at his departure out of England. With these and other Taxes, provision is made to recover Normandy.	304
1228						307
					The King grants to the City of London to be Toll-free.
					Great contention ariseth between the Prior and Covent of Durham, and this K. Henry the third, because they would not choose him to their Bishop whom the King did desire.
1229			Richardus magnus.		The choice of this Archbishop, cost the Realm the tenths of all moveables, see Vol. 1.
					The new Church of Coventry is finished by Alexander the Bishop of that City.
					The French provide again to War against the foresaid Reimundus Earl of Tholouse, and to expulse him out of his possessions. The Earl gives them a great overthrow, and discomfits the French three times that summer.	309
1230					As the Bishop and his Deacon, and many people were in Saint Paul's Church in London at Mass, there arose such a dark Tempest with Thunder, &c. that the people ran out, fell down amazed, conceiving that Doomesday was come; the Bishop and Deacon mean while take fast hold of the Altar.
1231					The Archbishop now confirmed in his See, complains against Hubert Lord Chief Justice, as one that withheld some Lands due to Canterbury.
					The Archbishop goes to the Pope, and complains against the King for committing so much trust of the affairs of the Kingdom to Hubert.
					Richard dies in his return from complaining to the Pope, in whose room the Monks choose Ralph Nevel, alias Radulphus de nova Villa, who was the Kings Chancellor, the King well liking the choice; He is commended in stories to be a very good man. But being depraved and traduced to the Pope by Simon Langhton Archbishop of York, the Pope frustrates the choice.	310
					Then the Monks choose John their Prior to be Archbishop, who going to the Pope (and therefore not insufficient by age to govern, who could take such a Voyage) to receive his Pall, and being examined three days, was rejected for being too old by the Pope, perhaps older than was he.
1232					A great Consistory of Abbots, Priors, and of the Nobility, is held at S. Albans between the Countess of Essex and her Husband.	311
					Roman and Italian Parsons in England are robbed.
					The Bishops labour to bring Hubert out of the Kings favour, and prevail, to the incensing of the King against him, and making him to question Hubert for many things unreasonably, to imprison him, and bereave him of all his treasure.	312
1233					Hubert is conveyed out of Prison into a Church; but without respect to that as a Sanctuary, he being found by the Keepers is dragged to Prison again, to the great offence of the Bishop, for so disrespecting the sacredness of that place.	314
					John Blund is chosen Archbishop. But he is the third of those that are unchosen by the Pope one after another, before any election would take with the Pope.
1234					This Archbishop Edmund was chosen by the Popes command.
			Edmund of Abendon.		Archbishop Edmund with his Bishops in Council at Westminster (the King now being at variance with the Nobles) declared to the King plainly that the Council he followed was not good, but dangerous to him and the state (meaning the counsel of Peter Winchester, and Peter of Rival, &c.) shewing it in their turning the Kings heart from his own natural Subjects, and in eleven particulars more.
					The King takes pity of Justice Hubert's Wife.
					Richard Earl Marshal is fraudulently circumvented and slain in Ireland. The King laments it.
					Many of the Catini and the Albingenses are slain by the Popes command.
					Peace is concluded between the King and the Nobles.	317
					Justice Hubert is restored again to the Kings favour.
					The King calling a Council, calls the Bishop of Wintchester, Peter Rival, Stephen Segrave, &c. to account for abusing his Seal; &c

					Great variance ariseth between the Romans and Pope Gregory the ninth, becaufe the Pope contended contrary to the cuftom (as the Romans pleaded) that he might excommunicate a Citizen of Rome, and interdict the City.
					Schifm ariseth between the Greek and the Roman Church, becaufe that an elected Grecian Archbifhop, could not be confirmed when he was come to Rome, unleis he would give a great fum of money, which Simony the Archbifhop and the Grecians with one conient did abominate, and feparated from Rome.
					This feparation of the Greek Church from Pope Gregory the ninth, and the Church of Rome, caufeth that Germanus Archbifhop and Patriarch of Conftantinople, wrote to Pope Gregory the ninth, to reform matters, and ftudy means of Unity in the feamleis Coat of Chrift.
1237						318
1238					The Pope impofeth fo many exactions upon England, beginning at this 1237 year, and fo forward (as he had many yeais before to the faid year) as make up large Tables.	321 322
					Otho the Popes Legat hath authority to ftay longer and gather more mony in England.
1240					Not long after in this year, Pope Gregory fends a new Precept to Legat Otho, that all beneficed men in England and France fhould pay to the Pope the fifth part of their revenues. Who notwithftanding their four material excufes, were fain to pay it.
1241					Preachers are ftirred up by the Lord to preach that the Pope was an Heretick, and condemned for their pains; viz. Arnoldus, Johannes Semeca the glofs Writer of the Popes Decrees, an oppofer of the Pope, Guielmus De fancto amore, giving many figns of falfe Teachers. Gallus and Groffhead.	323
					Petrus Supino gets 1500 Marks out of Ireland for the Pope; and Petrus Rupeus in England gets of the Abbots and Priors, fhewing to them the Popes Bills and Bulls, a mighty quantity of Silver and Gold.
					The Pope demands of the Houfe of Peterborough, that they fhould grant him fome Benefice lying in their donation, whofe fruits were worth an 100 pound, fo that they fhould be as Farmers, and the Pope to receive the profits. But the King forbad them any fuch grant.
1243		Innocent the 4th.			From Pope Innocent the fourth comes M. Martinus, a new Merchant of the Pope, with power to fufpend all Prelats in England from giving Benefices, till the Popes Minfmen were preferred.
1245					The King writes a Letter to Pope Innocent to forbear his intolerable oppreffions of the Kingdom of England.	326
					Martinus being an inftrument of the Popes oppreffion of England, is warned by the Nobility (and he had little lefs comfort of the King) to be gone out of England, upon pain of being cut in pieces; who taking his leave of the King, the King (as Matthew Paris faith) bids him farewel in the Devils name.
					The Nobles and Commons of England write a fupplication to Pope Innocent the fourth in the General Council at Lions, againft his injurious Taxes impofed upon England.
1246					Pope Innocent in a meeting at Cluniake perfwades the French King (who was addreffing himfelf for his Voyage to Jerufalem) to war againft Regulum ifium, that is, the feeble King of England (for his not condefcending to the Pope in all things) either to drive him out of his Dominions, or to make him accommodate the Pope in every thing,	327
1248					The Clergy and Commonalty of England write another Letter to Pope Innocent the fourth againft his exactions in England:	329
					The Abbot of Abingdon commanded to give a Benefice by the Pope to one, and by the King to another, rather obeys the King than the Pope. For which he is cited to appear before the Pope, and condemned in fifty Marks.	331
					The French K. bent and bound for the Holy-land, is perfwaded by his friends and Mother to lay down the obligatory Crofs for his journy, as having (fay they) taken it up in the weaknefs of his fenfes in his ficknefs. The K. hereupon tearing off his Badge and refigning it to the Bifhop (all the perfwaders joyning therein) by and by takes it up again, faying, If formerly in my weaknefs of body and fenfes I took up the Crofs to go to the Holy-Land to fight againft the Heathens, now I take it up again in the full ftrength of both.
					The Pope being at odds with the Emperor Frederick the fecond, will not at any hand be reconciled, though the King of France ftrongly interceded, and the Emperor himfelf clears himfelf of all imputation, offers full fatisfaction for all pretended wrongs, will go out of his Empire (if the Pope could not indure him there) to the Holy Land, never to return into Europe again, fo as his Son Henry Nephew to King Henry of England might fucceed him, with offer of other moft reafonable conditions. Thefe oppofitions of the Pope againft Chriftian Emperors and Kings, gave the Turks great advantage of prevailing.
1250					The French K. in his Voyage to Jerufalem takes in Damiata.	332
					This year the Saracens to day are beaten of the French before Damiata; on the morrow the French are beaten by the Saracens ten times more. See more Vol.1. p.334.c.1.
					The Templaries fighting for the holy Temple againft the Saracens near to Antioch are vanquifhed, and their Standard-bearer flain.

1254				Boniface.	This year Pope Innocent would needs have the bones of Robert Groſthead Bifhop of Lincoln, contrary to the minds of the Cardinals, to be taken up and caſt out of the Church, for his open plain rebuking the Pope in his life time, to the putting of him into a great terrour of Conſcience, ſo that the Pope ſeemed to ſee a Bifhop in a Viſion to ſay unto him, Ariſe wretch, and come to judgment.	368
					The Kings great expences in his Voyage to Vaſcon makes him put many Taxes upon his Subjects, chiefly on the Church-men, who being wont to receive Tithes from, are now made to give Tithes to the Laiety. Vol.1. p.369.c.2.
1255		Alexander the 4th.			Pope Innocent dies.
					Great diſſention ariſeth between Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Canons of Lincoln about the right of giving Prebendſhips.	368
					The Jews crucifie a Child nine years old with great torment.
1257					The King of England exacts of the Jews 8000 Marks in pain of hanging. Walter Gray Archbiſhop of York with ſuperſtitious exceſſive faſting, killed himſelf.
					A Jew falling into a Privy at Tewkſbury upon Saturday being the Jews Sabbath would not for reverence thereof be lifted out; and on the morrow being the Chriſtians Sabbath Richard Earl of Glocester would not ſuffer him to be taken out, and ſo he died in the Dung.
1259					The King entring into France, required the reſtitution of ſuch Lands in Normandy and Anjou, as of old right were due unto him, and wrongfully withheld from him, and made the French King to agree to him. Vol. 1. p.369.c.2.
1260					A great contention is at Oxford between the Scholars.
					To this year continueth the Hiſtory of Matthew Paris, leaving at the ſtory of the death of Fuleo Biſhop of London.	369
1261		Urban the 4th.			The King gives Licence to plant an Univerſity at Northampton, and writes to the Magiſtrates of that Town courteouſly to intreat the Scholars when they came.	371
					The King gets from the Pope a releaſe of his Oath wherein he had ſworn to ſome Statutes at Oxford.	372
1262					The King renues his releaſe from his Oath, by this Pope Urban.
1263					The Barons combine to maintain the Statutes of Oxford. An agreement is made between the King and the Nobles.
					The King beſiegeth and invades the Barons at Northampton.	373
1264					The Scholars there alſo are ſtubborn againſt the King, ſhooting with ſlings, long-bows and croſs-bows, doing much hurt, but at length are beaten, ſlain, and made to fly.
					A Battel fought at Lewis between King Henry 3. the Barons win the field, and do take Richard King of Almoni, K. Henry's Brother, and his Son, who affiſted the Kings Priſoners.
1265		Clement the 4th.			This Pope was at firſt a married man and had children. Then he was the French Kings Chancellor. After his Wives death he was made Biſhop called Podienſis. After that Archbiſhop of Narbon. After Cardinal, and laſt of all Pope.	375
					Thomas Aquinas flouriſheth about this time, and Bonaventure.	377
					A form of peace is drawn between the King and his Barons, wherein the King promiſeth much reformation of things in Church and Commonwealth.	379
					K. Henry the third writes to Oxford Sheriff againſt an Aſſembly or Meeting of men, who termed themſelves Harlots. It is probable that this was ſome pretended Order of Religion; and that from it came the reproachful name of Harlot.
1266					Diſſention ariſeth between Earl Simon and the Earl of Glocester, they fight a Battel, and Simon and many of his ſide are ſlain.	380
					The King being in the cuſtody of the Barons is now reſtored to his Regality.	381
					Kenelworth decree confirmed, that they that had loſt their Lands by Attainder, (although not yet attainted) ſhould fine therefore at the Kings pleaſure, and take them of the King again.
1267					The King beſiegeth the Caſtle of Kenelworth, whither repairs Oſtobonus the Popes Legat, and by his perſwations Henry Haſtings that had valiantly kept it againſt the King, yields it to the King, pardon being granted to him, of Life, Lands, Goods, &c.
					The Barons fortifie the Iſle of Ely, and after that London againſt the King.
					Peace concluded between the King and the Nobles.
1270					Prince Edward the Kings Son, and many Princes of other Kingdoms take upon them the Croſs to make an expedition to Jeruſalem.	382
					Boniface Archbiſhop being dead, the Monks of Canterbury agree upon the Prior of their Houſe Adam Chelenden.
1271					The King and his Son Edward intreated the Monks to chooſe Robert Burnel, Prior Chelenden elect, and not admitted by the K. goes up to Rome, there continues 2 years, and at laſt reſigns up his Election to Pope Gregory, who gave it to R. Kilwarby.

1272					The great Concordance came forth about this time by an English Frier called John Dernington.
				Canterbury.	Whereas the other Princes that went to the Holy Land, especially the French, did take mony of the Infidels, instead of giving them blows, Prince Edward refused this mony, (who was for his integrity safe, when many of the others with their monys were drowned with Tempest) and also prospered his designs.
				Rob. Kilwarby.
1273					Pope Gregory the Tenth calls a Council at Lions about the controversie between the Greek Church and the Latin Church.	385
1274			Edward the 1st.		K. Henry the third dies having reigned 56 years.
					Edward the eldest Son of Henry the first being in Vasconia, when his Father died, returns home, and is crowned this year. At which crowning, he putting off his Crown, said, he would not put it on again till he had gathered together all the Lands that belonged unto it.	386
					This K. had much ado with Wales, but at length cuts down their Woods, subdued the Country and their King Lewline, and made his Son Prince of Wales.
					The said Lewline rebelling (as we said) asked counsel of the Conjurers what should be the event; to whom it was answered, that he should go forward boldly, for he should ride through Cheap with a Crown on his head, which was thus fulfilled He being slain his head was carried through Cheap with a Crown of Silver to London Bridge.
1278				J. Peckam.	This Archbishop Peckam. resisted the King in the right of certain liberties pertaining to the Crown, touching Patronages, &c. See Vol.1. p.399. c.1. He ordained that one Minister should have but one Benefice. Vol. 1. p.399.c.1.
1279					Jews for mony-clipping are executed.
1284		Nicholas the 4th.			The great Conduit in Cheap began to be built.
1288					After this Pope Nicholas, the See of Rome was void two years and three months, through the diffention of the Cardinals, before another Pope was chosen. Vol.1. p.389.c.2.
1291					The King of England being proved by many ancient Records, to be chief Sovereign of Scotland, took full possession of the same; appointing the Crown to John Baliol under him.	386
				R.winchelsey.	This Archbishop Winchelsey much troubled the King, accusing him to the Pope.
1294					The Scots rebel against England.
1298		Celestinus the 5th. Boniface the 8th.			Of Pope Boniface the eighth, and Pope Celestine, Vol.1.p.387. c.1. How he was thought to be the eighth Nero, and how with a Reed he speaks through a Wall in the night to Pope Nicholas (because he was a man laborious to reform the Church) as if it had been a voice from Heaven to give over his Bishoprick; and so at last gat him out, the same year he was Pope.
1299					The K. of England and the Scots have a great fight; but K. Edward hath the Victory.
					The Scots rebelling again, again are suppressed by the King, and made to swear to the Kings Allegeance.
1301					This Pope Boniface the 8th challengeth of King Edward the Kingdom of Scotland.
					The King wisheth the Pope to send his grounds of challenging the Kingdom of Scotland; calls a Parliament, writes to the Pope abundance of passages and presidents from Anno 900 to 1230. that the Kingdom of Scots was the Kings of England.	387
1303					Pope Boniface the 8th being offended with Philip the French King, excites King Edward of England to war against him; but King Edward well knowing the Pope, put him off with delays, and the French King fearing K. Edward, restored unto him Vascone, which he wrongfully had detained.	389
					The Scots rebel again against K. Edward the first, under W.Waleis.
					Great difference ariseth between Philip K. of France, and Pope Boniface the 8th. The Pope thundring out his curse of Excommunication against the K. because the King commanded his Legat and a Bishop (whom the Legat got released, being imprisoned for a Conspiracy against the K.) to depart out of his Realm. The King on the other side calls a Parliament, and makes a declaration against the Popes intolerable wickednes, and an appellation from the Pope to a General Council.	389
					This year Captain Schaira with Soldiers, besieges, apprehend and rifle the Pope, and set him on a Colt with his face towards the Tail, causing the unbroken Colt to course up and down with him, till the Pope was out of breath.	390
1304					This Pope, what by fear, and what by sorrow, dies, and Pope Benedict the 11th succeeds.	396
		Benedict the 11th.			To this Pope Clement, K. Edward wrote divers Letters against R. Winch. Archbishop, with whom he was much pestered.	397
1305					This Pope Clement having provided strongly to keep the Emperor of Germany under his feet, that no Emperor could be crowned without his leave: next he intermeddles with the Empire of Constantinople, excommunicating Andronicus Paleologus Emperor of Constantinople, as an Heretick, because he would not suffer the Greek Church to appeal to Rome.

1307					A Parliament is held by the Kat Carlile, wherein many great complaints are made against the Popes exactions.	P.401
					A Parliament is held in France, wherein Popish and Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction is throughly discussed, and Regal Supremacy justly advanced against the vain reasons of the Papists.	401
					K. Edward the first marching towards Scotland, falls sick of a flix; sweares the Nobles to make his Son Edward K. after him; chargeth his Son not to call home wicked Gaveston, whom he had banished; to go in War to the Holy Land, carrying his heart with him, which had vowed to go that Voyage himself, but Scottish Wars hindred him, and so he dies.	415 416
			Edward the 2d.		This Edward in this 1307, enters into the Throne, being of a graceful body, but not so gracious in his soul.
1308					This year and not afore, is K. Edward crowned.
					The King is much led aside by the evil counsel of one Gaveston, and the two Spencers.
1310					A Parliament is called, wherein are exhibited divers Articles touching things his Father had given him in charge, namely, to remove from him and his Court all Aliens and perverse Counsellors, and to let matters of State be debated by the Council of the Kingdom, and touching sundry other matters. The King perceiving that this did hit at his Gaveston, did when there was no remedy, yield to let Gaveston be banished into Ireland, and so the Parliament ended, the other Articles not sped.	417
1311					The first Ottoman having conquered the other three Families of the Turks, Anno 1300. now goes on conquering the Christians. Vol.1. p.837.c.1.
				R.Winchelsey	Archbishop of Canterbury, whom Edward the first had banished, is now released, and returns from Rome home.
					The Archbishop of Canterbury excommunicates the Bishop of Coventry for holding with Peter Gaveston, which Gaveston, though banished upon forfeiture of life, goods, &c. Presumes upon the Kings favour, returns again.	418
1312					Peter Gaveston is apprehended by Guido, alias Guy Earl of Warwick, and beheaded by the Nobles.
					The King hath a young Son born, the joy whereof made him begin to forget his sorrow for Gaveston; but that Frenchmen make-bates, cause contention between the K. and Nobles to arise again.	419
1313					The Scots take occasion by this discord, to rebel against the King, under one Robert Bruse, whom King Edward the first had chased out of Scotland, was now returned thither, getting himself to be made King, who when the King of England and his Lords and Armies encountred him and his Host, did discomfort them, and slew many of the English Lords.	419
1314	Ludovicus				Pope Clement dies, after whom the Papacy continues void two years.
1316	the 5th.				This Emperor Ludovicus a worthy man was crowned without the Popes consent, and was much vexed by this wicked Pope John, Vol.1.p.424.
1317	Bavarius. Nicholas the 5th. Anti-Pope.	John 22.			The King raiseth an Army, and besiegeth Barwick in Scotland: The mean while the Scots by another way invaded the Merchants of Yorkshire, robbing the Country, and slaying much people, and of an Army gathered by the Archbishop of York, of divers Abbots, Priors, Clerks and Husbandmen to resist them, they slay many, and that of the Clergy, called therefore the White Battel; insomuch that the King was fain to retire from Barwick, and rescue Yorkshire.
					At this time the two Spencers, Hugh the Father, and Hugh the Son, were so impious, and yet so potent in the Kingdom, that no Lord durst controul them, so that they were much hated of the Nobles.	420
1321					A Prohibition is set forth against Peter-pence.
					The Spencers banished by Act of Parliament for their wickedness, are restored and advanced by the King. The Nobles to redress this evil, assemble their power; but being scattered by the Kings forces before they could come together, were pursued and taken, and two and twenty of the chief Earls and Lords were hanged, drawn and quartered, saving that the Earl of Lancaster was beheaded. This cruelty to his natural Subjects wrought his utter ruine at last.	421
1322					Now the King begins with the Spencers to triumph in his Victory of putting the Nobles to death.
1323					The King advanceth Hugh Spencer to be an Earl, and ill reported, and reputed Sir John Baldock to be Chancellor of England: Also the King raiseth an Army against the Scots; but the good leaders being put to dearth, and unskilful ones leading this Army one hundred thousand of this Army perisheth by Famine.
2324		Benedict 12.			Of Benedict 12. see Vol.1.p.424.
					The King cited by the French to do homage to him for the Dukedom of Aquitain, which the King held of France; about this was great contention between the two Kings. Prince Edward with the Queen is sent over to quiet matters; who would not return again till they had fitted matters for the ruine of the King and his wicked favourites.	422
1325					The French King by reason of the great ado the King of England made by Proclamations, for the Queen and her Son to return, and by threatning of the French K. himself. The French K. removed the Queen and her Son from him, who are both joyfully received in the Court and Country of the Earl of Henawde; where a Marriage was concluded between Edward her Son, being of the age of 14, and Philip the said Earls Daughter.

Anno Christi	Emp. of Germany	Popes of Rome.	Kings of England	Archbishops of Canterbury.		Vol.1. Page
1326					By this Marriage-Match was knit a combination of War, whereby the Queen and the young Prince should invade England; who being furnished out of Henawde, and with some Lords that came out of England at the hearing of the Marriage, with 2757 Soldiers. With these the and her Son lands; very many of the greatest of the Nobility (the Archbishop also, as they say, sending relief of mony and provision) resort to the Queen, so that daily her power increased; and on the other side, scarce any would be hired to fight on the Kings side.
					Then the K. flys to Bristow, appointing Spencer the Father to keep Bristow Castle. The Queen follows, takes the Castle, apprehends the said Spencer, whom being torn, at last they hanged him at the said City in chains of Iron. The K. flys to Wales; the Queen follows, proclaiming that if the King would come in and appear, he should receive his Kingdom again if he would be conformable to his liege people. Who not appearing, Prince Edward is proclaimed High-keeper of the Realm. The Queen, sends Lords to pursue after the King; the King is taken and put in Kenelworth Castle. Divers Lords and great Persons are apprehended, of whom Spencer the Son is drawn and hanged on a Gallows fifty foot high; and beheading him, and quartering him, they send his Limbs into several Quarters of the Kingdom. Sir John Arundel also was beheaded.	423
					A Parliament is called at London, from which a Message is sent to the King, that if he would resign his Crown, his Son should have it after him, if not, another should take it to whom the lot would give it. The King being not able otherwise to choose, yields up his Crown, is kept in Prison, deposed by the Parliament, the Son set up as King, the old King living in Prison, at last is slain (as Authors affirm) with a hot Spit thrust up into his body by Roger Mortimer's means, for which he was drawn and quartered afterward.
					This King built Oriel College, and St. Mary Hall in Oxford.
					This year 1326 great fury and outrage arose between the Townsmen and the Abby of Bury, the Town rifling the Monastery and imprisoning the Monks, and some slaughter was between them.	426

					Orchanes the 2d Ottoman. Vol.1.p.837.c.2.
					The King with the Queen is at York with an Army of 60000 men, ready to encounter with the Scots. The Scots steal away, so that no Battel is fought.
					K. Edward the 3d, is now married to the Earl of Henawlts Daughter abovesaid.
					A release by the means of Roger Mortimer and the old Queen, is granted by the King, under age, to the Scots of all their homage and fealty to the Crown of England, which they were tied unto by Seal and Indenture, called the Ragman-Role. The Black-Cross also won from Scotland by valour of the former King Edward is given back to the Scots, with other things very prejudicial to England.	428
					The Nobles desiring to redress these matters in a legal way, are falsly accused of Conspiracy against the King, and the Earl of Kent, being guiltless, is put to death, being the Kings Uncle, and never brought to answer for himself.

Thus have we with all the method and pithiness we could use in these present labours, Chronologically annuated all remarkables in these three Volumes; seating and placing them according to their age, each particular in his own year. If any man should wish to have had here a larger universe of particulars, though of less consequence; and a precizer punctualness of times, even to months and days; such a man shall be able fully to satisfie himself with these considerations:

First, That keeping close to the nature of the most and best Chronologies, with a studied conciseness, we intended to compose of things material, not trivial, Annals not Kalendars, and Ephemerides; that is, to date years, not months and days.

Secondly, That seeing largeness is to be bound fast to the abbreviature, the second and third Volume, and so they go together abroad into the World: Its but turning over leaves, and when that hath been too tediously prolix in its ample narrations, this will tell the same after that, without wearying eyes or ears. And when this with its Laconical shortness, leaves the Reader hungry, to have seen and heard somewhat more, that will be ready to fill that appetite.

Thirdly, That although the first Volume makes dispatch in its relations, and so fills up its vastness with variety of stories, till it brings us beyond the 1500 year: yet the second and third Volumes consist of few stories, swollen to that hugeness by the massiness and voluminousness of each story; so that they both begin and end within the compass of about 50 and odd years, as this our Chronicle it self shews in the Time, Page and Columes; so that of themselves, unless we would turn Chronologizing into Epitomizing, would wind up themselves into a narrow compass. Besides the first and second Volume in above forty years are woven together; as may be seen in the Quotations of the large Volume of matter of both these Volumes.

Fourthly, That of all the Martyrs which indeed are the main bulk of the second and third Volume, Mr. Fox hath penn'd and placed at the beginning a most punctual and methodical Kalendary Chronicle of years, months and days of their troubles and sufferings: yet to make our project a completeness and perfection, we took into our other passages of estate, all special and dated stories of Martyrs; though in thus doing in regard of Mr. Fox his Kalendar, we Actum agimus, & post Homerum Teximus Iliades, do that which needed not.

FINIS.

Acts and Monuments
OF THE
CHRISTIAN MARTYRS, AND
Matters Ecclesiastical passed in the Church of Christ,

From the Primitive beginning, to these our days, as well in other Countries, as namely in this Realm of ENGLAND, and also of SCOTLAND; Discourfed at large.

And first, the difference between the Church of ROME that now is, and the Ancient Church of ROME that then was.

Mat. 16.

CHRIST our Saviour in the Gospel of of St. *Matth. cap.*16. hearing the confession of Simon Peter, who first of all other, openly acknowledged him to be the Son of God, and perceiving the secret hand of his Father therein, answered again, and alluding to his name, called him a Rock, upon which Rock he would build his Church so strong, that the gates of Hell should not prevail against it, &c. In which words three things are to be noted. First, that Christ will have a Church in this world. Secondly, that the same Church should mightily be impugned, not only by the World, but also by the uttermost strength and powers of all Hell. And thirdly, that the same Church, notwithstanding the uttermost of the Divel and all his malice, should continue. Which prophecy of Christ we see wonderfully to be verified, in so much that the whole course of the Church to this day, may seem nothing else but a verifying of the said Prophecy. First, that Christ hath set up a Church, needeth no Declaration. Secondly, what force, what sides and sorts of men, of Princes, Kings, Monarchs, Governors, and Rulers of this World, with their Subjects publickly and privately, with all their strength and cunning, have bent themselves against this Church. And Thirdly, how the said Church, all this notwithstanding, hath yet endured and holden his own. What storms and tempests it hath overpast, wondrous it is to behold. For the more evident declaration whereof, I have addressed this present History, intending by the favourable aid of Christ our Lord, not so much to delight the ears of my Country in reading of News, as most specially to profit the hearts of the godly, in perusing antiquities of ancient times, to the end that the wonderful works of God, first in this Church, might appear to his glory. Also that the continuance and proceedings of the Church from time to time, being set forth in these Acts and Monuments, more knowledge and experience may redound thereby, to the profit of the Reader and edification of Christian Faith.

Three things noted in Christs words.

For the better accomplishing whereof, so to prosecute the matter, as may best serve to the profit of the Reader: I have thought good first, beginning from the time of the Primitive Church, and so continuing (by the Lords grace) to these latter years, to run over the whole state and course of the Church in general, in such order as digesting the whole tractation of this History into five sundry diversities of times.

The order of the disposition of this History.

The suffering time of the Church.

1. First, I will intreat of the suffering time of the Church, which continued from the Apostles age about three hundred years.

The flourishing time of the Church.

2. Secondly, of the flourishing time of the Church, which lasted other three hundred years.

The declining time of the Church.

3. Thirdly, of the declining or backsliding time of the Church, which comprehendeth other three hundred years, until the looking out of Satan, which was about the thousandth year after the ceasing of Persecution. During which space of time, the Church although in ambition and pride it was much altered from the simple sincerity of the Primitive Time, yet in outward profession of Doctrine and Religion, it was something tolerable, and had some face of a Church: notwithstanding some corruption of Doctrine, with Superstition and Hypocrisie was then also crept in. And yet in comparison of that which followed after, it might seem as I said, something sufferable.

The time of Antichrist in the Church.

4. Fourthly, followed the time of Antichrist, and loosing of Satan, or desolation of the Church, whose full swinge containeth the space of four hundred years. In which time both Doctrine and sincerity of Life was utterly almost extinguished: namely, in the chief Heads and Rulers of this West Church, through the means of the Roman Bishops, especially counting from Gregory the seventh, called Hildebrand, Innocentius the third, and Friers which with him crept in, till the time of John Wickliffe and John Huss, during four hundred years.

The Reformation of the Church.

5. Fifthly and lastly, after this time of Antichrist reigning in the Church of God by violence and tyranny, followeth the reformation and purging of the Church of God, wherein Antichrist beginneth to be revealed, and to appear in his colour, and his Antichristian Doctrine to be detected, the number of his Church decreasing, and the number of the true Church increasing. The durance of which time hath continued hitherto about the space of two hundred and fourscore years, and how long it shall continue more, the Lord and Governor of all times, he only knoweth. For in these five diversities and alterations of times, I suppose the whole course of the Church may well be comprised. The which Church because it is universal, and sparsedly through all Countries dilated, therefore in this History standing upon such a general argument, I shall not be bound to any one certain Nation more than another; yet notwithstanding keeping mine argument aforesaid, I have purposed principally to tarry upon such Historical Acts and Records, as most appertain to this my Country of England and Scotland.

The Church of Rome.

And for so much as the Church of Rome, in all these Ages above specified, hath challenged to it self the Supreme Title, and Ringleading of the whole Universal Church on Earth, by whose direction all other Churches have been governed: in writing therefore of the Church of Christ, I cannot but partly also intermeddle with the acts and proceedings of the same Church, for so much as the doings and orderings of all other Churches from time to time, as well here in England, as in other Nations, have this long season chiefly depended upon the same. Wherefore, as it is much needful and requisite to have the doings and orderings of the said Church to be made manifest to all Christian Congregations: so have I framed this History, according to the same purpose. First, in a general description briefly to declare, as in a summary table, the misguiding of that Church, comparing the former primitive state of the forenamed Church of Rome, with these latter times of the same: which done; then after in a more special tractation, to prosecute more at large all the particulars thereof, so far forth as shall seem not unprofitable for the publick instruction of all other Christian Churches, to behold and consider the manner and dealing of this one. In the which one Church of Rome four things, as most special points, seem to me chiefly to be considered. To wit, Title, Jurisdiction, Life and Doctrine. Wherein I have here to declare, first, concerning the Title or Primacy of the Church, how it first began, and upon what occasion. Secondly, concerning the Jurisdiction and Authority thereof, what it was, and how far it did extend. Thirdly, touching the misorder of life and conversation, how inordinate it is. And fourthly, the Form of Doctrine, how superstitious and idolatrous of late it hath been. Of the which four, the first was prejudicial to all Bishops. The second, derogatory to Kings and Emperors. The third detestable to all men. The fourth, injurious against Christ.

Four things to be considered in the Church of Rome. 1. Title. 2. Jurisdiction. 3. Life. 4. Doctrine.

The title of the Pope.

For first, the Title and Stile of that Church was such, that it overwent all other Churches: being called The Holy Universal Mother Church, which could not erre: and the Bishop thereof, Holy Father the Pope, Bishop Universal, Prince of Priests, Supream Head of the Universal Church, and Vicar of Christ here in Earth, which must not be judged, having all knowledge of Scripture, and all Laws contained within the cheft of his Breft.

The Jurisdiction of the Pope.

Secondly, the Jurisdiction of that Bishop was such, that challenging to himself both the Swords, that is, both the Keyes of the Scripture and the Scepter of the Laity: not only he subdued all Bishops under him, but also advanced himself above Kings and Emperors, causing some of them to lie under his feet, some to hold his stirrup, Kings to lead his Horse by the Bridle, some to kiss his feet, placing and displacing Emperors, Kings, Dukes and Earls, whom and when he lifted, taking upon him to translate the Empire at his pleasure: first, from Greece to France, from France to Germany, preferring and deposing whom he pleased, confirming them which were elected. Also being Emperor himself Sede vacante, pretending Authority or power to invest Bishops, to give Benefices, to spoil Churches, to give authority to bind and loose, to call General Councils, to judge over the same, to set up Religions, to Canonize Saints, to take Appeals, to bind Consciences, to make Laws, to dispense with the Law and Word of God, to deliver from Purgatory, to command Angels, &c.

The properties of life in the Romish Clergy. The Doctrine of the Pope.

Thirdly, what was the life and conversation of the Court of Rome, hereafter in the proofs of this History followeth to be seen and observed.

Fourthly, such was his Doctrine in like manner, tedious to students, pernicious to mens Consciences, injurious to Christ Jesus, and contrary to it self. In Laws more divers, in Volume more larges in diligence and study more applied, in vantage and preferment more gainful than ever was the study and learning of the holy Scripture of God.

All which four points well considered and advised in this present History set forth, I trust it may minister to the indifferent Christian Reader, sufficient instruction to judge what is of this See and Church of Rome to be esteemed.

But here by the way it is to be noted, that all these deformities above touched of vain Title, of pretended Jurisdiction, of Heretical Doctrine, of Schismatical Life, came not into the Church of Rome all at one time, nor sprang with the beginning of the same Church, but with long working, and continuance of time by little and little crept up, through occasion, and came not to full perfection, till the time partly of Pope Silvester, partly of Pope Gregory the seventh, in the year of our Lord 1170. partly of Innocentius the third, and finally of Pope Boniface the eighth, in the year of our Lord 1300. Of the which four Popes, the first brought in the Title in the year of the Lord 670. which was never in such ample wise before publickly enacted, and received publickly in the said Church of Rome. The second brought in Jurisdiction. The third which was Pope Innocent with his rabble of Monks and Friers (as Thomas Aquine, Petrus Lombardus, Johannes Scotus) and with such other Bishops as succeeded in the same See after him, corrupted and obscured the sincerity of Christs doctrine and manners also. And lastly, Pope Bonifacius the eighth, and after him Pope Clement the fifth over and besides the Jurisdiction sufficiently advanced before by Pope Hildebrand, added moreover the Temporal Sword to be carried before them. And that no Emperor (were he never so well elected) should be sufficient and lawful, without the Popes admission, in the year of our Lord 1300. whereby the Popes power was brought now to his full pride and perfection. And thus came up the corruption of the Romish Church in continuance of years by degrees, and not altogether, nor at one time, as is declared, and hereafter more particularly (Christ willing) shall be expressed.

Pope Silvester the 2d. Pope Gregory the 7th called Hildebrand. Pope Innocentius the third. Pope Bonifacius the eighth.

Wherefore, whosoever shall have hereafter to do with any adversaries, about the Antiquity or Authority of the Church of Rome, let him here well consider when and how, the Title, Jurisdiction and Corruption of Doctrine first began in the Popes See. And so shall he see, that the Church of Rome, as it is now governed with this manner of Title, Jurisdiction and Institution of Doctrine, never descended from the Primitive Age of the Apostles, or from their Succession, Nisi tantum æquivoce, & non univoce; Like as Sancta Maria picta non eſt Sancta Maria, & homo pictus non eſt homo, as the Schools do say: that is, As the picture of the Holy Virgin, is not the Holy Virgin, and as a man painted on the Wall is not a Man: so it is to be said of the Church of Rome (the Institution and Doctrine of the Church of Rome I mean) that although it hath the name of the Church Apoſtolical, and doth bring forth a long Genealogy of outward succession from the Apostles, as the Pharises did in Christs time bring their descent from Abraham their Father: yet all this is (as I said) but only Æquivoce, that is, in name only, and not in effect or matter, which maketh the Apostolical Church indeed; for as much as the definition of the Apostolical Church neither now agreeth with this present Church of Rome, nor yet the manner, form and institution of the said Romish Church, as it now standeth with this Title, Jurisdiction and Doctrine, had ever any Succession or Offspring from the Primitive Church of the Apostles. But as Christ said by the Pharises, that they were the Children, not of Abraham, but of the Devil: in semblable wise may be answered, that this Church of Rome now present, with this Title, Jurisdiction and Doctrine now used, cannot be fathered upon the Apostles, neither Petrus, nor Linus, but of another Author, whom here I will not name.

Æquivoce, That is in name only, and not in very deed. Univoce. That likely in name, and also in definition and effect, agreeing with the name.

The Church of Rome, as now left, is not apostolical, but only æquivoce.

And here now cometh in the Argument of Pighius, Hoſius and Eccius, to be answered unto, who arguing for the Antiquity and Authority of the Church of Rome, reason on this manner.

The argument of Pighius, Hoſius and Eccius for the authority of the Church of Rome.

Da That forsomuch as an ordinary and a known Church visible must here be known continually on earth, during from the time of the Apostles, to the which Church all other Churches must have recourse:

Ri- And seeing then there is no other Church visible, orderly known to have endured from the Apostles time, but only the Church of Rome:

i. They conclude therefore that the Church of Rome is that Church whereunto all other Churches must have recourse, &c.

Answer. Fallacia æquivoci.

To the which Paralogisme I answer thus: that this word Durans Eccleſia, the during Church in the Minor, hath Fallaciam æquivoci. For although the name of the Church and outward succession of Bishops have had their durance from the time of the Apostles, yet the definition and matter which maketh a true Apostolical Church indeed, and Univoce, neither is now in the Church of Rome, nor yet the form and institution of the Church now used in Rome, was ever from the Apostles: which Apostles were never authors or fathers of this Title, Jurisdictions and Doctrine now taught in Rome, but rather were enemies ever to the same.

The minor examined.

The major examined.

Again to the Major, which standeth upon two parts, I answer: First, although the necessity of the Church during from the Apostles, may and must be granted; yet the same necessity was not bound to any certain place or person, but only to faith: so that wheresoever, that is to say, in whatsoever Congregation true Faith was, there was the Church of Christ. And because the true faith of Christ must needs ever remain on earth, therefore the Church also must needs remain on earth. And God forbid, that the said true faith of Christ should only remain in one City in the World, and not another as well. And therefore to the second part of the Major is to be said, that as this true and sincere faith of Christ is not so given, to remain fixtly in one place or City alone: so neither is there any one Church in the World

World so ordained and appointed of God, that all other Churches should have their recourse unto it, for determination of their causes and controversies incident, &c. And thus much to the Argument of Pighius and Hoſius, &c.

Now as touching the authorities and allegations of the ancient Doctors and holy Fathers in the commendation of the Church of Rome; here cometh in also to be noted, that whosoever will understand rightly their authorities, and answer to the same, must first learn to make a difference and distinction of the said Church of Rome, from that it was, to that it is: forasmuch as the Church of Rome is not the same Church now, which it was then, but only Æquivoce: otherwise as touching the very property and definition of a Church, it is another Church, and nothing agreeing to that it was then, save only in outward name and place, Therefore by this distinction made, I answer the place of Ireneus, Cyprianus and other famous Drs. commending the Church of Rome as Catholick and Apostolical, and say that these Doctors, speaking of the Church of Rome which then was, said not untrue, calling it Catholick and Apostolical, for that the same Church took their ordinary succession of Bishops joyned with the ordinary Doctrine and Institution from the Apostles. But speaking of the Church of Rome which now is, we say the said places of the Doctors are not true, neither do appertain to the same: all which Doctors neither knew the Church of Rome that now is, neither if they had, would ever have judged any thing therein worthy such commendation.

A distinction. The Church of Rome distinguished into a double consideration of times. The Church of Rome, how it was commended of the old Doctors

Over and besides, our adversaries yet more objected against us, who heaving and shooving for the Antiquity of the Romish Church, for lack of other sufficient reason to prove, are driven to fall in scanning the times and years. What (say they)? where was this Church of yours before these fifty years? To whom briefly to answer, first we demand what they mean by this which they call our Church? If they mean the ordinance and institution of Doctrine and Sacraments now received of us, and differing from the Church of Rome, we affirm and say, that our Church was, when this Church of theirs was not yet hatched out of the shell, nor did yet ever see any light: that is, in the time of the Apostles, in the primitive age, in the time of Gregory the first, and the old Roman Church, when as yet no Universal Pope was received publickly, but repelled in him: nor this fulness of plenary power yet known, nor this Doctrine and abuse of Sacraments yet heard of. In witness whereof we have the old acts and histories of ancient time to give testimony with us, wherein we have sufficient matter for us to declare the same form, usage and institution of this our Church reformed now, not to be the beginning of any new Church of our own, but to be the renewing of the old ancient Church of Christ: nor to be any swerving from the Church of Rome, but rather a reducing to the Church of Rome. Whereas contrary, the Church of Rome which now is, is nothing but a swerving from the Church of Rome, as partly is declared, and more shall appear (Christ willing) hereafter.

The principal objection of the Papists against the Protestants.

Answer to the objection.

The Church of Rome revolted from the Church of Rome.

And where the said our adversaries do moreover charge us with the faith of our Fathers and Godfathers, wherein we were baptised, accusing and condemning us for that we are now revolted from them and their faith, wherein we were first christened: To this we answer, that we being first baptised by our Fathers and Godfathers, in water, in the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, the same faith wherein we were christned then, we do retain: and because our Godfathers were themselves also in the same faith, therefore they cannot say that we have forsaken the faith of our Godfathers, &c. As for other points of Ecclesiastical uses, and circumstances considered, besides the principal substance of Faith and Baptism, if they held any thing which receded from the Doctrine and Rule of Christ, therein we now remove our selves: not because we would differ from them, but because we would not with them remove from the Rule of Christs Doctrine. Neither doth the Sacrament of our Baptism bind us in all points to the opinions of them that baptised us, but to the Faith of him in whose Name we were baptised. For as if a man were christened of an Heretick, the Baptism of him notwithstanding were good, although the Baptiser were naught: so if our Godfathers or Fathers, which christned us, were naught any thing not consonant to Christian Doctrine in all points, neither is our Baptism worse for that, nor yet we bound to follow them in all things, wherein they themselves did not follow the true Church of Christ.

Another objection of the Papists.

An answer to the objection. No man bound to follow the opinions of his Godfathers in all points unless they be conformable in all things.

Wherefore as it is false, that we have renounced the faith of our Godfathers wherein we were first Baptised, so is it slanderous not true, that we are removed from the Church of Rome: but rather say, and (by the leave of Christ) will prove that the Church of Rome hath utterly parted from the Church of Rome, according to my distinction before touched. Which thing the more evidently to declare, I will here compare the Church of Rome with the Church of Rome; and in a general Description set forth (by Gods grace) the difference of both the Churches, that is, of both the times of the Church of Rome: to the intent it may be seen whether we or the Church of Rome have more apostated from the Church of Rome. And here first I divide the Church of Rome in a double consideration of time: first, of those first six hundred years which were immediately after Christ: and secondly, of the other six hundred years, which now have been in these our later days: and so in comparing these two together, will search out what difcrepance is between them both. Of the which two ages and states of the Roman Church, the first I call the Primitive Church of Rome, the other I call the later Church of Rome counting this later Church from the thousand years expired after the binding of Satan, to the time of his loosing again, according to the Prophecy of the twentieth Chapter of St. Johns Revelation: counting these thousand years from the ceasing of Persecution, under Conſtantinus Magnus, to the beginning of Persecution of the Church again under Innocentius the third, and Ottomannus the first Turcien Emperor. And thus have ye the Church of Rome parted into two Churches, in a double respect and consideration of two sundry states and times. Now in setting and matching the one state with the other, let us see whether the Church of Rome hath swerved from the Church of Rome more than we, or no.

Two times of the Church of Rome considered and examined.

The first policie.

AND to begin first with the order and qualities of life I ask here of this Roman Clergy, where was this Church of theirs which now is, in the ancient time of the primitive Church of Rome, with this pomp and pride, with this riches and superfluity, with this Gloria mundi, and name of Cardinals, with this pranking dissolutenesse, and whoring of the Curtisans, with this extortion, bribing, buying and selling of Spiritual Dignities, these Annats, Reformations, Procurations, Exactions, and other practices for mony, this avarice insatiable, and implacable, this filthy filthiness most detestable, barbarousness and negligence in preaching, promise-breaking faithlessness, poysoning, and supplanting one another, with such schisms and divisions, which never were more seen than in the elections and Court of Rome these seven hundred years, with such extreme cruelty, malice, and tyranny in burning and persecuting their poor brethren to death?

The enormities of life in the later church of Rome described. Parties and practices of Rome to get money.

It were too long, and a thing infinite, to stand particularly upon these above rehearsed. And if a man should prosecute at large all the Schisms that have been in the Church of Rome since the time of Damasus the first, which are counted to the number of eighteen schisms: what a Volume would it require? Or if here should be recorded all that this See hath burned and put to death since the beginning out of Satan, who were able to number them? Or if all their sleights to get money should be described, as processes of matter would require, who were able to recite them all? Or which all notwithstanding, the most principal grounds are reckoned at least to fourteen or fifteen sights.

Fifteen principal places of the new church of Rome to get money.

1. First, for matters or vacancies of Arch-Bishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbacies, Priories conventual, and other Benefices elective.

2. Secondly, for the holding and retaining of all other spiritual livings whatsoever, besides this which now the Incumbent paieth for, or which he may hold hereafter.

3. Thirdly, new annates for all the same are required again, Tories quaties any one of all his spiritual livings be, or are fained to be not orderly come by, whereby it hath chanced divers times three or four annats to be paid for one Benefice.

4. Fourthly, for giving out preventions of Benefices before they fall, and many times some one prevention to be given to divers and sundry persons by the office for monies sake.

5. Fifthly, for resignations upon favour, which in many cases the Pope challengeth to be reserved to himself.

6. Sixthly, for Commendams.

7. Seventhly, for compounding with such as be absent from their charge, and give their attendance about the Court.

8. Eighthly, for infinite dispensations, as to dispence with age, with order, with Benefices incompatible, as if the number be full, if the House be of such or such an Order. Item, dispensation for irregularity, for whoredome and adultery, for times of marriage, for marrying in degrees forbidden, or in affinity Canonical, for gossips to marry, for the which it hath been seen in France a thousand Crowns to be paid to Rome at one time, for dispensing with this Canonical affinity of Gossips, as we call it, the same being yet not true but fained. Item, dispensing for eating meats in times prohibited.

9. Ninthly, for innumerable privileges, exemptions, graces for not visiting, or visiting by a Proctor, for confirmations of privileges, for transactions made upon special favour of Pope, for permutations of Benefices with dispensation annexed, or making of Pensions, with such like.

10. Tenthly, for Mandats granted by the Pope, to Ordinaries, whereof every Ordinary if he have the collation or presentation often, may receive one Mandat: if he have fifty, he may receive two Mandats: and for every Mandat there comes to the Pope about twenty Ducats. And yet notwithstanding so many are sold, as will come buyers to pay for them.

11. Eleventhly, for the Popes penitentiary, for absolution of cases reserved to the Pope, for breaking and changing of Vows, for translation from one Monastery to another, also from one order to another, for licence to enter into certain Monasteries, to carry about Altars, with many other things of like device, pertaining to the office of the Popes penitentiary.

12. Twelfthly, for giving and granting of innumerable pardons and indulgences, to be read not only in publick temples, but also to be bought in private houses, and of private persons, in divers and sundry respects.

13. Thirteenthly, for making Notaries, and Protonotaries, and other offices of the Court of Rome.

14. Fourteenthly, for granting out Bulls and Commissions of new foundations, or for changing of the old, for reducing regular Monasteries to a secular state, or for restoring again into the old, and for other infinite rescripts, and writs about matters depending in controversie, that otherwise might and ought by the Ordinary to be decided.

15. Fifteenthly, for giving the Pall to Archbishops newly elected. By reason of all which devices (besides the first of the Annates) it hath been accounted out of the Kings Records in France, in the time of Ludovick the ninth (as testifies Molinens) to the number of two hundred thousand Crowns, only out of France, payed and transported to Rome. Which Sum since that time hath been doubled and trebled, besides Annates and Palls, which altogether are thought to make the total sum, yearly going out of France to the Popes Coffers of late years, ten myriads, or millions, every myriad mounting to ten thousand Crowns. Now what hath risen besides in other Realms and Nations, let other Men conjecture. Summa totalis.

Wherefore if the Gospel send us to the fruits to know the Tree, I pray you what is to be thought of the Church of Rome, with these fruits of life? Or if we will seek the Church in length and number of years: where was this Church of Rome with these qualities then, at what time the Church of Rome was a persecuted Church, not a persecuting Church? And when the Bishops thereof did not make Martyrs, as these do now, but were made Martyrs themselves, to the number of five and twenty, in order one after another? Or when the Bishops thereof were elected and exalted, not by factious conspiring, not by power or parts taking, not by money or friends making, as they be now, but by the free voices of the People and of the Clergy, with the consent of the Emperour joyned withal, and not by a few conspiring Cardinals, closed up in a corner, as now they be, &c.

The Jurisdiction and power of this new Church of Rome examined.

AND yet if there were no other difference in the matter, but only corruption of life, all that we would tolerate, or else impute to the common fragility of man, and charge them no farther therein than we might charge our selves. Now over and beside this deformity of life, wherein they are clean gone from the former steps of the true Church of Rome, we have moreover to charge them in greater points, more nearly touching the substantial ground of the Church, as in their jurisdiction presumptuously usurped, in their Title falsly grounded, and in their Doctrine heretically corrupted. In all which three points, this later pretended Church of Rome hath utterly sequestred it self from the image and nature of the ancient and true Church of Rome, and have erected to themselves a new Church of their own making, as first usurping a Jurisdiction never known before to their ancient Predecessors. For although the Church of Rome in the old primitive time had his due authority and place due unto that See, among other Patriarchal Churches, over and upon such Churches as were within his Precinct, and bordering near unto it, as appears by the Acts of the Nicen Council: yet the universal fulness and plenitude of power in both the regiments, spiritual and temporal, in deposing and dispensing matters of the Church not to him belonging, in taking Appeals, in giving Elections, investing in Benefices, in exempting himself from obedience and subjection of his ordinary power and Magistrate, with his coactive power newly erected in the Church of Rome, was never received nor used in the old Roman Church, from the which they disagree in all their doings. This new Church of Rome in three points challenged.

For although Victor then Bishop of Rome, Anno 200. went about to Excommunicate the East Churches, for the observation of Easter day: yet neither did he proceed therein, neither was permitted by Irenens so to do. And although Boniface the first likewise, writing to the Bishops of Carthage, required of them to send up their appellations unto the Church of Rome, alledging moreover, the Decree of the Nicen Council for his authority: the Bishops and Clergy of Carthage assembling together in a General Council, called the sixth Council of Carthage) to the number of two hundred and seventeen Bishops, after that they had perused the Decrees in the authentique Copies of the aforesaid Nicen Council, and found no such matter by the said Boniface alleadged, made therefore a publick Decree, that none out of that Country should make any Appeal over the See, &c. And what marvel if Appeals were forbidden them to be made to Rome, whenas both here in England the Kings of this Land would not permit any to Appeal from them to Rome, before King Henry the 2d. because of the murther of Thomas Becket, being thereunto compelled by Pope Alexander the third? And also in France the like prohibitions were expreſly made by Ludovicus Pius, Anno 1268. which did forbid by a publick instrument called Pragmatica sanctio, all exactions of the Popes Court within this Realm. Also by King Philip named Le bel, Anno 1296. the like was done, which not only restrained all sending or going up of his Subjects to Rome, but also, that no Money, Armour, nor Subsidy should be tranſported out of his Realm. The like also after him did King Charles the fifth, firnamed the wise, and his Son likewise after him Charles the sixth, who also put in Traytors certain seditious perſons for appealing to Rome. The like resistance moreover was in the said Country of France, against the Popes reservations, preventions, and other like practices of his usurped Jurisdiction in the days of Pope Martin the fifth, Anno 1418. Item, when King Henry the sixth in England, and King Charles the seventh in France, did both accord with the Pope, in investing and in collation of Benefices: yet notwithstanding the High Court of Parliament in France did not admit the same, but still maintained the old liberty and customs of the French Church. Insomuch that when the Duke of Bedford came with the Kings Letters Patents to have the Popes procurations and reservations admitted, yet the Court of Parliament would not agree to the same, but the Kings Procurator General was faigne to go betwixt them, as is to be seen in their Registers, Anno 1425. the fifth day of March. In the days of the which King Charles the seventh, was set forth in France, Pragmatica sanctio, as they call it, against the Annats, reservations, expectatives, and such other proceedings of the Popes pretended Jurisdiction, Anno 1438. Wherefore what marvel if this Jurisdiction of the Popes Court in Excommunicating, taking Appeals, and giving of Benefices, was not used in the Nicen. con. ca. 6. Victor stopped from his Excommunication by Irenæus. Boniface the first, falsifieth the Council of Nice. The sixth Council of Carthage. Appellations to Rome forbidden in England. Appellations to Rome forbidden in France. Ex Annals Genebr. Francorum, ab. 5. ca. 33. The Popes Jurisdiction resisted in France.

the old Church of Rome, whenas in these later days it hath been so much resisted.

The Popes Jurisdiction concerning elections examined.

And what should I speak of the form and manner of Elections now used in the Church of Rome, clean converted from the manner of the old Church of their Predecessors? For if in those ancient days, whenas yet the Church remained in the Apostles only, and a few other Disciples, the Apostles then with prayer and imposition of hands elected Bishops and Ministers, as by the Apostles, James was made Bishop of Hierusalem, Paul in Creta elected Titus, and Timothy in Ephesus. Also Peter ordained Linus and Clement in Rome, &c. After which time of the Apostles, when the Church began more to multiply, the election of Bishops and Ministers stood by the Clergy and the People, with the consent of the chief Magistrate of the place, and so continued during all the time of the primitive Church, till the time, and after the time of Constantine the fourth Emperor, which Emperor (as writeth Platina and Sabellicus, Ennead. 8. lib. 6.) published a law concerning the election of the Roman Bishop, that he should be taken for true Bishop, whom the Clergy and People of Rome did choose and elect, without any tarrying for any authority of the Emperor of Constantinople, or the Deputy of Italy: so as the custom and fashion had ever been before that day, Anno 280. And here the Bishops began first to writhe out their elections and their necks a little from the Emperors subjection, if it be so as the said Platina and Sabellicus after him reporteth. But many conjectures there be, not unprobable, rather to think this constitution of Constantine to be forged and untrue: First, for that it is taken out of the Popes bibliothecary, a suspected place, and collected by the keeper and matter of the Popes library, a suspected author, who whatsoever feigned Writings or Apocrypha he could find in the Popes Chests of Records, making any thing on his masters side: that he compiled together, and thereof both Platina, Sabellicus, and Gratianus take most part of their reports, and therefore may the more be suspected, &c. Plat. in Zozimo. Ennead 8. l. 6. Constantine the fourth Emperor of Constantinople. The Popes bibliothecary suspected. The Constitution of Constantine the fourth Emperor of Constantinople examined.

Secondly, where Platina and Sabellicus say that Constantine moved with the holiness of Pope Benedict the first, made that constitution: how seemeth that to stand with truth, when both the Emperour was so far off from him, being at Constantinople, and also for that the said Pope reigned but ten Months? which was but a small time to make his Holiness known to the Emperor so far off. And grant he were so holy, yet that holiness might rather be an occasion for the Emperor so to confirm and maintain the old received manner of his institution, than to alter it.

The third conjecture is this, for that the said constitution was not observed, but shortly after by the said Benedict, was broken in the election of Pope Comon. And yet notwithstanding albeit the constitution were true, yet the election thereby was not taken away from the People, and limited to the Clergy only, and muchlefs might be taken away from the Clergy, and be limited only to the Cardinals, without the consent of their Prince and Ruler, according to their own Rubric in their Decrees, where the Rubric saith: De ordinatione Episcopi: Nullus invitis detur Episcopus; cleri, plebis, & ordinis consensus & desiderium requiratur, &c. That is: Let no Bishop be given to any People against their wills: but let the consent and desire both of the Clergy and of the People, and of the order, be also required, &c. And in the same distinction also, cap. Sacrorum, we read the same liberty and interest to be granted by Carolus magnus, and Ludovicus his Son, not to a few Cardinals only, but to the order as well of the Clergy, as of the people, to choose not only the Bishop of Rome, but any other Bishop within their own Diocess whatsoever, and to the Monks likewise to choose their own Abbot, setting aside all respect of persons and gifts, only for the worthiness of life, and gift of wisdom, so as might be most profitable for Doctrine and Example unto the Flock, &c. And this continued till the time of the aforesaid Carolus magnus and Ludovicus his Son, Anno 810. of the which two, Carolus the father, received expreſly of Pope Adrian the first, full jurisdiction and power to elect and ordain the Bishop of Rome, like as Pope Leo the ninth did also to Otho the first German Emperor, Anno 961. The other, that is Ludovicus, Son to the aforesaid Charles, is said to renounce again, and surrender from himself and his successors, unto Pope Paschalis and the Romans, the right and intereſt of chooſing the Roman Bishop, and moreover to give and grant to the said Paschalis the full possession of the City of Rome, and the whole Territory to the same belonging, Anno 821. as appeareth by the Decree, Ego Ludovicus, Dist. 63. But admit that fained Decree to be unfeignedly true (as it may well be suspected for many causes, as proceeding out of the same fountain, with the constitution of Constantine aforementioned, that is, from the master of the Popes Library, of whom both Gratianus and Volateran, by their own confession, take their ground) yet the same Decree doth not so give away the freedom of that election, that he limiteth it only to the Cardinals, but also requireth the whole consent of the Romans: neither doth he simply and absolutely give the same, but with condition: so that, Omnes Romani uno consilio, & una concordia, sine aliqua promissione ad pontificatum ordinem eligerent: that is, Whom as all the Romans with one Counsel, and with one accord, without any promise of their voices granted before, shall chooſe to be Bishop of Rome. And moreover in the same decree is required, that at the confecration of the same Bishop, messengers should be directed incontinent to the French King, concerning the same. The Decree, Ego Ludovicus, Dist. 63. causes. Platina Sab. Ennead 8. l. 6. Gratianus and Volateran, what ground they have of their records. Dist. 63. cap. Ego Ludovicus. Election of the Bishop of Rome confirmed upon the consent of the Clergy, and the people of Rome.

Furthermore, neither yet did the same Decree (albeit it were true) long continue. For although Pope Stephen the fourth, and Pope Paschalis the first, in Ludovicus time were impapshed through discord, without election of the Emperor, yet they were faine by meſſage to send their purgation to him of their election. And after that, in the time of Eugenius the second, which succeeded next to Paschalis, Lotharius son of Ludovicus, and Emperor with his father, came to Rome, and there appointed Laws and Magistrates over the City. Whereby may appear the donation of Ludovike, in giving away the City of Rome to the Pope, to be feigned. And after Eugenius, Pope Gregory the fourth, who following within a year after Eugenius, durst not take his election without the consent and confirmation of the paid Emperour Ludovicus. And so in like manner his succeſors, Pope Sergius the second, Pope Leo the fourth, Pope Nicholas the first, and so orderly in a long tract of time, from the aforesaid Nicholas the first, to Pope Nicholas the second, Anno 1061. (which Nicholas in his decree, beginning, In nomine Domini, dist. 23. ordained alſo the same) to that in the election of the Bishops of Rome, commonly the consent of the Emperour and the people with the Clergy of Rome was not lacking. After which Nicholas came Alexander the second, and wicked Hildebrand, which Alexander being first elected without the Emperours will and consent, afterward repenting the same openly in his preaching to the People, declared that he would no longer sit in the Apostolical See, unleſs he were by the Emperour confirmed. Wherefore he was greatly rebuked, and caſt into Priſon by Hildebrand, and so depoſed. Then Hildebrand and his followers so ordered the matter of this election, that first the Emperour, then the Lay People, after that, the Clergy alſo began to be excluded. And so of the election by little and little was reduced to the hands of a few Cardinals, contrary to all ancient order, where ever since it hath remained. The decree, Ego Ludovicus, Dist. 63. proved false. Dist. 23. cap. In nomine Domini.

And like as in elections, so alſo in power judiciary, in deciding, and determining of cauſes of faith, and of Ecclesiastical discipline, the state of the Church of Rome now being, hath no conformity with the old Roman Church heretofore. For then Bishops debated all cauſes of faith only by the Scriptures, and other questions of Ecclesiastical discipline they determined by the Canons, not of the Pope, but of the Church, such as were decreed by the Ancient Councils, as writeth Gregor. Turonensis in Francorum historia. Whereas now both the rule of Scripture, and sanctions of the old Councils for alſo all things for the moſt part are decided by certain new Decretal, or rather, Extradecretal and extravagant constitutions, in the Popes Canon law compiled, and in his Conſistories practiſed. also to Cathedral Churches and other, to have their free Elections, and to prosecute the same in full effect, ordering and disposing promotions, collations, provisions and dispositions of Prelacies, Dignities, and all other Ecclesiastical Benefices whatsoever, after their own arbitrement, as appeareth by the first General Council of France, 16. q. 7. cap. Omnes Basilicæ, by the first General Council of Nice, cap. 6. Also by the General Council of Antioch, cap. 9. and is to be seen in the Popes Decrees, 9. q. 3. Per singulas. And likewise behide these ancient decrees, the same is confirmed again in more later years by Ludovicus the ninth French King, in his constitution, called Pragmatica sanctio, made and provided by full Parliament against the Popes Exactions, in the year of our Lord 1228. in these words as follow. Item exactiones & onera grauissima pecuniarum, per curiam Romanam Ecclesiæ regni nostri imposita vel imposita (quibus regnum miserabiliter depauperatum existit) sive etiam imponendas vel imponenda levari aut colligi nullatenus volumus: nisi dumtaxat pro rationabili, pia & urgentissima causa, vel inevitabili necessitate, ac etiam de expresso, & spontaneo jussu nostro, & ipsius Ecclesiæ regni nostri, &c. that is, Item, all Exactions and importable burdens of money, which the Court of Rome hath laid upon the Church of our Kingdom (whereby our said Kingdom hath been miserably hitherto impoverished) or hereafter shall impose or lay upon us, we utterly discharge and forbid to be levied or collected hereafter for any manner of cause, unless there come some reasonable, godly, and most urgent and inevitable necessity; and that also not to be done without the express and voluntary commandment of us, and of the Church of the same our foresaid Kingdom, &c. Now contrary to and against these so manifest and express Decrements of General Councils, and Constitutions Synodal, this later Church of Rome of late presumption, degenerating from all the steps of their elders, have taken upon them a singular Jurisdiction by themselves, and for their own advantage, to intermeddle in disposing and transposing Churches, Colleges, Monasteries, with the collations, exemptions, election, goods and lands to the same belonging, by reason and example whereof have come in these Impropriations, first fruits, and relevations of Benefices, to the miserable dispoiling of Parishes, and horrible decay of Christian Religion, which things among the old Roman elders were never known. For so much then did it lack, that due necessities were pluckt from the Church, that Emperours, Kings and Princes plucking from their own, did rather cumulate the Church with superfluities.

Again, when such goods were given the Church by those Ancestors, they were neither so given, nor yet taken to serve the private use of certain Churchmen taking no pains therein, but rather to serve the publick subvention of the needy, as is contained in the Canonical Institutions by the Emperour Ludovicus Pius, set forth in the year of the Lord, 380. The words be these: Res Ecclesiæ vota sunt fidelium, pretia peccatorum, & patrimonia pauperum: that is, The goods of the Church be the vows and bequests of the faithful, prices to ransom such as be in captivity or prison, and patrimonies to succour them with hospitality that be needy.

Whereunto agreeth also the testimony of Prosper, whose words be these: Vera sanctos Ecclesiæ res non vendicasse ut proprias, sed ut commendatas pauperibus divisisse: that is, good men took the goods of the Church, not as their own, but distributed them as given and bequeathed to the poor. And saith moreover: Quod habet Ecclesia, cum omnibus nihil habentibus habet commune: that is, Whatsoever the Church hath, it hath it common with all such as have nothing, &c.

Add the worthy testimony of S. Augustine to Bonifacius. Si autem privatim, quæ nobis sufficiant possidemus, non sunt illa nostra, sed pauperum, quorum procurationem quadammodo gerimus, non proprietatem nobis usurpatione damnabili vendicamus, &c.

Vowsons & pluralities of benefices.

Likewise Vowsons and pluralities of Benefices were things then as much unknown, as now they are pernitious to the Church, taking away all free election of Ministers from the flock of Christ.

three points wherein the Popes Church erreth in his Jurisdiction

All which inconveniences as they first came and crept in chiefly by the pretended authority and jurisdiction abused in this later Church of Rome: so it cannot be denied, but the said later Church of Rome hath taken and attributed to it self much more than either the limits of Gods Word do give, or standeth with the example of the old Roman Church, in these three things especial. Whereof as mention is touched before, so briefly I will recapitulate the same.

I. Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction fully reformed and appropriate to the Church of Rome, which ought to be generally equal to all Churches Christian.

The first is this, that whatsoever the Scripture giveth and referreth, either to the whole Church universally, or to every particular Church severally, this Church now of Rome doth arrogate to it self absolutely and only, both doing injury to other Churches, and also abusing the Scriptures of God. For albeit, the Scripture doth give authority to bind and loose, it limiteth it neither to person nor place, that is, neither to the City of Rome only, more than to other Cities, nor to the See of Peter, more than to other Apostles, but giveth it clearly to the Church, whereof Peter did bear the figure, so that whereseever the true Church of Christ is, there is annexed power to bind and loose, given and taken meerly as from Christ, and not mediately by the Pope or Bishop of Peter's See.

2. Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction diminished and extended in the Church of Rome further than the Word limiteth.

The 2d point wherein this present Church of Rome abuseth his Jurisdiction contrary to the Scripture and steps of the old Roman Church, is this, for that it extendeth his authority further and more amply, than either the warrant of the Word, or example of time will give. For although the Church of Rome hath (as other particular Churches have) authority to bind and absolve, yet it hath no such authority to absolve Subjects from their Oath, Subjection and Loyalty to their Rulers and Magistrates, to dispense with perjury, to denounce remission where no earnest repentance is seen before, to number remission by days and years, to dispense with things expressly in the word forbidden, or to restrain that which the word maketh free, to divide Religion into Religious, to bind and burthen Consciences with constitutions of men, to excommunicate for worldly matters, as for breaking of Parks, for not ringing of Bells at the Bishops coming, for not bringing litter for their horse, for not paying their fees and rents, for withholding the Church goods, for holding on their Princes side in princely cases, for not going at the Popes commandment, for not agreeing to the Popes Election in another Princes Realm, with other such things more and more vain than these, &c. Again, although the Scripture giveth leave and authority to the Bishop and Church of Rome, to minister Sacraments: yet it giveth no authority to make Sacraments, much less to worship Sacraments. And though their authority serveth to baptise men, yet it extendeth not to christen Bells: neither have they authority by any Word of God to add to the Word of God, or take from the same, to set up unwritten veritties under pain of damnation, to make other articles of belief, to institute strange worship, otherwise than he hath prescribed which hath told us how he would be worshipped, &c.

The third abuse of the Popes Jurisdiction standeth in this, that as in spiritual jurisdiction they have vehemently exceeded the bounds of Scripture, so they have impudently intermedled themselves in temporal Jurisdiction, wherein they have nothing to do. Insomuch that they have translated their Empire, they have deposed Emperors, Kings, Prince., Rulers, and Senators of Rome, and set up other, or the same again at their pleasure, they have proclaimed Wars, and have warred themselves. And whereas Emperours in ancient time have dignified them in titles, have enlarged them with donations, and they receiving their confirmation by the Emperours, have like ingrateful Clients to such Benefactors, afterward stampt upon their Necks, have made them to hold their Stirrop, some to hold the Bridle of their Horse, have caused them to seek their Confirmation at their hand; yea, have been Emperours themselves, Sede vacante, & in discordia electionis, and also have been Senators of the City; moreover, have extorted into their own hands the plenary fulness of power and jurisdiction of both the Swords; especially since the time of Pope Hildebrand; which Hildebrand deposing Henry the 4th Emperor, made him give attendance at his City gate. And after him Pope Boniface the 8th. shewed himself to the People on the 1st day like a Bishop, with his keyes before him, and the next day in his Robes Imperial, having a naked sword born before him, like an Emperor, in the year of our Lord 1298. And for so much as this inordinate jurisdiction hath not only been used of them, but also to this day is maintained in Rome; let us therefore now compare for usage

3. The Jurisdiction of the Pope abused and usurped in temporal matters where he has nothing to do.

usage hereof to the old manner in times past, meaning the Primitive and first age of the Church of the Romans. Wherein the old Bishops of Rome in those days, as they were then subject to their Emperor, so were other Bishops in like manner of other Nations subject every one to his King and Prince, acknowledging them for their Lords, and were ordered by their authority, and obeyed their Laws, and that not only in causes Civil, but also in regiment Ecclesiastical, as appeareth, Dist. 10. cap. 1. & 2. Dist. 97. cap. De illicita.

Popes submitted in the old time to Emperors. Ex cap. de juramento calumniæ.

Also, 24. q. 3. So was Gregorius, surnamed Magnus, subject to Mauricius, and to Phocas, although a wicked Emperor. So also both Pope and People of Rome took their Laws of the Emperors of Constantinople, and were submitted to them, not only in the time of Honorius an hundred years after Constantine the great, but also in the time of Martianus, Anno 451. and so further unto the time of Justinian and of Carolus Magnus, and also after the days of them. In all which continuance of time, it is manifest, that the Imperial Law of Martian did rule and bind in Rome, both in the days of Justinian, and 150 years after, till the time of the Empire being translated from Greece unto France. Whereby it may appear false, that the City of Rome was given by Constantine the first, unto the Bishop of Rome to govern: for that Pope Boniface the first, writing to the Emperor Honorius, calleth in the same place Rome the Emperors City, Dist. 97. cap. 1. And Lotharius also Emperor, appointed Magistrates and Laws in Rome, as is above mentioned. Moreover, for further probation hereof, that both the Bishop of Rome, and all other Ecclesiastical persons were in former time, and ought to be subject to their Emperors and lawful Magistrates, in causes as well Spiritual as Civil, by many evidences may appear, taken out both of Gods Law and mans law. And first by Gods Law, we have example of godly King David, who numbred all the Priests and Levites, and disposed them into four and twenty orders or courses, appointing them continually to serve in the Ministry, every one in his proper order and turn, as came about: which Institution of the Clergy also, good King Ezechias afterward renewed, of whom it is written: He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all things as his father David had done before: he took away the high groves, and brake down Images, &c. 4 Reg. 8. The said Ezechias also reduced the Priests and Levites unto their orders prescribed by David before, to serve every one in his office of ministration: 2 Paralip. 30. 31. And this order from David still continued till the time of Zachary, at the coming of Christ our Lord, being of Abias course, which was the eighth order of the Priests appointed to serve in the Tabernacle, Luke 1. To pass over other lighter offices as translated from the Priests to Kings authority, as concerning the ordering of oblations in the Temple, and reparations of the Lords House, King Solomon displaced Abiathar the High-Priest by his Kingly Power, and placed Sadoch in his stead: 3 Reg. cap. 6. Also dedicating the Temple of the Lord with all the People, blessed the whole Congregation of Israel, 3 Reg. 8. Judas Machabeus also elected Priests, such as being without spot, had a zeal to the Law of the Lord, to purge the Temple, which the idolatrous Gentiles had before prophaned, 1 Macc. 4.

Judas Machabeus.

1 Mac. 10. 2 Mac. 14. Josephus.

Also King Alexander writing to Jonathas, appointed him chief Priest in his Country, 1 Mac. 10. Demetrius ordained Simon and Alcimus in the like office of Priesthood. Josaphat likewise as in the whole Land did set Judges: so also in Jerusalem he appointed Levites and Priests, and Heads of Families to have the hearing of causes, and to minister judgment over the People: 2 Paral. 19. By these and many other is to be seen, that Kings and Princes in the old time, as well when Priests were born Priests, as when they were made by election, had the dealing also in Ecclesiastical matters, as in calling the People to Gods service, in cutting down groves, in destroying Images, in gathering Tithes into the Lords House, in dedicating the Temple, in blessing the People, in casting down the brazen Serpent within the Temple, in correcting and deposing Priests, in constituting the order and offices of Priests, in commanding such things as pertained to the service and worship of God, and in punishing the contrary, &c. And in the New Testament, what meaneth the example of Christ himself, both giving and teaching Tribute to be given to Cesar? to Cesar I say, and not to the High-Priest. What meaneth his words to Pilate, not denying power to be given to him from above?

2 Par. 19.

John 19.

And again, declaring the Kings of Nations to have dominion over them, and willing his Disciples not so to do, giving us to understand the difference between the regiment of his spiritual Kingdom, and of the Kingdoms of this World, willing all worldly states to be subject under the superior Rulers and Magistrates, in whose regiment is dominion and subjection, and not in the other. Whereunto accordeth also the Doctrine of St. Paul, where it is written: Let every soul be subject to the higher Powers, under whose obedience, neither Pope, Cardinal, Patriarch, Bishop, Priest, Friar nor Monk is excepted nor exempted: as Theophylactus expounding the same place declareth and saith, Universos erudit, sive Sacerdos sit ille, sive Monachus, sive Apostolus, ut se principibus subdant: that is, He teacheth all sorts, whether he be Priest, or Monk, or else Apostle, that they should submit themselves under their Princes, &c. And S. Augustine writing ad Bonifacium saith in much like sort: Quicunque autem legibus imperatorum, quæ pro Dei veritate feruntur, obtemperare non vult, acquirit grandes supplicium: that is, Whosoever refuseth to obey the Laws of the Emperor, which make for the verity of God, incurreth the danger of great punishment, &c. Also in another place, writing contra Cresconium, hath these words, In hoc enim reges, sicut ea divinitus præcipitur, Deo serviunt, in quantum reges, si in suo regno bona jubeant, mala prohibeant, non solum quæ pertinent ad humanam societatem, verum etiam quæ ad divinum religionem, &c. that is, Kings according as it is enjoyned them of God, do serve God in that they are Kings, if they in their Kingdoms command those things that be good, and forbid things that be evil, such as appertain not only to human society, but also to Gods Religion, &c. And yet to come more near to the Popes own Doctors, Thomas Aquine not much discrepant from the injunction of the Apostle above alledged, thus describeth the office of a King, Hoc, inquit, officium Rex se suscepisse cognoscat, ut sit in regno sicut in corpore anima, & sicut Deus in mundo, &c. Let a King (saith he) understand, that he hath taken this office upon him to be as the soul within the body, and as God in the World. In like agreement with the holy Apostle St. Paul, joyneth also St. Peter: Be you subject (saith he) to every humane creature, whether it be to the King as most preeminent, or to other set over you, &c. Where the common glose addeth thereto, To obey the same, whether they be good or evil. These places rightly pondered, let any man now judge, whether the Pope hath done open wrong to the Emperor, in usurping above the jurisdiction of his lawful Prince and Magistrate, notwithstanding whatsoever his own Canon Law saith to the contrary.

Aug. ad Bonif. 23. q. 5. c. 1.

Thom. de Reg. Princip. lib. 1. c. 12.

1 Peter 2.

And as it is sufficiently hitherto proved by Gods Law, that all Ecclesiastical persons owe their due subjection to their lawful Princes, in matters as well temporal as spiritual: so no less evidences may also be inferred out of mans Law, and examples of the oldest Fathers to prove the same. And first to begin with the example of Gregory the great, who in his Epistle to Mauritius writeth thus, Dominus meus fuisti, quando adhuc Dominus omnium non erat: ecce per me servorum ultimum suum & vestrum vos Mauricii, pondebit Christus, &c. that is, You were then my Lord, when you were not the Lord of the whole Empire: behold Christ himself shall make you answer by me, which am his most simple servant and yours, &c. And before him Eleutherus his Predecessor, Bishop of Rome, writing to Lucius, King of this Realm, calleth him by the name of Christs Vicar. But what needeth much confirmation of this matter, when the Popes Decrees and Canons be full of Records hereof, testifying how the ancient Church of Rome, not only received, but also required of the Emperors, Laws and Constitutions to be made, touching not only such causes, but also such persons as were Ecclesiastical? And here to omit by the way the chapter, Principes seculi, also Chapter Administratores, 23. quæst. 5. with divers other behide, I will recite out of the Epistle of Boniface the first, to the Emperor Honorius, so much as serveth for our purpose, written Dist. cap. 92 Ecclesiæ, cap. Victor. Where it is mentioned, that the said Bonifacius Bishop of Rome, sent an humble supplication to the forenamed Emperor, desiring him by his authority, to provide some remedy remedy against the ambitious contentions of the Clergy, concerning the Bishoprick of Rome. Which Emperour Honorius incontinent at his request, directed and established a Law, that none should be made Bishop of Rome through ambition, charging all Ecclesiastical Ministers to forceare from ambition; appointing moreover, that if two were elected together, neither of them both should be taken, but the election to proceed further to another to be chosen by a full consent of voices, as is expressed, Dist. 79. cap. Si duo.

To this I adjoyn also the Law and Constitution of Justinian the Emperour, ratified and renewed afterward in the Council of Paris, in time of King Ludovicus Pius. Where all Bishops and Priests be expressly forbidden not to Excommunicate any man, before his cause was known and proved to be such, as for the which the ancient Canons of the Church would have him to be Excommunicate. And if any should otherwise proceed contrary to the same, then the Excommunicate person to be absolved by the authority of an higher decree, and the Excommunicate to be sequestred from the Communion, so long as should seem convenient to him that had the execution thereof, as is expressed, 24. q. 3. De illicita. The same Justinian moreover in his Laws and Constitutions, how many things did he dispose and ordain in Church-matters, as he that would have to be a determinate number of Church-men or Clerks in Churches, Const. 2. Also concerning Monasteries and Monks, Const. 5. how Bishops and Priests should be ordained, Const. 6. concerning removing of Ecclesiastical persons from one Church to another. Also concerning the constitution of the Churches in Africk. And that the holy mysteries should not be done in private houses: so that whosoever should attempt the contrary, should be deprived, Const. 57. Moreover, concerning Clerks leaving their Churches, Const. 58. Also concerning the order and manner of Funerals, Const. 59. And that Bishops should not keep from their Flock, Const. 67. The same Justinian granted to the Clergy of Constantinople the priviledge of the secular Court, in cases only civil, and such as touched not the disturbance of the Bishop: otherwise in all criminal Causes he left them to the judgment of the secular Court, Const. 83. He giveth also Laws and Decrees for breach of Matrimony, Const. 117. and in divers others places. And in his Const. 123. after the Doctrine of S. Paul, he commandeth all Bishops and Priests to found out their service, and to celebrate the mysteries, not after a secret manner, but with a loud voice, so as they might not only be heard, but also be understood of the faithful people, what was said and done. Whereby it is to be gathered, that Divine Prayers and Service then, was in the vulgar Tongue.

And as the said Justinian, and other Emperors in those days had the Jurisdiction and Government over spiritual matters and persons, the like examples also may be brought of other Kings in other Lands, who had no less authority in their Realms, than Emperours had in their Empire. As in France, Clodoveus the first christened King at Orleance, caused a Council of thirty three Bishops, where thirty three Canons were instituted concerning the government of the Church, within two hundred years after Christ: Ex primo tomo Concil. Carolus Magnus, beside his other Laws and Edicts political, called five Synods, one at Meuntz, the second at Rome, the third at Rhemes, the fourth at Cabilone, the fifth at Arelate, where sundry Rites and Ordinances were given to the Clergy, about eight hundred and ten years after Christ. The same Carolus also decreed, that only the Canonical books of Scripture should be read in the Church, and none other. Which before also was decreed Anno 417. in the third general Council of Carthage. Item, he exhorteth and chargeth Bishops and Priests to Preach the Word, with a godly Injunction: Episcopi vero ut sive per se, sive per vicarios, populum verbis divini sedulo populis annuncient. Quia, ut ait beatus Gregorius, iram contra se occulti judicis excitat sacerdos, si sine prædicationis sonitu incedit. Et ut ipsi clerum sibi commissum in sobrietate & castitate nutriant. Superstitiones quas quibusdam in locis in exequiis mortuorum nonnulli faciunt, eradicent: that is, The Bishops either by themselves, or their Deputies, shall shew forth the food of Gods Word to the people with all diligence. For as Gregory saith, the Priest procureth against him the wrath of the secret Judge, which goeth without the sound of preaching. And also that they bring up their Clergy to them committed, in sobernesse and chastity. The superstition which in certain places is used of some, about the Funerals of the dead, let them exterminate and pluck up by the roots, &c.

Moreover, instructing and informing the said Bishops and Priests in the office of preaching, willing them not to suffer any to fain or preach to the people any new Doctrine of their own invention, and not agreeing to the Word of God, but that they themselves both will preach such things as lead to eternal life, and also that they set up other to do the same: and joyneth withal a godly exhortation. Ideo, dilectissimi, toto corde præparemus nos in scientia veritatis, & mox: Ut divina domante gratia verbum Dei currat & crescat, & multiplicetur, in profectum Ecclesiæ Dei sanctæ, & salutem animarum nostrarum, & laudem, & gloriam nominis Domini nostri Jesu Christi. Pax prædicantibus, gratia obedientibus, gloria Domino nostro Jesu Christo, Amen. Furthermore, the said Carolus in his Constitutions divideth the goods given to the Church so, that in the more wealthy places, two parts should go to the use of the poor, the third to the stipend of the Clergy. Otherwise in poorer places an equal division to be made between the poverty and the Clergy, unless the gift had some special exception. Ex Anselmo, lib. 1. cap. 80. And in the same book a little after, cap. 82. the Author declareth, by the said Carolus to be decreed, that no Ecclesiastical person or persons from thenceforth should presume to take of any person, any such gift or donation, whereby the Children or Kinsfolks of the said Donor should be defeated of their Inheritance duly to them belonging. Ludovicus Pius, King of France, and after Emperour, was Son to the foresaid Charles, who being joyned together with the said Charles his father in the Empire, ordained also with his father sundry Acts and Observances touching the government of the Church, as in the Author before alledged may appear. As first, that no entry should be made into the Church by Simony: again, that Bishops should be ordained by the free election of the Clergy and of the people, without all respect of person or reward, only for the merit of life, and gift of heavenly Wisdom.

Also the said Kings and Emperours forbad that any freeman or Citizen should enter the profession of Monkery, without licence asked of the King before: and added a double cause wherefore. First, for that many not for meer devotion, but for idleness and avoiding the Kings Wars, do give themselves to Religion: again, for that many be craftily circumvented and deluded by subtil covetous persons seeking to get from that which they have, Lib. 1. cap. 114. ibidem. Item, that no young children or boys should be shaven, or enter any Profession without the will of their Parents. And no young Maidens should take the vail or profession of a Nun, before he came to sufficient discretion of years to discern and choose what they will follow. That none should be entered or buried thenceforth within the Church: which also was decreed by Theodosius and Valentinianus, forty years before them. Item, the said Carolus, two and twenty years before this Emperour, enacted that Murtherers and such as were guilty of death by the Law, should have no sanctuary by flying into the Church, &c. which also was decreed by Justinian three hundred years before this Carolus. Ex novel. Justinian.

Moreover, the aforesaid Ludovicus Pius, with his Son Clotharius (or as some call him, Lotharius) joyned with him, among other Ecclesiastical Sanctions, ordained a godly Law, for Lay-men to communicate the Sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord in these words: Ut si non frequentius, vel ter, laici homines communicent: nisi forte gravioribus quibusdam criminibus impediantur: That Lay-men do communicate at least thrice, if not oftener, except they be let perscribe by some more haynous and grievous offences. Anselm. lib. 2. cap. 43. Item, they enacted that no goods of the Church should be alienated under the pain Leoninæ constitutionis. Unto this Lotharius, French King and Emperour, Pope Leo the fourth writeth that Romana lex, that is, the Roman Law, (meaning the Law of the French Emperours) as it hath hitherto stood in force: Ita & nunc suum robur propriumque vigorem obtinet, that is, So now it may continue till in its vigour and strength. Ino Carnotensis, lib. 11. Decretorum. About the year of the Lord, 848, after this Lotharius, succeeded his Son Ludovicus the second, in the Kingdom and Empire of France, before

Moreover, descending yet to lower times. Anno 1228. Ludovicus the Ninth, called holy Ludovike, made a Law against the pestiferous Simony in the Church; also for the maintenance of the liberty of the Church of France, established a Law or Decree, against the new Inventions, Reservations, Preventions, and Exactions of the Court of Rome, called Pragmatica sanctio, S. Ludovici, which Sanction was also practised long after in the Kingdom of France against the Popes Collectors and under-Collectors, as appeareth by the Arestum of the Council of Paris, Anno 1463. Ex Molineo in Commentariis. Furthermore, King Philip le Bel. 1303. set forth a Law, called Philippina, wherein was forbidden any exaction of new tythes and first fruits, and other unaccustomed collections to be put upon the Church of France. Carolus the fifth, named Sapiens. Anno 1369, by a Law, commanded that no Bishops nor Prelates, or their Officials within his Kingdom of France, should execute any censure of suspense, or Excommunication, at the Popes commandment, over or upon the Cities or Towns, Corporations, or Commons of his Realm. Ex regist. antiquarum constat chart. 26. Item Carolus the sixth, Anno 1388. against the Cardinals and other Officials, and Collectors of the Pope, revoking again the power which he had given to them before, provided by a Law, that the fruits and rents of Benefices, with other pensions, and Bishops goods that departed, should no more be exported by the Cardinals and the Popes collectors unto Rome, but should be brought to the King, and so restored to them to whom they did rightly appertain.

The like also may be inferred and proved by the stories and examples of our Kings here in England, as King Offa, King Egbertus, Edgarus, Alueredus, Athelwoldus, Canutus, Edwardus, William the Conquerer, William Rufus, Henry the first, Henry the second, till the time of King John and after. Whose dealing as well in Ecclesiastical cases as Temporal, is a sufficient demonstration to prove what injury the Popes in these latter days have done unto the Emperours, their lawful Governors and Magistrates: in usurping such fulness of power and jurisdiction over them, to whom properly they owe subjection, contrary to the steps and example of the old Roman Bishops their Ancestors: and therefore have incurred the danger of a Premunire, worthy to be deprived, Although it is not to be denied, but that Ecclesiastical Ministers and Servitors have their power also committed unto them, after their fort, of the Lord: yet it becometh every man to know his own place and standing, and there to keep him, wherein his own precinct doth pale him, and not rashly to break out into other mens walks. As it is not lawful for a civil Magistrate to intermeddle with a Bishops or a Preachers Function: so unseemly and unorderly it is again, that Boniface the eighth should have born before him the temporal Mace and naked Sword of the Emperour: or that any Pope should bear a triple Crown, or false upon him like a Lord and King. Wherefore let every man consider the compass and limitation of his charge, and exceed no further. The office of a Bishop or servitor Ecclesiastical, was in the old Law to offer sacrifice, to burn incense, to pray for the people, to expound the Law, to minister in the Tabernacle, with which office it was not lawful for any Priest or man else to intermeddle: as we read how Josias was punished for offering incense, and another for touching the Ark: so now the office of Christian Ministers, is, to preach the Word, to minister the Sacraments, to pray, to bind and loose, where cause urgently requireth, to judge the spiritual cases, to publish and denounce free reconciliation and remission in the name of Christ, to erect and comfort troubled Consciences, with the rich grace of the Gospel, to teach the people the true difference betwixt the Law and the Gospel, whereof the one belongeth to such as be not in Christ, and come not to him: the other pertaineth to the true believers in the Son of God: to admonish also the Magistrates erring or transgressing in their office, &c.

The office of civil Rulers and Magistrates.

And as these properly belong to the Function of the Ecclesiastical sort: so hath the civil Governor or Magistrate again his proper charge and office to him assigned, which is, to see the administration of justice and judgment, to defend with power the right of the weak that suffer wrong, to defend from oppression the poor oppressed, to minister with equity that which is right and equal to every man, to provide Laws good and godly, to see the execution of the same as cause moveth: especially to see the Law of God maintained, to promote Christs Glory and Gospel, in setting up and sending out good Preachers, in maintaining the same, in providing Bishops to be elected that be faithful, in removing or else correcting the same being faulty or negligent, in congregating the Clergy, when need is of any counsel or election, to hear their learning in causes propounded, and according to the truth learned, to direct his judgment in disposing such Rites and Ordinances for the Church, as make to edification, not to the destruction thereof: in conserving the discipline of the Church, and setting all things in a congruous order. Briefly, the office of the civil Ruler and Magistrate, extendeth to minister justice and judgment in all Courts, as well Ecclesiastical as Temporal: to have correction over all Transgressors, whether they be Lay-men or persons Ecclesiastical. And finally, all such things as belong to the moving of the Sword whatsoever, that is to say, all outward punishment is referred to the jurisdiction of the secular Magistrate, under whose subjection the Ordinance of God hath subjected all Orders and States of men.

Here we have the witness also of Hormisda, Bishop of Rome, which being well weighed, maketh the matter plain, that Princes have to deal in spiritual causes also, not only in temporal: where the said Hormisda writeth to Epiphanius, Patriarch of Constantinople in this fort: Clara cœlestis misericordiæ demonstratio procedit, quando reges seculi causas de fide cum gubernatione politæ conjunguntur. &c. ex Act. v. univers. concil. Constantini secundi. Anno 528. And thus much and too much peradventure concerning the matter of jurisdiction, in which point this new Church of Rome hath swerved from the ancient Church of Rome which was, as is sufficiently proved.

The third point wherein the Church of Rome hath broken, and is departed from the Church of Rome, is the form of stile and title annexed to the Bishop of that See. As where he is called Pope, most holy Father, Vicar general, and Vicar of Christ, successor of Peter, universal Bishop, Prince of Priests, Head of the Church universal. Summus orbis Pontifex, Stupor mundi, head Bishop of the World, the admiration of the World, neither God nor man, but a thing between both, &c. for all these terms be given him in Popish books. Albeit the name Pope, being a Greek name, derived of πάππας, which soundeth as much as Father in the Syracusane Speech, may peradventure seem more tolerable, as which hath been used in the old time among Bishops; for so Austin was called of the Council of Aphrick, Hierome of Boniface and others. Also Cyprian Bishop of Carthage was called Papa 24. q. 1. cap. loquitur 24. q. 3. cap. dist. 50. cap. De eo tamen. Item Clodoveus or (as Rhe-Dist. 50. cap. nanus calleth him) Ludovicus, first Christian King of France, calleth a certain simpler Bishop, Papam. Hieronymus also in his Epistle to Chromatius, calleth Valerianus by the name of Pope: and likewise writing to Eustathius and Fabiola, he calleth Epiphanius, Beatum Papam. In the Apologies of Athanasius, we read oftentimes that he was called Papa, and Archiepiscopus. Ruffinus also lib. 2. cap. 26. called him Pontificem maximum. Also Aurelius Prefident in the sixth Council of Carthage, was called of the said Council Papa, ex cap. 4. 17. Concil. Carthag. And before this, Eleutherius Bishop of Rome, writing to King Lucius, the first Christian King in this Land, calleth him in his Epistle, the Vicar of Christ, &c. But that any of these terms were so peculiarly applied to the Bishop of Rome, that other Bishops were excluded from the same, or that any one Bishop above the rest had the name of Oecumenical, or universal, or head, to the derogation of other Bishops, or with such glory as is now annexed to the same: that is not to be found neither in Histories of the old time, nor in any example of the Primitive Church, nor in the testimonies of ancient approved Doctors. First, before the Council of Nice, it is evident by Pope Pius the second, that there was no respect had to the Church of Rome, but every Church then was ruled by her own governance, till the year of our Lord, 340. Then followed the Council of Nice, wherein was decreed, that throughout the whole University of Christs

Ex Epist. Pii secundi. 109.

Leo Papa. Lugivrar. Papa a common name to all Bishops of higher knowledge and vertue. Hieron. ad Chromat. Eleut. in Decretal. Fabianus.

Christs Church, which was now far spread over all the world, certain Provinces or Precincts, to the number of four, were appointed, every one to have his head Church, and chief Bishop, called them Metropolitan or Patriarch, to have the overlight of such Churches as did lie about him. In the number of which Patriarchs or Metropolitans, the Bishop of Rome had the first place, the Bishop of Alexandria was the second, the Bishop of Antioch the third, the Bishop of Hierusalem was the fourth Patriarch. Afterward, in the number of these Patriarchs came in also the Bishop of Constantinople in the room of the Bishop of Antioch. So these four or five Metropolitans or Patriarchs, had their peculiar circuits and precincts to them peculiarly appointed, in such sort, as one of them should not deal within an others precinct, and also that there should be among them equality of honour, whereupon we read so oft in the decrees of the old counsels, τὰ ἴσα πρεσβεῖα ἔχειν τοὺς ἴσους, that is, Equal degree of Thrones, and of honour among Priests and Ministers. Again, speaking of the said Patriarchs or Primats, we read in the second and third chapter of the Council of Constantinople, ὑποτάσσειν τὴν ἐπαρχίαν τοῖς κατὰ βάρβαρα ἔθνη ὁροις, that is, That Bishops should not invade the Dioceese of other Bishops without their borders, nor confound together Churches, &c. Moreover, the old Doctors for the most and best part, do accord in one sentence, that all Bishops placed wheresoever in the Church of God, be Ejusdem meriti & honoris & successores Apostolorum, that is, To be of one merit, of like honour, and all to be successors together of the Apostles. Also he that is the Author of the Book called Dionysius Areopagita, calleth all the Bishops ἰσοτίμους καὶ ἰσοψήφους, that is, Of equal order, and of like honour, &c. All this while the Bishop of Rome was a Patriarch, and a Metropolitan or Bishop called of the first See, but no Oecumenical Bishop, nor head of the universal Church, nor any such matter. In so much, that he, with all other Bishops, was debarred from that, by a plain decree of the Council of Carthage, Can. 39. in their words, ἵνα τὸν πρώτον τῶν ἐπισκόπων μὴ λέγωσιν ἐξίστορον τῆς ἰδίας θρησκείας ἢ δικαίου τινὸς ἢ πάντων τὸ σύνολον that is, That the Bishop of the first Seat shall not be called the Prince of Priests, or the High Priest, or any such thing,

And left any here should take occation of cavelling, to hear him called Bishop of the first Seat, here is to be expounded what is meant by the first Seat, and wherefore he was so called: not for any dignity of the person, either of him which succeedeth, or of him whom he is said to succeed, but only of the place wherein he sitteth. This is plainly proved by the Council of Chalcedon, can. 28. Wherein is manifestly declared the cause why the See of Rome among all other Patriarchal Sees is numbred for the first See by the ancient Fathers: For why, saith the Council, διὰ τὸ θρόνον τῆς πρεσβυτέρας Ῥώμης· διὰ τὸ βασιλεύσαν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην· ἔφασαν οἱ πατέρες εἰκότως ἀπολελογῆσθαι τὴν πρεσβεῖαν τῇ θρόνῳ ταύτῃ· that is, For that our forefathers did worthily attribute the chief degree of honour to the See of old Rome, because the principal reign or empery was in that City, &c. The same also is confirmed by Eusebius Cæsariensis, declaring, Quod excellentia Romani Imperii extulit papatum Rom. pontificis supra aliat Ecclesias; That the excellency of the Roman Empery did advance the Popedom of the Roman Bishop above other Churches, &c. Ex Gab. Biel. Bibl. sfc. Moreover, saith the said Cæsariensis; Nicena Synodus hoc contulit privilegium Rom. pontifici, ut sicut Romanorum Rex Augustus præ cæteris appellatur; ita Rom. pontifex præ cæteris Episcopis Papa vocaretur. That is, The Council (saith he) of Nice gave this priviledge to the Bishop of Rome, that like as the King of the Romans is named Emperor above all other Kings, so the Bishop of the same City of Rome should be called Pope above other Bishops, &c. By these places hitherto alledged (and such other, many more than be here alledged) it appeareth, that though these Titles of Superiority had been attributed to the Bishop of Rome; yet it remaineth certain, that the said Bishop received that preferment, Jure non divino, sed humano, by mans law, not by the Law of God. And so is the difinction on of the Popes proved false, where is said: Romanum Ecclesiam non a consilio aliquo sed a divina voce primatum accepisse, That the Church of Rome took not his primacy by any Council, but only by the voice of God. And this is to be said, although it were true that these titles and terms were so given to the Bishop of Rome in the old time: yet how and by whom they were given, ye see. Now to try this matter, as joyning an issue with our Adversaries, whether these foresaid Titles of Soveraignty were applied in the old time of the primitive Church to the Bishop of Rome, as to be called the Vicar general of Christ, the head of the whole Church, and universal Bishop, remaineth to be proved. Whereunto this in my mind is to be answered, that albeit the Bishops of Rome (of some peradventure) were so called by the names of higher preeminence) of that City, of some going about to please them, or to crave some help at their hands: yet that calling, 1. Was used then but of a few. 2. Neither was given to many. 3. Was rather given than fought for, of the most. 4. Was not so given that it maketh or can make any general necessity of Law why every one is so bound to call them, as the Bishop of Rome now seeketh to be taken and called, and that by necessity of Salvation, as the decree of Pope Boniface the eighth witnesseth, where is said, Quod sit de necessitate salutis ut credatur primatus Ecclesiæ Rom. & ei subesse; That it standeth upon necessity of salvation, to believe the primacy of the Church of Rome, and to be subject to the same, &c.

1. 2. 3. 4.

As touching therefore these titles and terms of preeminence aforesaid, orderly to set forth and declare what Histories of times do say in that matter, by the Grace of Christ: First, we will see what be the Titles the Bishop of Rome doth take and challenge to himself, and what is the meaning of them. 2. When they first came in, whether in the primitive time or not, and by whom. 3. How they were first given to the Roman Bishops; that is, whether of necessary duty, or voluntary devotion, whether commonly of the whole, or particularly of a few; and whether in respect of Peter, or in respect of the City, or elle of the worthiness of the Bishop which there sat. 4. And if the aforesaid names were then given of certain Bishops, unto the Bishop of Rome: whether all the said names were given, or but certain, or what they were. 5. Or whether they were then received of all Bishops of Rome, to whome they were given, or elle refused of some. 6. And finally, whether they ought to have been refused being given, or not. Touching the discourse of which matters, although it appertain to the profession rather of Divines, than Historians, and would require a long and large debating; yet for so much as both in these, and divers other weighty Controversies of divinity, the knowledge of times and Histories must needs help Divines disputing about the same, so much as the Grace of Christ shall assist me therein, I will joyn to the seeking out of truth such help as I may.

1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6.

And first to begin with the Names and Titles now claimed and attributed to the See and Bishop of Rome, and what they be, is sufficiently declared above, that is, the Chief Priest of the World, The Prince of the Church, Bishop Apostolical, The universal Head of the Church, The Head Ecclesiastical, The universal Bishop of the Universal Church, The Successor of Peter, Alias body Pope, Vicar of God on Earth, Neither God nor man, but a mixt thing between both; The Patriarch or Metropolitan of the Church of Rome, The Bishop of the first See, &c. Unto the which Titles or Stiles is annexed a triple Crown, a triple Crosse, two crossed Keys, a naked Sword, seven-fold Seals, in token of the seven-fold Gifts of the Holy Ghost, he being carried sticking back upon mens shoulders, after the manner of the Heathen Kings, having all the Empire and the Emperor under his dominion: and that it is not convenient for any terrene Prince to Reign there, where he sitteth, having the plenary fulnes of power, as well of temporal things as spiritual things in his hands: that all things are his, and that all such Princes as have given him any thing, have given him but his own, having at his will and pleasure to preach Indulgences, and the Crosse against Princes whatsoever: and that the Emperor and certain other Princes, ought to make to him confession of subjection at their Coronation: having authority to depose, and that he De facto, hath deposed Emperors and the King of France: also to absolve the Subjects from their Allegiance to their Princes: whom Kings have served for foot-men to lead his horse, and the Emperor to hold his stirrop: that he may and doth give power to Bishops upon the bodies of men, and hath granted them to have Prisons; without whose Authority no general Council hath any force. And to whom Appellations in all manner of Causes may and ought to be made. That his Decrees

These things thus declared, now let us see whether these names and titles, with the form and manner of this Authority and regality above rehearsed, were ever attributed to any in the primitive time of the Bishop of Rome. For all these he doth challenge and claim unto him by old possession from the time of Saint Peter. And here a question is to be asked of our Adversaries the Papists, Whether they will avouch all these aforesaid titles, together with the whole form and tenour of regality to the same belonging as is afore touched, or not? If they will, let them come forth with their Allegations, which they never have done yet, nor ever shall be able. If they will not, or cannot avouch them altogether in manner as is specified, then why doth the Bishop claim them all together so floutly, usurp them so falsely, and obtrude them upon us so strictly? Moreover if the said our Adversaries, being convicted by plain evidence of History, and example of time, will yield unto us (as they must needs) in part, and not in the whole; let us come then to the particulars, and see what part of this regality they will defend, and derive from the ancient custom of the primitive Church, (that is, from the first five hundred years, I mean after Christ.) First, in the Council of Nice, which was the year of our Lord, 340. and in the sixth Canon of the said Council, we find it so decreed: that in every Province or Precinct some one Church, and Bishop of the same, was appointed and set up to have the inspection and regiment of other Churches about him, Secundum morem antiquum; that is, After the ancient custom, as the words of the Council do purport: so that the Bishop of Alexandria should have power of Libya, and Pentapolis in Egypt, forasmuch as the Bishop of the City of Rome hath the like or fame manner. And in like fort also in Antioch and in other Countries, let every Church have his due honour, and consequently that the Bishop of Jerusalem have also his due honour to him referred, so that such order be kept, that the Metropolitan Cities be not defrauded of their dignity which to them is due and proper, &c. In this Council and in the fame Canon sixth and seventh, where the Bishops of Alexandria, of Rome, and of Antioch are joyned together in one like manner of Dignity. First, there appeareth no difference of honour to be meant therein. Secondly, forsomuch as in the said two Canons after mention made of them, immediately followeth, that no Bishop should be made without consent of their Metropolitans, yea and that the City also of Hierusalem should be under his Metropolitan, and that the Metropolitan should have the full power to confirm every Bishop made in his Province: therefore it may be well suspected, that the third Epistle Decretal of Pope Anacletus, and of Pope Stephanus, with other more, are forged, wherein these Bishops, and especially the Bishop of Rome, is exempted and differered from the name of a Metropolitan or an Archbishop, to the name of a Patriarch or Primate: as appeareth in the decrees, Dist. 22. cap. Sacrosancta. Wherefore as we must needs grant the Bishop of Rome to be a Metropolitan or Archbishop by the Council of Nice; so we will not greatly stick in this also, to have him numbred with Patriarchs or Primats. Which title seemeth in the old time to be common to more Cities than to Rome, both by the Epistle of Anacletus, of Pope Stephanus, of Pope Julius and Leo, &c.

The Bishop of Rome called Metropolitan, Archbishop, Patriarch, Primat.

After this followed a general Council in Africk, called the sixth Council of Carthage, Anno 420. where were congregated two hundred and seventeen Bishops, among whom was also Augustinus, Prosper, Orosius, with divers other famous persons. This Council continued the space of five years, wherein was great contention about the Supremacy and Jurisdiction of Rome: the Bishop whereof then was Zosimus. This Zosimus the Romen Bishop had received the same time into the Communion of the Church without any examination, one that came to complain to him out of Africk, named Apiarius, a Priest whom Aurelius the Metropolitan with the Council of Africk had worthily excommunicated for his detestable conditions before. Upon this Zosimus after that he had received and shewed such favour to Apiarius, for that he did appeal to him, sendeth to the Council his Messengers, to wit, Faustinus Bishop of Potentine, and two Priests of the Church of Rome, named Philippus and Asellus, with these four requests: First, that Apiarius, whom he had abfolved might be received of them again, and that it might be lawful for Bishops or Priests to appeal from the sentence of their Metropolites, and also of the Council to the See of Rome.

Ex concilio Carthag. 6. cap. 12. Bibliand. Chronic.

Secondly, that Bishops should not fail over importunely Ad comitatum. Thirdly, that if any Priest or Deacon were wrongfully Excommunicate by the Bishops of their own Province, it should be lawful for them to remove the hearing and judging of their cause to their neighbour Bishops. Fourthly, that Urbanus their Bishop, either should be excommunicated, or elle sent up to Rome, unless he would correct those things that were to be corrected, &c. For the approbation whereof, the said Zosimus alledged for him the words (as he pretended) taken out of Nicene Council. The Council of Carthage hearing this, and remembring no such thing in the Council of Nice to be decreed, and yet not suspecting the Bishop of Rome, to dare wrongfully to falsifie the words of that Council, writeth again to Zosimus, declaring that they never read to their remembrance, in their common Latin exemplar of the Nicene Council any such Canon, yet notwithstanding for quietnes sake, they would observe the fame time till they might procure the Original Copies of that Council to be sent to them from Constantinople, Alexandria, and from Antioch. In like effect afterward they wrote to Pope Boniface, which then succeeded Zosimus. And thirdly also to Celestinus, which shortly after succeeded Boniface.

Ex concilio Carthag. 6. cap. 12.

The Popes wont to falsifie the decrees of Nicene Council.

In the mean time this forefaid Council sent their Legates, Marcellus and Innocentius to Atticus Patriarch of Constantinople, and to Cyrillus Patriarch of Alexandria, for the authentick Copies in Greek of Nicene Council, which being sent unto them, and they finding in the true Originals no such Canon, as the Bishop of Rome had falsely forged, they wrote a sharpe and an handsome Letter to Celestinus Bishop of Rome, calling him in the said Letter by the way Domine frater: declaring to him, how they had perfused all the Copies of the Council of Nice, and could find no such Canon as he and his Predecessors had falsely alledged, and therewithall reciting the sixth Canon afore mentioned, declared how the decrees of the Nicene Council had committed all and singular perfons Ecclesiastical, as well Bishops as other, unto the charge of their Metropolitans. Moreover expounding the fame Decree, they shewed the reason thereof.

The Bishop of Rome called Dominus frater, that is brother Bishops of all the Copies of the Council of Nice proved falsified by the Bishop of Rome.

Five reasons why matters of the Church ought not to be hurried out of other Countries unto Rome.

1. For that (say they) the Fathers of that Council did well forefee, to be most just and convenient, that all Controverfies there be ended (in iisdem locis) where they begin. 1.

2. For that it is not to be fuppofed contrary, but that the Grace of God will be as preft and ready in one Province as in an other, to inftruct his Miniifters both prudently to underftand judgment, and conftantly to maintain the fame. 2.

3. For that there is no need to feek further to any Outlandish help, becaufe fpecially that the party whofoever is not contented with the determination of his Judges or Commiffioners, may lawfully appeal either to the Provincial or to any general Council. 3.

4. That way to be better, than to run to any foreign Judge, it muft needs be granted; becaufe it is not like that our God will inspire his Juftice and Truth of examining unto one Bishop, and deny it unto a multitude congregated in a whole Council. 4.

5. Neither can it be, that any fuch Outlandish judgement in hearing and determining caufes, can ftand perfect and upright, for that the neceffary perfons of witneffes, either for infirmity of Sex, of Age, of Sickneß, or fome other impeach- 5. Every Country to appeal firft to his own Metropolitan, fecondly to a Provincial or general Council.

Impeachment are not be able to present by whom the truth of the sentence should be directed. Wherefore as by these and other reasons they thought it not convenient from them to bring their matters over unto Rome: so neither was it to be found, said they, by any Council of the old Fathers decreed, that any Legats should be sent from Rome to them, for deciding of their matters. And therefore exhorted they the said Bishop of Rome, that he would not induce Fumofam typhum (or rather as I may call it) typhos fecuii, in Ecclesiam Christi, quæ lucem simplicitatis & humilitatis præfert ei qui Deum diligunt: that is, That he would not induce the swelling pride of the world into the Church of Christ, which Church sheweth and giveth the light of simplicity and of humility to such as love God, &c. In these foresaid Letters moreover is signified, how the forenamed Malefactor Apiarius, whom the Bishop of Rome before had absolved and received to the Communion of the Church, was afterward found culpable, and therefore the Council proceeded against him, brought him to open confession of his faults, and so injoyned him due penance for his demerits, notwithstanding the absolution and inconsiderate clearing of the Bishop of Rome before proceeding.

Fumofum typhum fe-cuii.

Summary notes gathered out the Council of Carthage against the Pope.

1. In sum, out of this Council of Carthage these points are to be noted. First, how glad the Bishops of Rome were to receive such as came to them for succour.

2. What pride they took by the occasion thereof, thinking and seeking thereby to have all under their subjection.

3. To the intent to allure other to seek to them, how ready they were to release and quit this Apiarius as guiltless, which after was to be tried culpable by his own confession.

4. How contrary to the acts and doings of the Romish Bishop, this Council condemned him, whom the said Bishop of Rome before had absolved, little respecting the proceedings of the Romish Church.

5. How the Bishops of old time, have been falsifiers of ancient Councils and Writings, whereby it may be sufficiently ed, that they which shamed not to falsifie and corrupt the Council of Nice, muchless would they stick to abuse and falsifie the decretal Epistles and Writings of particular Bishops and Doctors for their own advantage, as no doubt they have done many one.

6. In this foresaid Council, whereat Augustine himself was present, and where Aurelius President of the same, was called Papa, the Bishop of Rome was called expresly in their Letters but Bishop of the City of Rome, and Dominus frater, that is, brother Lord Bishop.

7. The Dominion of this Roman Patriarch, in the said Council of Carthage, was cut so short, that neither it was permitted to them of Africk to appeal over the Sea to him, nor for him to send over his Legats to them for ending their Controversies. Whereby it may sufficiently appear, that the Bishop of Rome in those days was not at all admitted to be the chief of all other Bishops, nor the head of the universal Church of Christ in earth, &c.

8. We hear in this Council, five causes or reasons given, why it is not necessary nor yet convenient for all foreign causes to be brought to one universal Head or Judge, as is before recited.

9. Lastly, by the said Council of Carthage, we hear a vertuous exhortation to be given to the Bishop of Rome, that he would not induce into the meek and humble Church of Christ, the fuming and swelling pride of the World, as is before declared, &c. In this, or in some other Council of Carthage, it was moreover provided by expres Law, and also specified in the Popes decrees, that no Bishop of the first Seat, should be called the Prince of Priests, or the chief Priest, or any such like thing; but only the Bishop of the first Seat, as followeth more in the said decree. Universalis autem nec etiam Romanus Pontifex appelletur, that is, Be it enacted, that no Bishop, no not the Bishop of Rome, be called universal Bishop, &c. And thus much concerning this foresaid Council of Carthage.

Dift.99 cap. I dicit ipse.

The Bishops title forbidden to be called universal Bishop.

Synodus Milevitana.

The Bishop of Rome forbidden to be called universal Bishop.

Not long before this Council, was celebrated in Africk an other Council, called Synodus Milevitana, about the year of our Lord, 442. at the which Council also S. Augustine was present, where it was decreed under pain of Excommunication, that no Minister or Bishop should appeal over the Sea to the Bishop of Rome. Whereby it may appear that the Bishop of Rome all this space was not universally called by the term of Oecumenical or universal Bishop, but Bishop of the first Seat: so that if there were any preferment therein, it was in the reverence of the place, and not in the authority of the person. And yet it was not so in the place, that the place imported the City of Rome only, but the first Seat then was called Metropolitan Church, as by the words of the Nicene Council, and other Constitutions more is to be seen, where the four Patriarchs were called πρῶτοι, or πρωτόθρονοι, or πρωτεῖοι, as namely, by the words of the Council of Carthage may appear which be these: εἰ μὲν μετὰ ἀναβάσεως τὸν πρῶτον καθέζηται ἢ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἴσου τόπου ἐξουσίαν ἔχει τοῦτο πρᾶσσειν. that is, That the Bishop of the first Seat be not called Prince of Priests, or head Priest, or else any such like. Again, Anicetus the tenth Bishop of Rome, and Pope Stephan, and Pope Felix, making a differences between a Primate and Metropolitan, writeth thus: Let no Archbishops be called Primates, but only such as have the first Seat, &c. This it is made plain, how the Bishop of the first Seat, or first Bishop, or Primate is none other but he which was called Patriarch, and belonged not only to the Church of Rome, but to all such Cities and places whereas before among the Gentiles were Primi flamines, &c. dist. 80. cap. urbes & loca, & in illis. Where, by the way, is to be noted the repugnance or contrariety of such as craftily, but falsely have counterfeited the Popes decretal Epistles: which befides other great and many Conjectures also hereby may be gathered. For where Clement, Anacletus, Epi. 2. Anicetus and other, joyning together the office of Patriarchs and Primates, do divide the same from the order of Metropolitans, or Archbishops, alledging therein the constitution of the Apostles and their Succeffors, that is to be found false by the Canons of the Apostles, by the Council of Nice, and by the Council of Antioch, with other more. For in the Canons of the Apostles, where in every Canon, almoft, mention is made of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, no word is there touched either of any order above the Bishop, or lower than the Deacon, save only in the thirty three Canon, setting an order among Bishops, the Canon willeth the Bishop of every Nation to know their first or chief Bishop, and him to be taken for the Head of them: he saith not the Head of the Church, or Head of the world, but the Head of those Bishops. And where? not in Rome words purport, τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἕθνους ἑκάστου γνῶναι τὸν πρῶτον αὐτῶν καὶ τοῦτον ὡς κεφαλὴν αὐτοῦ μὴ τι πράττειν περιττὸν ἐπὶ τῇ διοικήσει ἐκείνου ἃ μὴ καὶ ἑκάστη παροικία καὶ τοῖς ὑπὸ τὴν ἐξουσίαν αὐτῆς τόποις ἀναγκαῖον ἐστι πράττειν· that is, The Bishops of every Nation ought to know the first or chief among them, &c. Moreover, the Council of Antioch reciting the forefaid Canon word for word, expoundeth the matter plainly, in stead of τὸν πρῶτον, writing ἢ ὃν μητροπόλεως ἀφορῶντα ἐπίσκοπον: which is as much to say as Metropolitan; and in the end of the faid Canon, calleth him ἢ τὸν μητροπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον, that is, Id eft, Metropolitanum, &c. i. per singulas. Whereby it is concluded, that to be falfe, that Clement and Anacletus, and Anicetus be reported (but falsely) to put a difference between Primats or Patriarchs, and Metropolitans, or Archbishops: Whereas by sufficient authority it is to be proved, that in the old Church both Primats, first Bishops, Bishops of the first Seat, Patriarchs, Metropolitans, Bishops of the mother City, and Archbishops were all one. First, that Primates and Metropolitans were both one, is before declared by the Canons of the Apostles, and by the Council of Antioch aforesaid. Again, that Patriarchs and Archbishops were all one, it is evident Ex Novella Justiniani, Novell. 3. cap. 23. where the faid Constitution reciting the four Patriarchs (above mentioned) calleth them by the name of Archbishops. And a little after calleth the Patriarch of Constantinople, Archbishop, by these words: ὁσίτατε ἀρχιεπίσκοπε ἀγαπητὲ τοῦ Κωνσταντινουπόλεως, ἢ πατριάρχου ἐπίσκοπε that is, Which be under the Archbishop and Patriarch of Constantinople. And after speaking more plainly in the matter, setteth an other order, divers from that of Clement, Anacletus, and Anicetus, in placing these aforeforesaid persons, first beginning with Bishops, then over them setteth the Metropolitan, and over him again the Archbishop, and there staveth, making no further mention of any other above him: whose words be these, ὅσιος ἐπίσκοπος ἐπὶ τὸ καταρχικώτερον, ἢ τότε μητροπολίτου ἔζευκτέον τὸ ἅρμαμα, εἰ δὲ μητροπολίτης ἐπὶ τὸ μακαριώτερον, ὑφ' ὃν τάσσει. that is, if a Bishop be accused, the Metropolitan to have the examination of those things that are brought against him; if the Metropolitan be accused, then the Archbishop to have the hearing thereof, under whom he dwelleth and pertaineth, &c.

And in the same constitution moreover, οὐδὲ ὃ ποιεῖ κλινεῖ, ἢ ἄλλα οὐκ ὄντα ἀφορίζειν καὶ ἐπίσκοπον γινόμενα πρῶτον ὁ μητροπολίτης τὸ ἀφόρισμα διακινήσει, ὃ ἐπὶ τῆς τῶν κακούργων αὐτόπτου, ἐπὶ ἢ μακροθύμου ἀγορεύσαντος ὃ πατριάρχων τῆς διοικήσεως ἐκείνης ἀναφέρεσθαι τὸ ἀφόρισμα, &c. If any suit or supplication be brought against a Bishop by a Minister, or any other, first the Metropolitan to have the deciding of the matter, and if any default shall be found in the judgment thereof, then the hearing and ending of the cafe to be brought before the Archbishop, &c.

In this Constitution of Justinian, although the Metropolitan be placed above the Bishop, and the Archbishop above the Metropolitan: yet notwithstanding by this is sufficiently confuted the forged Constitution of Clement, Anacletus, Anicetus, Stephanus, and Felix: who in their Epistles decretal, joyn together in one form and order, both Archbishop and Metropolitan, and above them both do place the Patriarch, and above the Patriarch the Apostolical See, to wit, the Bishop of Rome, as may appear in reading the first Epistle of Clement: In illis autem civitatibus, &c. The second Epistle of Anacletus art. 4. Provincia. dist. 99. cap. Nulli Archiepiscop. Also the Epistle of Pope Stephan the first, Art. 5. (where note by the way, that Gratianus referreth this place of the Epistle to Pope Lucius.) Item, the Epistle of Pope Felix the second, Art. 12. In all which forefaid Epistles, this order and difference of degrees is taken, that the first and principal place is given to Primates, or Patriarchs, the second to Metropolitans, or Archbishops, the third to Bishops, and finally above all these is extolled the Apostolical See of the Bishop of Rome, contrary to all that which before hath been alledged out of Justinian, the Council of Nice and of Antioch, &c. Whereby it may appear that either Justinian in preferring Archbishops above Metropolitans, did not read these Epistles decretal, if they were unfeigned; or if they were forged, they which forged the faid Epistles in their names, did not well advife that Justinian had written in this matter before.

Thus then these Titles above recited, as Bishop, Metropolitan, the Bishop of the first See, Primate, Patriarch, Archbishop; that is to say, chief Bishop, or head Bishop to other Bishops of his Province, we deny not but were in the old time applied, and might be applied to the Bishop of Rome, like as the same also were applied to other Patriarchs in other chief Cities and Provinces.

As touching the name likewise of the High Priest, or high Priesthood, neither do I deny but that it hath been found in old Monuments and Records of ancient times: but in fach wife and sort as it hath been common to Bishops indifferently, and not singularly attributed to any one Bishop or See. Whereof teftimony we have out of the seventh general Council, Dist. 38. cap. Omnes, where the Bishops office is called Summum sacerdotium, The High Priesthood: in these words, Subftantia summi sacerdotii nostri sunt eloquia divinitus tradita, i. vera divinarum scripturarum disciplina, &c.

That is, the fubftance (fay they) of our High Priesthood, is the word of discipline of holy Scriptures given us from above, &c.

And likewise the Council of Agatha maketh relation,

How they began both Constantinople, to take the name of universal Bishop.

Ex quinta synodo universali, actio me primo. cap. pol. concilium. Ibid. cap. dom. nostro.

said Councill is titled Oecumenicus Patriarcha: ex Concil. in general. 5. cap. Domino. Concerning the which title although it was then used in Constantinople through the sufferance of the Emperors, being then willing to have their Imperial City advanced: yet notwithstanding this forefaid title, all this while, was not in the City of Rome. And in Constantinople it stood not then in force (Jure aliquo divino) but only by mans Law. And thirdly, it was then but only Verbalis titulus: having no true domination upon all other Churches, or any real subjection belonging to the same; For as much as neither the Bishop of Rome, nor any of the West Churches were subject or did acknowledge service unto them, but rather did repugne the same: namely, Pelagius the second, and Gregorius the first, both Bishops at that time of Rome, which Pelagius writing to all Bishops, saith plainly in these words: that no Patriarch should take the name of universality at any time, because that if any be called Universal, the name of Patriarch is derogate from all other. But let this be far, saith he, from all faithful men, to will to take that thing to him, whereby the honour of his brethren is diminished. Wherefore the said Pelagius chargeth all such Bishops, that none of them in their Letters will name any Patriarch to be universal, lest he take from himself the honour due to him, while they give that which is not due to another. What can be more evident than these words of Pelagius, who was Bishop of Rome next before Gregory, Anno 583? In like manner or more plainly, and more earnestly writeth also Gregory of this matter in his Register, proving and disputing that no man ought to be called Universal Bishop. Moreover, with sharp words and rebukes, detesting the same title, calling it new, foolish, proud, perverse, wicked, prophane, and such as to consent unto it, is as much as to deny the Faith. He added further and faith, That Whosoever goeth about to extoll himself above other Bishops, in so doing followeth the fact of Satan, to whom it was not sufficient to be counted equal or like unto other Angels. In his Epistles how oft doth he repeat and declare the same to repugne directly against the Gospel, and ancient decrees of Councils? affirming that none of his Predecessors did ever usurp to himself that stile or title, and concludeth that whosoever so doth, declareth himself to be a Forerunner of Antichrist, &c. With this judgment of Gregory well agree also the words of Saint Augustine, lib. 3. cap. de baptismo, where reciting the words of Cyprian, he thus saith: Neque enim quisquam nostrum se Episcopum Episcoporum constituit, aut Tyrannico more ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit, &c. that is, For none of us doth ever set himself to be Bishop of Bishops, or after a tyrannical manner doth subdue and bring under his Fellows unto the necessity of his obedience, &c. By these words of Cyprian, and Augustine, it is manifest that in their time was no Supremacy, or universal Title among Bishops received, not that any great respect was had to the Bishop of Rome (as Pius the Second saith, Epist. 301.) before the Council of Nice. And after this that Council the said Bishop of Rome had no further authority to him limited, than only over his Province, and places suburbane, bordering about the City of Rome. Against whose Primacy divers Cities also did resist long after that, as the Church of Ravenna, Mediolanensis, and Aquilegiensis. Also the Greek Churches long resisted the same, so did the Churches of Asia Rutenicæ, Mosoviticæ, Valachicæ, and other more.

But to return again to Gregory, who confirming the Sentence of Pelagius his Predecessor above mentioned, had no small Conflicts about this Title matter, both with the Patriarch, and with the Emperor of Constantinople, as witnesseth Antonius, and other, &c. The History is thus: After that John being made of a Monk Patriarch of Constantinople, by his flattery and hypocrisie, had obtained of Mauricius the Emperor to be extolled above other Bishops, with the name of Universal Patriarch, and that he would write to Gregory then Bishop of Rome, for his consent concerning the same: Gregory abiding still in his constancy, did set himself stoutly against that Antichristian Title, and would give no place. At the same time the Lombards had invaded the Country of Italy, and the City of Rome, the Emperor keeping then at Constantinople, and setting in Italy an Overseer called Exarchus, to rule in Ravenna. Gregory perceiving the Emperor Mauricius to be displeased with him about the matter afore touched, writeth to Constantina the Empress, arguing and declaring in his Letters, that Presumption and Pride of him to be universal Patriarch, was both against the rule of the Gospel, and decrees of the Canons; namely, the sixth Canon of the Nicene Council, and the novelty of that new found title to declare nothing else, but that the time of Antichrist was near. Upon this, Mauricius the Emperor taking displeasure with him, called home his Souldiers again from Italy, and inciteth the Lombards against the Romans: who with their King Agilulphus, thereupon contrary to their League made before, set upon the City of Rome, and besieged it a whole year together, Gregory yet notwithstanding still remaining in his former constancy. After these Afflictions thus overpast, Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, writeth to the said Gregory in his Letters, naming him Universal Pope: unto whom Gregory refusing the same, answereth again as followeth.

Ex Antonio tit. 22. c. 3.

The Letter of Gregory to the Patriarch of Alexandria.

Behold: in the Preface of your Epistle directed to me, ye have used a word of a proud name, calling me Universal Pope, which I pray your Holiness you will cease hereafter to do, for that is derogated from you, whatsoever is attributed to another more than right and reason requireth. As for me I seek not mine advancement in words, but in manners: neither do I account that any Honour wherein the Honour of my Brethren I see to be hindred: for my Honour I take to be the Honour of the Universal Church: my Honour is the whole and perfect vigour of my Brethren. Then am I honoured when to no man is denied the due honour which to him belongeth. For if your Holiness call me Universal Pope, in so doing you deny your self to be that, which ye affirm me to be, Universal: but that God forbid. Let these words therefore go, which do nothing but puff up Vanity, and wound Charity, &c.

The answer of Gregory to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria. Epist. 30. Lib. 4.

Gregory refuseth the name of universal Pope.

It were too long here to infer all such Letters and Epistles of his concerning this matter, written to the Emperor Mauricius and Constantina the Empress, but that shall more largely appear hereafter (Christ willing) in the body of the History, when we come to the year and time of Gregory, which was well nigh six hundred years after Christ. In the mean season this is sufficient to declare, how the Church of Rome with the form and manner of their title of Universal Supremacy now used and maintained, hath utterly swerved from the ancient steps of the Primitive Church of Rome.

Now let us see what the Adversary side hath to Object again for the title of their Universality, or rather Singularity. And first here cometh in a blind cavillation of a certain Sophister, who glossing upon the words of Pelagius above recited, laboureth to colour the plain Text with a subtile meaning, as though the sense of the Canon were this, not to deny there the state of Supremacy: Sed negari ibi aliquem posse esse Universitatem Episcopum, sub eo sensu dumtaxat, quod esset cujusque Ecclesiæ proprius rectus, ita quod nullus alius esset Episcopus, &c. that is, But to deny there, that any may be Universal Bishop after this sense and meaning only, so that he should be the proper Pastor of every Church alone, and that there should be no other Bishop beside himself, &c. Thus goeth this Sophister about to dash out this Text, but he cannot so discharge the matter. For neither did John the Patriarch then seek any such thing to be Bishop and proper Pastor of every Church alone; nor if he had, the Council of Chalcedon and the Emperor Justinian would never have agreed thereunto. Neither is it true, that this Glosser denieth Pelagius, here to forbid the Primacy or Supremacy of that Patriarch, which indeed is the only intent of Pelagius in that Canon, witnessing as well other Historiographers, as namely, Anton. tit. 12. cap. 3. par. 13. and also the glosa ordinary upon the same Canon, &c.

Pelag. 2. Epist. 1.

A Sophisticall Cavillation upon the words of Pelagius and Gregory answered.

Out of the same Fountain springeth the like or very same reason of late renewed by a certain new start English Clerk in these our days, who answering to the places of Gregory touching the said matter, laboureth to avoid the clear authority of him, by a like blind cavillation, saying that John Bishop of Constantinople, by this title of Universal Bishop, understood himself only to be a Bishop, and none else.

An objection of a certain late English writer refuted.

And that Gregory in resisting him, had none other meaning but the same. And to prove this to be the very meaning of Gregory, he reciteth the words of Gregory, written to the said John Archbishop of Constantinople as followeth, Qui enim indignum te esse fatebaris, ut Episcopus dici debuisses, ad hoc quandoque perductus es, ut despectis fratribus Episcopus appetat solus vocari: that is to say, For thou (John Bishop of Constantinople) which sometime didst grant thy self unworthy the name of a Bishop, are now come to this, that thou dost seek to be called a Bishop alone, &c. Upon this word Episcopus solus; this Glosser would ground a furmise, that Gregory did find fault with the Archbishop, not for any Primacy which he fought for above other Bishops, but only for that he coveted to be a Bishop and Pastor alone in every Church, in such sort, as there should be no other Bishop nor Pastor else, but himself only. But as is said, that was never the Archbishops seeking, nor the matter of Gregories reprehension. For the said Bishop of Constantinople went not about to be Bishop alone (which was too much absurd, and also impossible) but to be Universal alone: nor to take away the office from other, but the honour from other; not to depose them, but to despise them. And therefore saith Gregory, Ut despectis fratribus, not Depositis fratribus: so that this word Solus, here noteth a despising of other, not a deposing of other, and importeth a singularity in condition above other, and not the office or substance of ministration without other, that is to be universal among many, and not to be alone without any, nor to diminish the number of them, but only to increase the honour to himself: For the more evident probation whereof (although the thing it self is so evident, that it needeth no proof) what can be more plain, than the words themselves of Pelagius and Gregory? wherewith they charge him for running before his Brethren, for challenging Superiority above them, for diminishing their honour, by taking more honour than to him was due, for following the Angel of Pride in exalting himself, in admitting that to him, which the Bishops of Rome and their Predecessors had refused, being offered to them before, &c. All which declare that he fought not to thrust out all other Bishops out of their Churches, and to be Bishop himself alone. For that was never offered to the Bishops of Rome by the Council of Chalcedon, that they should be Bishops alone, and none other. Neither did Lucifer seek to have no more Angels in all Heaven but himself, but he to be above all other alone.

A place of Gregory explained.

Ex Epist. Greg. 36. lib. 4.

Likewise the word Præcurrere, that is, To run before other, in the Epistle of Pelagius, declareth that John fought not to be Bishop alone, but Bishop universal. We say not that a man runneth before another, when he runneth alone, and no man followeth him, that is not properly Præcurrere, but Solus currere. Moreover, in seeking to be Superior to other Bishops, he seeketh not to take away other Bishops, but to make other Bishops inferior to him. For where no Inferior is, there can be no Superior, forsomuch as these together are Correlatives, and infer necessary respect mutually. And if it were true as this Glosser saith, that he had fought to be Bishop alone, how would that Council either have granted that unto him, or have offered it to the Bishop of Rome before? or if they had, how could it be possible for him alone to serve all Churches, without any Fellow Bishop to help him? And where this forefaid Clerk standeth so much upon the words of Saint Gregory: Solus Episcopus: Gregory therefore shall expound Gregory, and one Solus shall declare another. Wherefore if this Divine (whatsoever he be, Doctor or Batchelor) either knoweth not, or would learn, what (only Bishop) meaneth in this place: another place of the said Gregory may instruct him, where Gregory writing to Eulogius, Patriarch of Alexandria, giveth this reason why he refused the same title offered to him (which then was offered to the said John Patriarch of Constantinople) saying, Quia videlicet si unus Patriarcha universalis dicitur, Patriarchatum nomen cæteris derogatur, sed absit hoc, &c. That is to say, For if one alone would be called a Patriarch universal, then should the name of Patriarchs be derogated from all other, &c. Whereby two things are to be noted: First, what thing it was which the Patriarch of Constantinople did seek, for Gregory here findeth no other fault, but with the same which was given to John, which was to be called Patriarch Universal. The second thing to be noted, is the cause why Gregory did rebuke this title, both given to John, and offered to him: because (saith he) if one take upon him the name of Universal Patriarch, then is the name Patriarch taken from the rest. As who would say, If I would take upon me to be named Universal Patriarch, then should there be no other Patriarch, but I should be Bishop Patriarch alone. And here cometh in your Solus Episcopus, &c.

Ex Epist. Greg. 30. lib. 4.

Furthermore the same Gregory (speaking of the said Solus, in another place by, seemeth to declare there, what he meaneth by this Solus here, in these words as follow, Ut & nulli subesse, & solus omnibus præesse videretur: that is to say, So that he would be subject to none, and would be chieftain to all other alone, &c. And so by this place may the other place be expounded, Ut solus Episcopus sit is, qui solus inter Episcopos præesse appetat: that is, He that seeketh to be as Bishop alone: who alone seeketh to be extolled above other Bishops. But to be short in a matter that needeth not many words: he that thus cavilleth upon this place Solus Episcopus in Gregory, must be desired here not to take Solus alone, but joyn withall the word going before, which is, Despectis fratribus. By the which might seem sufficiently declared what Gregory meant by Solus Episcopus, meaning, that to despise other Bishops, and to diminish their honour, to set up his own, and to be subject to none, but to prefer himself inequally before all others, is as much as to be counted Bishop alone. And thus much touching this Objection.

Ex Epist. Greg. 38. lib. 4.

Another Objection of our Adversaries is this: Although (say they) no Bishop of Rome was ever called, or would be called by the name of Universal Bishop, yet it followeth not therefore, that they be not, or ought not to be Heads of the Universal Church. Their reason is this:

Another confession refuted.

As S. Peter had the Charge of the whole Church (by the testimony of Gregory) committed unto him, although he were not called Universal Apostle.

So no more absurd it is for the Pope to be called the head of the whole Church, and to have the Charge thereof, although he be not called Universal Bishop, &c.

A double untruth in one Popish argument. Peter how he had charge and not charge of the Church. The first untruth in this argument. The dignity of the Church above the Apostles.

Wherein is a double Untruth to be noted: first, in that they pretend Peter to be the Head, and to have the Charge of the whole Church: if we take here (Charge or Head) for Dominion or Mastership upon or above the Church in all Cases judiciary, both Spiritual and Temporal: for the words of the Scripture be plain, Non dominantes in clerum, 1 Pet. Vos autem non sic, Luk. 22. that is, Not as Masters over the Clergy, &c. But you not so, &c. Again, that the Church is greater, or rather the head of Peter, it is clear, 1 Cor. 3. All things are yours, whether it be Paul, or Apollo, or Cephas: either the world, death, or life, you be Christs, Christ is Gods, &c. In which words the Dignity of the Church no doubt is preferred above the Apostles, and above Cephas also. Moreover, as the dignity of the Wife is above the Servant, so must needs the honour and worthiness of the Church (being the Spouse of Christ) surmount the state of Peter or other Apostles, which be but Servants to Christ and to the Church; yea, and though they were Princes of the Church, yet after the mind of Baldus, Magis attendatur persona intellectualis, quam organica. Otherwise if by this word (Charge) be meant only the office and diligence of teaching; to that I answer, The same Lord that said to Peter, Feed my sheep, said also to the other, Go and Preach this Gospel to all Nations. And he that said to Peter, Whatsoever thou loosest, said also to the other, Whatsoever ye remit in the Earth. Moreover, if the matter go by preaching, Paul the Apostle laboured more therein, than ever did Peter by his own confession, Plus laboravi; also suffered more for the same, Plus sustinui; neither was his Doctrine less found. Yea, and in one point he went before Peter, and was Teacher and School-Master unto Peter, whereas Peter was by him justly corrected, Gal. 2. Furthermore, teaching is not always nor in all things a point of Judiciary, but sometime a point of Service. As if a French-man should be put to an English-man to teach him French, although he excelleth him in that kind of faculty: yet it followeth not therefore, that he hath fulness of power upon him, to appoint his Diet, to rule his Houshold, to prescribe his Laws, to flint his Lands, and such other. Wherefore seeing in travel of Teaching, in pains of Preaching, in gifts of Tongues, in largeness of Commission, in operation of Miracles, in grace of Vocation, in receiving the Holy Ghost, in vehemency of Torments, and death for Christs Name, the other Apostles were nothing inferior to Vide Baldum consil. 259. lib. 1. Proofs and reasons that there was no inequality of precedence among the Apostls.

Office of teaching giveth no dominion further than the books.

Peter in no point excelleth the reſt of the Apoſtles.

Peter : why Peter then ſhould claim any ſpecial Prerogative above the reſt, I underſtand no cauſe. As indeed he never claimed any : but the Patrons of the Apoſtolical See do claim it for him, which he never claimed himſelf : neither if he were here, would no leſs abhor it with Soul and Conſcience than we do now : and yet our abhorring now is not for any malice of perſon,or any vantage to our ſelves, but only the vehemency of Truth, and Zeal to Chriſt and to his Congregation. Moreover,if theſe men would needs have Peter to be the Curate and Overſeer of the whole univerſal Church (which was too much for one man to take Charge of) and to be Prince of all other Apoſtles, then would I fain learn of them,what meaneth (Dextræ ſocietatis) the right hand of Society between Peter, Paul, and Barnabe, mentioned *Gal.*2. What taking of hands is there between Subjects and their Prince,in way of fellowſhip ? Or where fellowſhip is,what Maſterſhip is there? Or again,what ſtate of Maſterſhip is it like that Chriſt would give to Peter, who being indeed Maſter of all, took ſuch little Maſterſhip upon himſelf, and that not only in inward affection, but alſo in outward fact ? Although I am not ignorant that Peter in divers places of the Goſpel hath his Commendation, neither do I deny Peter to be worthy of the ſame. But yet theſe words of Commendation give to him no ſtate of Superiority, or Juriſdiction upon all others, to have all under his Subjection. As if a School-Maſter ſhould have more ſpecial charge to ſome one of his Scholars for his riper towardneſs : yet this giveth him no fulneſs of Authority, or Power coactive upon the reſt, unleſs by ſpecial admiſſion he be deputed thereunto. Whereof, nothing can be gathered of Peter ; for if it be true that S. Auguſtine ſaith, that ſuch things as were ſpoken to Peter,have no lightſome underſtanding, except they be referred to the Church, whereof Peter did bear a figure : then hath the perſon of Peter nothing to Claim by theſe words, but all redoundeth to the Church, which being meant by Peter, hath power by this reaſon, both over the perſon of Peter, and other perſons in the Lord.

Dextræ ſocietatis.

Auguſt.hereſ. 53ad. 109.

Anſwer to an invincible argument proving by Chryſoſtome the whole Church to be committed to S*t.* Peter.

But here ſtumbleth in an argument of our Adverſary again, which he in the margent of his Book calleth an invincible argument drawn out of the bowels of S. John Chryſoſtome, lib. 2. De Sacerd. Whereby he ſuppoſeth to have given a ſhrewd blow to Proteſtants, and to have gotten Hectors victory upon a certain Engliſh Priſoner taken in plain field, and of all ſuch as take his part. The Text only of Chryſoſtome he reciteth, but maketh no argument, albeit he maketh mention of an invincible argument in the margent. But becauſe he either will not,or liſt not to ſhew his cunning therein, I will form that an argument for him which he would have done,but did not : and ſo will form

Chryſoſt. lib. 2. de ſacerd. it (the Lord willing) as he himſelf muſt of neceſſity be driven to do, if the matter ever come to the trial of act, and not to the trifling of words. Firſt, he taketh his Text out of Chryſoſtome,as followeth.For what cauſe,I pray you, did Chriſt ſhed his blood ? Truly to redeem thoſe ſheep, whoſe Charge he committeth to Peter, and to Peters Succeſſors. Upon this place of Chryſoſtome, this Clerk taketh his medium,: Chriſts ſuffering. His concluſion is, That all which Chriſt died for,were committed to Peter : wherefore the form of the argument muſt needs ſtand thus in the third figure :

A Popiſh perſition paralogiſme.

Chriſt ſuffered for all men :

Chriſt ſuffered for them whom he committed to Peter.

Ergo, All that Chriſt died for, were committed to Peter.

If this be the form of his inſoluble argument, as it ſeemeth to be, by the order of his reaſoning,and alſo muſt needs be, taking that medium, and making that concluſion as he doth, (for elſe in the firſt figue, and firſt mood,the Text of Chryſoſtome will not ſerve him) then muſt the form and violence of this inexpugnable argument be denied, for that it breaketh the rules of Logick, making his concluſion univerſal, which in that figure muſt needs be particular, either affirmative or negative. And ſo this argument invincible, falleth into one of theſe two ſtraits ; either concluding thus, the form will not ſerve him,or concluding in another figure,the words of Chryſoſtome will not anſwer to his purpoſe. to prove that all the world was committed to Peter. Which Propoſition as it is ſtrange in Scripture : ſo neither is it the Propoſition of Chryſoſtome. And though it were, yet both without inconvenience might be granted of us, and being granted, ſerveth his purpoſe nothing, ſo long as the Propoſition is not exceptive, excluding other Apoſtles. For the words of Chryſoſtome do not ſo found, that the whole world was committed to Peter only, and to none other. Likewiſe then as it may be well affirmed of us, that the world was committed to Peter : ſo can it not be denied of them that the world was alſo committed to Iohn, James, Bartholomew, Paul, Barnabe, and other all and ſingular Apoſtles. For he that ſaid to Peter, Feed my ſheep, ſaid alſo to all and ſingular his Apoſtles, Go into all the world and Preach,&c. Matth. ult. Moreover,for as much as this man collecteth out of Chryſoſtome, that the whole world was committed to Peter , how ſhall we then joyn this meaning of Chryſoſtome with Saint Paul, which ſaith that the Goſpel was committed to Peter over the Circumciſion, as was Paul over the Uncircumciſion ? And here an anſwer to his doughty argument, both to the form, and to the matter thereof: albeit concerning the matter, here lacketh much to be ſaid more of Peters Succeſſors in the Text of Chryſoſtome. By the which Succeſſors is not meant the Biſhop of Rome only (as the Papiſts would bear us in hand) but all ſuch true and faithful Paſtors,whom the Lords calling feudeth, and ſetteth over his Flock,whereſoever, or whatſoever they be. For as Peter beareth a Repreſentation of the Church, by the teſtimony of Auguſt. in Ioan. tract. 124. Preſat. in Pſal. 108. ſo the Succeſſors of Peter be all faithful Paſtors and Overſeers of Chriſts Church, to whom Chriſt our Lord hath committed the Charge of his Flock. Wherefore they are not a little deceived, which looking upon the Rock only of the perſon, and not the Rock confeſſion (contrary to the rule of Hilary De trinit. lib. 6.) do tie the Apoſtleſhip or Rock of Peter to one only Biſhop,and the ſucceſſion of Peter to one only See of Rome : whereas this being a ſpiritual office,and not carnal, hath no ſuch carnal Race or Deſcent after any worldly or local underſtanding : but hath a more myſtical meaning,after a ſpiritual ſenſe of ſucceſſion,ſuch as Hierome ſpeaketh of, Epiſt. ad Evagrium. Omnes, inquit. Apoſtolorum ſucceſſores ſunt.&c. that is, All, (ſaith he) ſpeaking of Biſhops ; be Succeſſors of the Apoſtles, &c.

The World was committed as well to other Apoſtles as to Peter.

A place of Chryſoſtome examined by S. Paul.

The ſecond ſort of Peter.

Auguſt. in Ioan. tract. 124.

Hilarius, lib. 6.

Hieron. Epiſt. ad Evagrium.

Of like force and faſhion, and out of the ſame figure, the ſame Author patcheth moreover another argument, proving, that the Biſhop of Rome was tituled the head of Chriſts Church, in the Primitive time of the old Ancelors, before the age of Gregory. His argument proceedeth thus, in the third figue :

Saint Peter was called by the ancient Fathers, head of Chriſts Church ;

An argument of the Papiſts.

Saint Peter was Biſhop of Rome :

Ergo, The Biſhop of Rome was called Head of the Church in the old ancient time.

This argument expoſitory, being clouted up in the third figure, and concluding ſingularly, hath rather a ſhew of an argument, than maketh any neceſſary concluſion, ſtanding upon no mood in the faid figure,if the Author thereof were put to trial. Albeit to leave the form, and to come to the matter of the argument. Firſt, how well will he diſpatch himſelf of the major, and prove us that S. Peter although he were at Rome,and taught at Rome,and ſuffered at Rome: yet that he wasBiſhop and proper Ordinary of that City and ſpecial See of Rome ? As touching the allegation of Abdias, Oroſius, Ado, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome, Optatus, Auguſtine brought forth for his moſt advantage, to prove his major : thus I anſwer concerning Oroſius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome and Auguſtine, that where they ſpeak of S. Peters Chair, or planting the Faith at Rome,ſtraightway this man argueth thereupon,that Peter was Biſhop of Rome. But that doth not clearly follow. For the office of the Apoſtles was to plant the Faith in all places, and in every Region, yet were they not Biſhops in every Region. And as for the Chair, as it is no difference eſſential that maketh a Biſhop (for ſo much as a Doctor may have a Chair,and yet be no Biſhop) ſo cannot he conclude by the Chair of Peter,that S. Peter was Biſhop of Rome. For all this proveth no further,but that Peter was at Rome,and there taught the faith of Chriſt.as Paul did alſo,and peradventure in a Chair likewiſe:yet we ſay not that Paul was therefore Biſhop of Rome: but that he was there as an Apoſtle of Chriſt, whether he taught there ſtanding on his feet, or ſitting in a Chair. In the Scripture commonly the Chair ſignifieth Doctrine or judgment, as ſitting alſo declareth ſuch as teach or judge, whether whether they ſit in the Chair of Moſes, or in the Chair of Peſtilence.Planting likewiſe is a word Apoſtolical,and ſignifieth not only the office of a Biſhop.Wherefore it is no good conſequent.He ſate, he taught,he planted at Rome, his chair and ſeat was at Rome; Ergo, he was Biſhop of Rome. And thus much touching Oroſius,Tertullian,Cyprian,Auguſtine.

As for Abdias, Ado, Optatus, and ſuch others, although we ſhould have much wrong offered,and never ſhould make an end, if we ſhould be preſt with the authority of every one that could or did move pen, in all the whole ſtrit age of the Church, to be our Judges in every Eccleſiaſtical matter : and much more wrong ſhould have,if the Authors either corrupted, or counterfeited, ſhould be laid unto us, ſpeaking not in the ſame ſenſe, or in the ſame tongue, or in the ſame time wherein they wrote ; yet to help and to ſalve the authorities of theſe Authors ſo much as we may, I anſwer to their Allegations with this diſtinction of a Biſhop,which is to be taken either generally,or ſpecially.After the firſt,a Biſhop is he to whomſoever the publick cure and charge of Souls is committed, without any limitation of place. And ſo the name of Biſhop is co-incident with the office of Apoſtle, or any publick Paſtor, Doctor, or Curate of the univerſal flock of Chriſt. And thus may Paul, Peter, or any other of the Apoſtles be called Biſhops. So alſo is Chriſt himſelf by expreſs word called ἐπίσκοπον & and ποιμένα, that is, Biſhop and Paſtor, 1 Pet. 2. And thus may Peter well be named a Biſhop of theſe foreſaid Authors after this manner of taking. But this publick and general Charge univerſally over the whole, without limitation, ceaſed after Chriſt and the Apoſtles. For then were Biſhops by places and Provinces appointed, to have ſpecial Over-ſight of ſome particular Flock or Province, and ſo to be Reſident and Attendant only upon the ſame.

A double taking of the word Biſhop.

Chriſt himſelf a Biſhop

The other diverſity of this name Biſhop, is to be taken after a more ſpecial ſort, which is, when any perſon orderly called, is aſſigned namely and ſpecially to ſome one certain place, City, or Province, whereunto he is only bound to imploy his office and charge, and no where elſe, according to the old Canons of the Apoſtles, and of the Council of Nice. And this Biſhop differing from the other, is called Epiſcopus intitulatus, having his name of his City or Diocels. And thus we deny that Peter the Apoſtle was ever Biſhop elected, initalled, or intituled to the City of Rome : neither doth Optatus, Abdias, Ado, or Hierome affirm the ſame. And if Ado ſay that Peter was Biſhop of Rome five and twenty years, until the laſt year of Nero, that is eaſily refuted both by the Scriptures and Hiſtories : for ſo we underſtand by the Declaration of Saint Paul, Gal.1.2. that fourteen years after his Converſion, Saint Paul had Peter by the hand at Hieruſalem.

Conc. Apoſt. 83. 1o. 86. Con. Nice. 20. 15. Conſtl. Antioch. can. 9. 13. Peters being at Rome.

Anſwer to the argument.

Moreover,the ſaid Paul in the foreſaid Epiſtle witneſſeth that the charge Apoſtolical was committed unto Peter over the circumciſed,and ſo was he intituled. Alſo S. Paul writing to the Romans, in his manifold Salutations to them in Rome, maketh no mention there of S. Peter, which doubtleſs ſhould not have been unremembred,if he had been then in Rome. Again, S. Peter dating his Epiſtle from Babylon, was not then belike at Rome.

Furthermore, Hiſtories do Record, that Peter was at Pontus five years, then at Antioch ſeven years. How could he then be five and twenty years at Rome ? Finally,where our Adverſary alledging out of Ado, ſaith, that Saint Peter was there five and twenty years,until the laſt year of Nero : how can that ſtand,when Saint Paul ſuffering under Nero, was put to death the ſame day twelve month, that is, a whole year after Peter ? &c. But eſpecially how agreeth this with Scripture, that Chriſt ſhould make Peter an Apoſtle univerſal to walk in all the world ? Ite per univerſum orbem. Item, Eritis mihi teſtes uſque ad fines terræ, &c. And our Papiſts would needs make him a fitting Biſhop, and intitle him to Rome. How accord theſe, Apoſtolus and Epiſcopus, Ire and ſedere, Omnes gentes and Roma together ?

And thus have I reſolved the firſt untruth of that Popiſh Demonſtration before rehearſed, wherein they think to prove that as Peter, although he was not called Univerſal Apoſtle,yet was the head of the whole Church: ſo the Pope might, and hath had after him the Charge of the whole Church, although he was not called Univerſal Biſhop in the old time, &c.

Now followeth the ſecond untruth to be touched in the ſame argument,which is,that becauſe Peter was the head of the Church : ſo therefore the Pope muſt alſo be the head of the Church, and was : albeit he was not called Univerſal Biſhop a long time. But this we do deny, yea, the matter denieth it ſelf by their own poſition ; for being granted by them, that the title of Univerſal Biſhop was not received at Rome, but refuſed to the time of Gregory : then muſt it neceſſarily be granted, that the Biſhops of Rome before Saint Gregory,had not the Charge of the whole Church, neither could be admitted by that reaſon to be heads of the Church. For ſo much as there can be no head,but which is Univerſal to the whole Body,neither can any have charge of the whole, but he muſt needs be Univerſal to all and ſingular parts of that,whereof he hath the Charge.As in Sciences, whoſoever hath knowledge and cunning in all the ſeven liberal Sciences, and all the parts thereof pertaining to liberal Knowledge, is ſaid to be an univerſal learned man : ſo in office, to whomſoever the Publick Charge of all Churches doth appertain, how is he not to be called Biſhop Univerſal ? Now it before Saint Gregories time, the name of Univerſal Biſhop was repealed in Rome : how then can the name be refuſed, and the definition of the name be admitted ? Or elſe let our Adverſaries tell us how they define an Univerſal Biſhop, ſeeing this word Biſhop is properly the name of office whereto is annexed Charge. Wherefore, if a Biſhop be he which hath the charge of all Souls in his Dioceſs committed to him, and muſt render account for them all ; then whoſe Charge extendeth to all and ſingular Churches, and muſt render account for every Chriſtian ſoul within the whole world, to him cannot be denied the name of an Univerſal Biſhop, having the office of an Univerſal Biſhop. Or if he be not an univerſal Biſhop, he cannot then have the Charge of the whole, that is, of all and ſingular Churches of Chriſt. For ſuch is the rule of true definition : Cui convenit definitio, convenit & definitum, & contra : Cui admittur definitio, eidem & definitum admittur. Although this word Univerſal, in the Greek Writers ſignifieth that, which we in our vulgar Engliſh Tongue call Catholick ; yet I ſuppoſe our Adverſaries here will not take Univerſal in that ſenſe. For after that meaning, as we do not deny that the Biſhops of Rome may be Univerſal Biſhops, ſo neither can they deny but other Biſhops may alſo be as Univerſal, that is, as Catholick as they. But ſuch as more diſtinctly and School-like diſcuſs this matter, define Univerſal or Catholick by three things ; to wit, by time, place, and perſon. So that whatſoever extendeth it ſelf to all times,all places,and all perſons, that is properly Univerſal or Catholick. And contrariwiſe, whatſoever extendeth it ſelf to all times,all places,and all perſons, to all thoſe three aforeſaid, comprehending all places, times, and perſons, and extendeth it ſelf of his own nature to the ſame, or elſe it is not to be called properly Univerſal or Catholick. And thus three things there be, which moſt commonly we call Catholick or Univerſal : that is the Church, which is called the Catholick Church : Faith,which is called the Catholick Faith : a man whom alſo we call a man Catholick,becauſe thoſe three of their own nature and diſpoſition(no contrary obſtacle letting) extend themſelves ſo to all, that no time, place, nor perſon is excluded. Which three conditions, if they altogether concur in the Charge of the Biſhop of Rome, then is it an Univerſal Charge, and he an Univerſal Biſhop : if not, then is his Charge neither Univerſal, nor he the Head of the Church, nor yet Univerſal Biſhop. For how theſe three can be ſeparated, I cannot ſee, except the Adverſary part do prove it more evidently than they have done.

The ſecond untruth of the argument above mentioned.

What is an univerſal Biſhop.

Regula aſſumitur. Cui conv. &c. definitio, & definitum, Univerſal, denied by three things, time, place, and perſon.

Three things commonly called, Catholick or Univerſal.

To have univerſal charge to be head of the univerſal Church, and to be univerſal Biſhop are all one,inſeparably together.

And thus much to the Objection of our Adverſaries : arguing thus, that as Saint Peter being not called Univerſal Apoſtle, yet was the Head of the Univerſal Church : ſo the Pope,although he was not firſt called Univerſal Biſhop, had, and might have the Charge of the whole Church, and was the univerſal Head of the ſame. The which Objection containing (as is ſaid) a double untruth, our Adverſaries, yet notwithſtanding, do buſie themſelves greatly to fortine by ſundry Teſtimonies,and Allegations, patched out of old and ancient Doctors, but ſpecially out of Theodoretus, Irenæus, Ambroſe and Auguſtine, proving by them, that the See of Rome having the Preeminence and Principality, hath been honoured above all other Churches. Whereupon the ſaid adverſary before minded grounded this conſequent.

Irenæus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine and Theodoretus affirm, that the Church of Rome is the chief of all other Churches.

Ireneus, lib. 3. cap. 3. Amb. de dign. sacerd. lib. 2. cap. 6. Aug. Epist. 162. An argument of the Papists. Answer.

Ergo, the Biſhop and Head of that Church is chief and Head over all Biſhops, and Head over all other Churches.

But this conſequence is to be denied, for that the excellency of the Church or place doth not always argue the excellency of the Miniſter or Biſhop, not yet neceſſarily doth cauſe the ſame. For in matters of the Church, which are ſpiritual, all preeminence ſtandeth upon ſpiritual and inward Gifts (Spiritualia enim ſpiritualibus comparantur,) as Faith, Piety, Learning and godly Knowledge, Zeal and Fervency in the Holy Ghoſt, Unity of Doctrine, &c. which Gifts many times may excel in a Church, where the Miniſter or Biſhop is inferior to Biſhops or Miniſters of other Churches. As the moſt famous School in a Realm, hath not alway the moſt famous School-Maſter, neither doth make him thereby moſt excellent in Learning above all others. So if our Adverſaries do mean by this Preeminence of the Church of Rome, ſuch inward Gifts of Doctrine, Faith, Unity and Peace of Religion; then ſay I, the excellency hereof doth not infer or argue the excellency of the Biſhop. And thus concerning the Principality of the Church of Rome, commended at that time of the Doctors, it may be true, and ſo well expounded one way. And thus do I grant the antecedent of this argument, and deny the conſequent. But here will our Adverſaries peradventure reply again and ſay, that the Principality of the Church of Rome which is commended by the Doctors, is not meant here ſo much by inward Gifts and Indowments belonging to a Chriſtian Church, as by outward Authority and Domination over other Churches. Whereto is to be anſwered: firſt, what neceſſity is there; or where did our Papiſts learn, to bring into the ſpiritual Church of Chriſt, this outward form of civil Regiment and Policy? that as the Roman Emperors in times paſt governed over all the world, ſo the Roman Biſhop muſt have his Monarchy upon the Univerſal Clergy, to make all other Churches to ſtoop under his Subjection. And where then be the words of our Saviour? Vos autem non ſic. If they hold their Affirmative Quod ſic. Where then is Chriſts Negative Non ſic? If they ſay, there muſt needs be diſtinction of degrees in the Church, and in this diſtinction of degrees, Superiority muſt neceſſarily be granted for the outward Diſcipline of the Church, for directing matters, for quieting of Schiſms, for ſetting Orders, for commencing of Convocations and Councils, as need ſhall require, &c. Againſt this Superiority we ſtand not, and therefore we yield to our Superior Powers, Kings and Princes, our due Obedience, and to our lawful Governors under God of both Regiments, Eccleſiaſtical and Temporal. Alſo in the Eccleſiaſtical State, we take not away the diſtinction of ordinary degrees, ſuch as by the Scripture be appointed, or by the Primitive Church allowed, as Patriarchs, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Miniſters and Deacons, for of theſe four we ſpecially read as chief. In which four degrees, as we grant diverſity of Office, ſo we admit in the ſame alſo, diverſity of Dignity: neither denying that which is due to each degree, neither yet maintaining the ambition of any ſingular Perſon. For as we give to the Miniſter place above the Deacon, to the Biſhop above the Miniſter, to the Archbiſhop above the Biſhop: ſo we ſee no cauſe of inequality, why one Miniſter ſhould be above another Miniſter: one Biſhop in his degree above another Biſhop to deal in his Dioceſs, or one Archbiſhop above another Archbiſhop. And this is to keep an order duly and truely in the Church, according to the true nature and definition of order by the Authority of Auguſt. lib. de Civit. Dei. Where he thus defineth that which we call Order: Ordo eſt parium diſpariumque rerum ſua cuique loca tribuens diſpoſitio. Order (ſaith he) is a diſcretion or diſpoſition given to all things, according as they are matches, or not matches, proportionally to every one his own right and proper place.

Preeminence of a Church eſteemed after a double conſideration.

Objection. Outward preeminence belongeth unto outward Kingdoms, not to the Church of Chriſt.

The firſt anſwer to the Objection.

Non ſic. Faith Chriſts Non ſic Superiority in the Church. Diſtinction of degrees in the Church. Diverſity of Diſgnities in degrees. Order kept in the Church, and what true order is.

Aug. lib. de Civ. Dei. cap. 19. Order defined.

This definition of S. Auguſtine, ſtanding with the things before premiſed; now here joyneth the queſtion between us and the Papiſts, whether the Metropolitan Church of Rome, with the Archbiſhop of the ſame, ought to be preferred before other Metropolitan Churches and Archbiſhops, through univerſal Chriſtendom, or not? To the anſwer whereof, if the voice of Order might here be heard, it would ſay, Give to things that be matches and like, like honour; to things unlike, unlike honour, &c. Wherefore, ſeeing the See of Rome is a Patriarchal See appointed by the Primitive Church, and the Biſhop thereof and Archbiſhop limited within his own bordering Churches, which the Council of Nice calleth Suburbicas Eccleſias, as other Archbiſhops be: he ought therefore orderly to have the honour of an Archbiſhop (ordering himſelf thereafter) and ſuch outward Preeminence as to other Archbiſhops is due. More if he do require, he breaketh the rule of right Order, he falleth into preſumption, and doth wrong unto his Fellows: and they alſo do wrong unto themſelves whoſoever they be, which feeding his humor of ambition, give more unto him than the foreſaid rule of Order doth require. For ſo much as they yield to him more than is his right, ſo much they take from themſelves, which is due to them. And the ſame is the cauſe, why both Gregory and Pelagius his Predeceſſor reprehendeth them, which gave to the Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople, that which now the Biſhop of Rome claimeth to himſelf, charging them with the breach of Order in theſe words, Ne dum privatim aliquod daretur uni, honore debito Sacerdotes privaverintur univerſi; that is, Leſt that while any ſingular thing is given to one perſon, all other Prieſts be deprived of their due honour. And for the like cauſe, Pelagius exhorteth that no Prieſt do give to any one Archbiſhop, the name of Univerſal Biſhop, Ne ſibi debitum ſubtrahat, cum alteri honorem offert debitum; that is, Leſt (ſaith he) in ſo doing, he take from himſelf his due honour, while he yieldeth that which is not due to another. And alſo in the ſame Epiſtle, Quia ſi ſummus Patriarcha univerſalis dicitur, Patriarcharum nomen cæteris derogatur. For (ſaith he) if he be called the chief univerſal Patriarch, then is the name of Patriarch derogated from others, &c. Wherefore as is ſaid, ſeeing the Biſhop of Rome is an Archbiſhop, as others be, Order giveth that he ſhould have the Dignity which to Archbiſhops is due; whatſoever is added more, is derogation to the reſt. And thus much concerning diſtinction of degrees, and order in giving to every degree his place and honour.

Ex epiſtola Gregorii, lib. 4. Epiſt. 32.

Ex Epiſt. 2. Pelagii 2. Epiſt. 1. cap. Nullus.

The ſecond reaſon and anſwer to the Objection before moved, is this, That being granted to the Papiſts, that the Doctors aforeſaid, ſpeaking of the Principality of the Church of Rome do mean not only of the inward Vertues of that Church, but alſo of the outward Authority and Juriſdiction of the ſame, above other Churches; yet the cauſe wherefore they did attribute ſo much to that Church, is to be expended, which was this, as before was alleged out of the Council of Chalcedon, Can. 28. διὰ τὸ βασιλεύουσι τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, that is, For the Rule and Empery which that City of Rome had then above other Cities; which cauſe being outward and carnal, was neither then cauſe ſufficient, and now ceaſing, importeth not to us the like effect, according as they ſay, Sublata cauſa tollitur effectus. So that by the reaſon thereof, the aforeſaid Primacy of the Church of Rome, did not hold them Jure divino ſed humano. And as it holdeth by mans law, ſo by mans law may be repealed again.

The ſecond anſwer to the obiection before moved.

Ex Concil. Chalced. cap. 28.

Wherefore, be it admitted that both the Pope fitteth and ſucceedeth in the Chair of Peter, and alſo that he is the Biſhop of the greateſt City in the world: yet it followeth not thereby that he ſhould have rule and Lordſhip over all other Biſhops and Churches of the world. For firſt touching the ſucceſſion of Peter, many things are to be conſidered:

A falſe conſequent of the Papiſts.

Firſt, Whether Peter ſate, and had his Chair in Rome, or not?

Certain demands for the Papiſts to anſwer unto.

Secondly, Whether he ſate there as an Apoſtle, or as a Biſhop?

Thirdly, Whether the ſitting in the outward Seat of Peter maketh Succeſſors of Peter?

Fourthly, Whether he ſitteth in the Chair and Seat of Peter, which ſitteth not in the Doctrine of Peter?

Fifthly, Whether the Succeſſion of Peter maketh rather an Apoſtle than a Biſhop, and ſo ſhould we call the Pope the Apoſtle of Rome, and not the Biſhop of Rome?

Sixthly, Whether Eccleſiaſtical Functions ought to be eſteemed by ordinary ſucceſſion of place, or by Gods ſecret calling and ſending?

Seventhly and laſtly, Whether it ſtand by Scripture, any ſucceſſion at all to be pointed in Chriſts Church, or why more from Peter than from other Apoſtles?

All

All which Interrogatories being well diſcuſſed (which would aſk a long Proceſs) it ſhould well appear what little hold the Pope hath to take this ſtate upon him, above all other Churches, as he doth. In the mean time, this one argument by the way may ſuffice, in ſtead of many, for our Adverſaries to anſwer to at their convenient leiſure. Which argument thus I form and frame in Camestres.

An argument proving the Popes of this latter Church of Rome not to be Succeſſors of Peter.

Camestres. All the true Succeſſors of Peter ſit in the Chair of the Doctrine of Peter; and other Apoſtles uniformly:

No Popes of this latter Church of Rome ſit in the Chair of S. Peters and other Apoſtles Doctrine uniformly:

Ergo, No Popes of this latter Church of Rome be the true Succeſſors of Peter.

And when they have well peruſed the minor of this argument, and have well conferred together the Doctrine taught them of S. Peter, with the Doctrine taught now by the Popes, of juſtification of a Chriſtian-man, of the office of the law, of the ſtrength and largeneſs of ſin, of mens Merits, of Free-will, of Works of ſupererogation, of ſetting up Images, of ſeven Sacraments, of auricular Confeſſion, of Satisfaction, of ſacrifice of the Maſs, of Communicating under one kind, of elevating and adoring the ſacramental Elements, of Latin Service, of Invocation, of prohibition of Meats and Marriage, of vowing Chaſtity of Sects and rules of divers Religions, of Indulgences and Pardons: alſo with their Doctrine taught now of Magiſtrates, of the fulneſs of Power and Regality of the See of Rome, with many other like to theſe, &c. then will I be glad to hear what they ſhall ſay to the Premiſes.

Secondly, If they would prove by the Allegation of the Doctors, Irenæus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, Theodoretus aforeſaid, the Biſhop of Rome to be the Chief of all Biſhops therefore, becauſe the City whereof he is Biſhop, is the chief and principal above all other Churches, that conſequent is to be denied. For it followeth not (taking as I ſay, the Principality of that Church to ſtand διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν, that is, upon the principal Dominion of that City) no more than this conſequent followeth.

London is the chief City in all England:

Ergo, the Biſhop of London is the chiefeſt of all Biſhops in this Realm.

Which argument were derogatory to the Archbiſhops both of Conterbury and York.

Yea, to grant yet more to our Adverſaries (which is all they can require) the mind of the aforeſaid Doctors, as Irenæus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, and Theodoretus, in giving Principality unto Rome, to have reſpect unto the vertue of ſucceſſion from Peter, and not unto the greatneſs of the City: yet notwithſtanding for all this their argument holdeth not, if it be rightly conſidered; to ſay, Anſwer to the conſequent.

The Apoſtolical See of Rome, having ſucceſſion from Peter, with the Biſhops thereof, was chief then of all other Churches in the Primitive time of theſe Doctors.

Succeſſion Apoſtolical doubtfully to be conſidered.

Ergo, The Apoſtolical See of Rome, with the Biſhops thereof, having ſucceſſion from Peter, ought now to be chief of all other Churches in theſe our days.

This conſequent might well follow, if the times were like, or if ſucceſſion which gave them the cauſe of Principality, were the ſame now, which was then. But now the time and ſucceſſion is not correſpondent, for then ſucceſſion in the time of theſe Doctors, was as well in Doctrine Apoſtolical, as in place Apoſtolical. Now, the ſucceſſion of Doctrine Apoſtolical hath long ceaſed in the See Apoſtolical: and nothing remaineth but only place, which is the leaſt matter of true Spiritual and Apoſtolical ſucceſſion. And thus much to the authority and teſtimony of theſe forenamed Doctors.

Beſides theſe Objections heretofore recited out of Irenæus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, and Theodoretus; our Adverſaries yet object and heap up againſt us moreover Examples of the Primitive time of the Church, Teſtimonies of general Councils, and Opinions of ancient Writers taken out of the Book of Councils, and Epiſtles decretal, whereby their intent is to prove the foreſaid terms (of the Head of the Church, Ruler of the Church, Chief of all other Priests) to be applied not only to Peter, but alſo to the Biſhop of Rome within the compaſs of the Primitive time. And here cometh in the Teſtimony cited of Vincentius Lirinenſis. Of the Epiſtle of Paſchaſius and his Fellows, writing to Leo from the Council of Chalcedon. The teſtimony alſo of Juſtinian the Emperor in his Codex; where Joannes then Pope, was called Caput omnium Eccleſiarum, Epiſt. inter claras, cap. De ſumma trinit. & fide cath. The teſtimony alſo of Athanaſius, with his Fellow Biſhops of Egypt, of Thebaida and Lybia, in their Epiſtles to Pope Marcus, Liberius; and Felix. Likewiſe the teſtimony of Jerome, In Preſ. in 4. Evang. Item Ep. 42. tom. 1. Item Ep. 41. tom. 2. Of S. Ambroſe, 1. tom. 3. Of S. Auguſtine to Boniface. Ad Bonif. contra duas Epiſt. Palag. l. 1. c. 1. Item l. 2. de bapt. c. 1. Of Theodoretus in his Epiſtle to Pope Leo; Epiſt. commentar. in Pauli Ep. præfixa. Of Chryſoſtome, Epiſt. ad Innocentium, tom. 5. &c. By which Teſtimonies our Adverſaries would prove Saint Peter, and after him the Biſhop of Rome to be called and taken for Head of the Church, Chief Biſhop, Prince and Ruler of the whole Clergy. To all which Objections fully and exactly to anſwer in order, would require a whole Volume by it ſelf. In the mean time, leaving the reſt unto them, unto whom it doth more properly appertain, briefly with this own ſhort diſtinction I anſwer theſe and all ſuch other like places, where S. Peter with his Succeſſors are called Head of the Church, Chief of Biſhops, Prince of the Apoſtles, &c. In which places, this word Head, Chief, and Prince of the Apoſtles, may be taken two manner of ways: to note either Dominion or elſe Commendation. For ſo we read ſometime Caput and Principes, to be words not of authority, but of excellency, whereby is declared the chiefeſt and worthieſt part among many parts, and not Poſſeſſor and Governor of the whole. Like as in the perſon of man, the Head is the Principal part of the whole Body, being indued with reaſon, and furniſhed with moſt excellent ſenſes, by the which the whole body of man is directed: ſo thereof is derived by a Metaphor, to what man or thing ſoever nature or condition hath given the greateſt excellency of Gifts and Properties above other parts or members, the ſame ſociety to be called of the ſaid Parties, Caput or Princeps, Head or Prince. And yet the ſame Head or Princes ſo called, hath not always Dominion or Juriſdiction of the reſt. So we call in our vulgar Speech, the Head or Chief men of the Pariſh, who for their Riches, Wiſdom, or Place, are moſt ſpecially noted: after like phraſe of Speech we call the head man of the Inqueſt, him that hath firſt Place: and yet neither they nor theſe have any Dominion or Juriſdiction upon the Reſidue. In a School the chiefeſt Schollar in Learning, is not therefore the Maſter or Governor of his Fellows. Neither hath M. Cicero any Title thereby to claim Subjection and Service of all other Orators, becauſe he is named Princeps Eloquentiæ, and goeth before them in that kind of phraſe. The ſame Cicero, lib. 1. offic. calleth Cratippum principem hujus ætatis Philoſophorum: as Homer may be alſo called Poetarum Princeps: and yet neither Philoſophers to Cratippus, nor Poets to Homer owe any thing elſe, but only fame and praiſe.

Teſtimonies alledged for the Primacy of the Pope.

Anſwer by a diſtinction.

Capus & Princeps how a double underſtanding.

How Peter is Princeps Apoſtolorum, Peter Princeps Eloquentiæ, Cicero, Princeps Philoſophiæ, Cratippus.

Petrus Princeps & Corypheus Apoſtolorum.

And what if Saint Peter the bleſſed Apoſtle be called and counted by the old ancient Doctors, as Head and Prince of the Apoſtles, which is as much as Corypheus Apoſtolorum, for his excellent Faith, for his Divine Confeſſion and ſingular Affection to the Lord Jeſus: yet what Intereſt or Charge either hath he to Challenge over the Apoſtles, or the Pope after him over all other Biſhops and the whole Church of Chriſt, although the Pope have the like excellency of Chriſts Faith which Peter had, as would God he had! As concerning theſe Allegations therefore out of the Doctors, two things are to be obſerved: firſt, that neither theſe Names and Titles, though they be given to Peter, do give him any State or Dominion over other Apoſtles: nor yet the ſucceſſion of him doth further any whit this celſitude and regality of the Pope to advance him above his Fellow Archbiſhops, as now he doth.

And if our Adverſaries would needs provoke us to the numbering of Teſtimonies, and dividing the houſe (ſpeaking of the Writers and Councils of the Primitive Age) for theſe aforeſaid Teſtimonies alledged on their ſide: I could on the contrary part recite out of the witneſs of Doctors,

Doctors, out of the examples of Councils, and practices of Emperors, no leſs than ſixty voices, much more repugnant againſt their affection. than there is for the Pope. The tractation whereof for this preſent I do refere, either to them that have more leiſure at this time to diſcourſe them, or elſe omit it to another time, if the good pleaſure of the Lord ſhall be to grant me further leiſure in another Book to treat thereof at large in ſuch order, as (if the Lord ſo grant) ſhall appear ſufficient matter, to prove by the Doctors, general Councils, examples and hiſtories of time, that the Biſhops of Rome, during the firſt five hundred years after Chriſt, although for the greatneſs of the Empire, were ſomewhat more magnified than the other, and therefore were ſought of many, and were flattered of ſome, and they themſelves divers did ſet forth themſelves more than they ſhould: yet by the common conſent of Churches were ſtopped of their purpoſe, ſo that by the conſention of the moſt part, within the compaſs of that age, the Biſhops of Rome had not this Regal ſtate of Title, Juriſdiction and fulneſs of power, which now they uſurp, but were taken as Archbiſhops of equal honour, of equal merit with other Archbiſhops and Rulers of the Church. And if any preferment was given unto them ſomething above the reſt, yet neither was it ſo given of all nor of the moſt part: ſecondly, neither was it ſo given of them for any ſuch neceſſity of Gods Word. Aut jure aliquo divino, as which did ſo bind them thereunto, nor yet ſo much for the reſpect of Peter, and his ſucceſſion: as for certain other cauſes and reſpects, as may be gathered to the number of thirteen.

Thirteen cauſes of advancing of the ſee of Rome.

Of which, the firſt is the greateſt of the City and Monarchy of Rome.

2. The ſecond, is the authority of the Emperor Conſtantine the great, firſt of the Emperors converted to the Faith, and ruling in the ſame City, by whom the univerſal liberty of the Church was firſt promoted: and the cauſes of the Biſhops being then at variance, were committed partly to the Biſhop of Rome, partly to other Biſhops near by, to be decided, as appeareth, Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

3. The third was the Council of Nice, which confirmed the preeminence of that Church to have the overlight of the Churches bordering about it.

4. The fourth cauſe of advancing the Church of Rome, was the unquiet ſtate of the Greek Church, much troubled in thoſe days with Sects, Factions and Diſſentions, whereof we may read, Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 15. Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 8.

5. The fifth, whenas Synods were called by other Metropolitans; then if it chanced the Biſhops of Rome to be abſent, and their ſentence being abſent to be required, by the occaſion thereof they began at length to take their ſentence for a Canon or rule Eccleſiaſtical, and thereby to refuſe other Synods, where their Decree or Sentence was not required.

6. Another cauſe was, that when any common matter was in hand at other places, whatſoever was done, commonly the manner was to write to the Roman Biſhop for his approbation in the ſame for publick unity and conſent to be had in Chriſts Church, as appeareth, Lib. 10. Epiſt. 78. Ambroſ. ad Theophyl.

7. Item, for that the teſtimony ſometimes of the Roman Biſhop was wont in thoſe days alſo to be deſired for admitting Teachers and Biſhops in other Churches, whereof we have example in Socrat. lib. 4. cap. 37.

8. Moreover, this was a great ſetting up of that Church, whenas their ſentence not only was required, but alſo received divers times of other Biſhops. And when Biſhops of other Provinces were at any diſſention among themſelves, they of their own accord appealed to the Biſhop of Rome, deſiring him to cite up both parties, and to have the hearing and deciding of the cauſe, as did Macarius and Heſychius ſend to Julius then Biſhop of Rome, &c.

9. Item, In that certain of the Arians returning from their Arianiſme, offered up and exhibited unto the Biſhops of Rome their libels of Repentance, and were of them received again, as Urſatius and Valens did to Julius, Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 24.

10. The tenth cauſe was alſo, for that Gratianus the Emperor made a Law, that all men ſhould retaine that Religion which Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, and Peter Biſhop of Alexandria did hold, Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 4.

11. And alſo if it hapned the Biſhop of Rome to diſallow the ordering of any Miniſter or Miniſters, the Popes perceiving how diligent and ready they were to ſeek their favour, and to ſend up their meſſengers to Rome for their purgation, took thereby no little manner of exaltation, Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 23.

Beſides theſe aforeſaid, the Biſhops of Rome had alſo another artificial practice, that in ſending out their Letters abroad, as they did ſo many, in all their Epiſtles (if the Epiſtles be theirs, and not forged) ever they were harping of the greatneſs of their name, and of their Apoſtolick See, and of the primacy of Saint Peter, their Predeceſſor and Prince of all the Apoſtles, &c. And this they uſed in every Letter, whenſoever they wrote to any, as appeareth in all their Letters Decretal, namely, in the Letters of Miltiades, Marcellus and Marcus, &c. 131

Again, if any of the Eaſt Church directed any writing to them, wherein any ſignification was contained of never ſo little reverence given unto them (as learned men commonly uſe for modeſties ſake) that was taken by and by, and confirmed for plain ſubjection and due obedience, as declareth the Letter of Damaſus, written to the Biſhops of the Eaſt Church beginning thus: Quod debita reverentia, &c. In Engliſh thus: But that your charity yieldeth due reverence to the Apoſtolical See, you in ſo doing (dear children) do much for your ſelves, &c. Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 9. whereas the Biſhops of the Eaſt Church notwithſtanding, had ſhewed little or no reverence in their Epiſtle to Pope Damaſus before. 132

Thus have ye the firſt and original grounds, by the means whereof, the Archbiſhops of the Romiſh See have atchieved to this their great Kingdom and celſitude over Chriſts Church, firſt beginning the myſtery of their iniquity by that which was modeſtly and voluntarily given them: afterward by uſe and cuſtome claiming it ambitiouſly unto them of duty and ſervice; and laſtly, holding faſt (as we ſee) that which once they had gotten into their poſſeſſion, ſo that now in no caſe they can abide the Birds to call home their feathers again, which they ſo long have uſurped.

And thus much concerning the Life, Juriſdiction and Title of the Roman Biſhops: in all which (as is declared) they, and not we, have fallen from the Church of Rome. To theſe I might alſo joyn the manner of Government, wherein the ſaid Romiſh Biſhops have no leſs altered, both from the rule of Scripture, and from the ſteps of the true Church of Rome, which government as it hath been, and ought to be only ſpiritual, ſo hath the Biſhop of Rome uſed it of late years no otherwiſe than hath an earthly King or Prince governed his Realm and Dominions, with riches, glory, power, terror, outward ſtrength, force, priſon, death, execution, laws, policies, promoting his friends to dignities, revenging his affections, puniſhing and correcting faults againſt his perſon more than other offences againſt God committed, uſing and abuſing in all theſe things the Word of God for his pretext and cloke to work his worldly purpoſe withal: whereas indeed, the Word of God miniſtreth no ſuch power to ſpiritual perſons, but ſuch as is ſpiritual: according to the ſaying of the Apoſtle; Arma militiæ noſtræ non ſunt carnalia, ſed ſpiritualia, &c. The Armour and Artillery ſaith Saint Paul, of our warfare, is not carnal, but ſpiritual: ſuch as ſerve not againſt fleſh and blood, nor againſt the weak perſon of man; but againſt Satan, againſt the gates of Hell, and the profundities of the wicked power, &c.

This later Church of Rome differeth from the firſt church of Rome in form of government

Which Armour, as it is all ſpiritual, ſo ought they, which have the dealing thereof, to be likewiſe ſpiritual, well furniſhed with all ſuch gifts and graces of the Holy Ghoſt, meet for the governance of his ſpiritual Church: as with wiſdom and knowledge in the Scripture to inſtruct the ignorant: with inward intelligence and foreſight of the crafty cogitations and operations of Satan, with power of the Spirit to reſiſt the ſame: (with practice and experience of temptations, to comfort ſuch as be afflicted and oppreſſed of Satan: with heavenly diſcretion to diſcern ſpirits, and truth from untruth: with judgment and knowledge of tongues and learning to convict error: with zeal of Gods glory, with fervency of prayer, with patience in perſecution: with a mind contented with all caſes and ſtates incident, with teares and compaſſion on other mens griefs: with ſtoutneſs and courage againſt proud and ſtout oppreſſors: with humility toward the poor and miſerable: with the counſel of the Lord Jeſus by his Word and Spirit to direct direct him in all things to be done: with ſtrength againſt ſin: with hatred of this world: with gift of faith: power of the keyes in ſpiritual cauſes: as to miniſter the Word, the Sacraments and Excommunication when the Word biddeth, that the ſpirit may be ſaved, and to reconcile again as cauſe requireth, &c. Theſe and ſuch like are the matters wherein conſiſteth the ſinews and ſtrength of the Church, and for true governance of the ſame. But contrary to theſe aforeſaid both the Biſhop and Clergy of this later Church of Rome, proceeding in their adminiſtration and governance, as who under the name and pretence of Chriſt and his Word, have exerciſed of long time nothing elſe but a worldly dominion, ſeeking indeed their own glory, not the glory of Chriſt: riches of the world, not the lucre of ſouls: not feeding of the flock, but filling the purſe: revenging their own wrongs, but neglecting Gods glory: ſtriving againſt man only, and killing him: but not killing the vice, nor confirming the error of man: ſtrong againſt fleſh and blood, but weak againſt the Devil, ſtout againſt the ſimple, but meek againſt the mighty: briefly, doing almoſt all things prepoſterouſly, more like to ſecular Princes, than ſpiritual Paſtors of Chriſts flock, with outward forcement, and fear of puniſhment, with priſoning, famiſhing, hanging, racking, drowning, heading, flaying, murthering, and burning, and warring alſo: on the other ſide, with his riches and treaſures, with his guard and gitardiance, with ſtrength of Men, with Court and Cardinals: with pomp and pride about them, with their triple Crown, with the naked Sword, with their ordinary ſucceſſion: with their laws and executions: their promotions and preferments: their biddings and commandings: threatnings and revengings, &c.

Popiſh prepoſterous government of the Church by the Pope.

A compariſon between the Kingdom of this World, and the Kingdom of the Pope.

In fine, to compare therefore the images of a worldly Kingdom, with this Kingdom of the Pope, there is no difference, ſave only, that this Kingdom of the Pope, under hypocriſie maketh a face of the ſpiritual ſword, which is the Word of God: but in very deed doth all things with the temporal ſword, that is, with outward forcement and coaction: differing nothing from civil and ſecular regiment in all properties and conditions, if it be well conſidered. For as in an earthly Kingdom, firſt there is a Prince or ſome chief Magiſtrate appointed, having dominion over his Nobles and Commons, containing all his Subjects under his ſtatutes and laws; with the which laws notwithſtanding he diſpenſeth at his pleaſure; under whom all other inferiour Magiſtrates have their order and place to them appointed to rule over the Subjects, and yet to be ſubject under him: ſo if the ſtate and form of the Pope be well conſidered, we ſhall ſee it altereth nothing from the ſame, but only in the names of the perſons. In civil government, all ſubjection is referred to one head ruler, whoſe authority ſurmounteth all the reſt, and keepeth the munder obedience: in like manner the government of the Popiſh Church is committed to one man, who as chief ſteward, over-ſeer, and ruler of Chriſts houſhold in his abſence, hath ſupreme power over all Churches to moderate and direct all the affairs thereof. But here ſtandeth the difference, in civil Policy he is called a King or Prince: here he is called a Pope.

Secular Nobility compared with eccleſiaſtical nobility.

The King hath next unto him his Dukes and Earls: the Popes Nobility ſtandeth in his Cardinals and Legats; who though they be no Dukes in name, yet in pomp and pride, will not only give check to them, but alſo mate to Kings themſelves, if they might be ſuffered, as did Theodorus, Lanfrancus, Anſelmus, Thomas Becket, and ſo would Thomas Woolſey have done, had not the King given him a neck to his mate betime. In Civil Policy next to Dukes and Earls followeth the order of Lords, Barons, Knights, Eſquires, Gentlemen, with Majors, Sheriffs, Conſtables, Bailiffs, Wardens, &c. The like race is to be ſeen alſo, although under other names, in the Popes policy: of Primats, Biſhops, Suffragans, Provoſts, Deans, Canons, Vicars, Archdeacons, Prieſts, Deacons, Subdeacons, Acolyths, Exorciſts, Lectors, Dore-keepers, Singſters, with other Clerks. And is in the other, Under Wardens cometh the order of Scavengers: ſo neither doth the Popes Monarchy lack his Chanelrakers, to whom may well be compared that rablement of Abbats, Provincials, Priors, Monks, Friers, with their Covents, and Nunneries.

Civil magiſtrates compared with eccleſiaſtical.

Moreover, from Juſtices, Judges, Lawyers, Sergeants, Attorneys, which be neceſſary Officers in the Commonwealth, what differ the Popes Inquiſitors, Canonits, Doctors, and Batchelors of the Popes Law, Commiſſaries Officials, Proctors, Promoters, with ſuch others, which ſerve no leſs in ſpiritual Court, and in the Conſiſtory, than the other aforeſaid do in temporal Court, or in Guildhal? Now who ſo lift to compare the glory and magnificence of the one, with the glory of the other; alſo the power and ſtrength of the one regiment, with the power of the other; and ſo the riches of the one, with the riches of the other; I ſuppoſe he ſhall fee no great odds between them both, ſeeing the Popes Kingdom, as it hath ſtood in his full ruff, and yet doth ſtand where Churches are not reformed. As for ſubtilty and politick practice, there is no man that is indifferent that doubteth, or that hath his eyes that ſeeth not, that the Popes Hierarchy in holding up their ſtate, fir excelleth all the Kingdoms of worldly Princes, of whom all other may take example to learn.

Riches compared.

Subtilty compared.

Thus in comparing the Popes regiment with civil governance, as they do little or nothing diſagree: ſo in comparing again the ſame with the order of Scriptures, or with the regiment that was in the old ancient Church of Rome, we ſhall fee no reſemblance between them. As we read in the Apoſtles time, all the Armour of Chriſts Miniſters was ſpiritual and full of godly power againſt the ſpiritual enemies of our ſalvation, governing the Church then with peace, patience, humility, true knowledge of God, the ſword of the ſpirit, the ſhield of faith, the breſtplate of righteouſneſs, hearty charity, ſincere faith, and a good conſcience: ſo after the Apoſtles in the time of Ambroſe by his own teſtimony it is to be underſtood, that the armour of Churchmen was then, Preces & lachrymæ, prayers and teares: where now the armor of the Popes Prieſthood is nothing elſe but Ignis & ferrum, fire and ſword, wherewith they keep all things under their ſubjection. And here cometh the enorm and horrible abuſe of excommunication, ſuſpenſion and interdiction in cafes frivolous, or wodily: and for ſuch things as for which the Civil Magiſtrate will not commit any Citizens to the ſtocks, the Popes cenſure will not ſtick to commit a Chriſtian to the Devil: not to ſpeak of their other uſurped dealings and doings in matters, that belong to the civil ſword, and be to them impertinent. As in puniſhing whoredom and adultery, in adminiſtration and probats of teſtaments, in hearing civil office, as Popes to be Senators of Rome, and Emperor alſo Sede vacante, Cardinals to be Captains in War, and Rulers of Regions: Biſhops to be Preſidents or Chancellors. Prieſts to be Stewards in great mens houſes, or Maſters of Mints, or Clerks of the Market, or Gardiners to Gentlemen, &c. All which here I overpaſs, referring them to the deeper conſideration of ſuch as have more leiſure to mark the order of their doings, and ſo to judge of the ſame with indifferency, according to the rule of truth taught in Gods Word, and publick examples of the ancient Church of Chriſt in the primitive time.

The difference between the ancient and primitive Church.

Horrible abuſe of excommunication in the Popes Church.

The Popes governing in matters to them not pertaining.

Thus having diſcourſed ſufficiently ſo much as concerneth the manner of life, title, juriſdiction and government of the Popes See (in all which points it is to be ſeen how this later Church of Rome hath receded from the true ancient Church of Rome) it now remaineth according to my promiſe, and order prefixed, conſequently to proceed to the fourth and laſt point, which is of Doctrine: wherein conſiſteth the chiefeſt matter that maketh with us and againſt them, in ſuch ſort as (their Doctrine ſtanding as it doth) neither are they to be reputed for true Catholicks, being altered ſo far from them: nor we other than Hereticks, if we ſhould now joyn with theſe. For the more trial whereof, let us examine the Doctrine and Rites of the ſaid Church of Rome now uſed, and compare the ſame with the teachings of the ancient Catholicks, to the intent that ſuch ſimple ſouls as have been hitherto, and yet are ſeduced by the falſe viſard and image of this pretenſed and baſtardly Church, perceiving what lieth within it, may be warned betime, either to eſchew the peril, if they lift to be inſtructed; or if not, to blame none but themſelves for their own wilful deſtruction. And albeit I could here charge the new fangled Church of the Pope with ſeven or eight baneful crimes, as blaſphemy, idolatry, hereſie, ſuperſtition, abſurdity, vanity, cruelty and contrariety (in which it neither agreeth with the old learning of their fore-elders, nor yet with themſelves in ſundry points) yet after a more temperate fort to paſs this matter with them,

The corrupt doctrine of the Popes Church examined and detected.

The falſe image of the Popes Church.

No comfort in our salvation in the Popes doctrine now taught.

them these two things I will and dare boldly affirm, that in this Doctrine of the Pope now taught in the Church of Rome, is neither any consolation of Conscience, nor salvation of mans soul. For seeing there is no life nor souls health but only in Christ, nor any promise of salvation or comfort made, but only by faith in the son of God: what assurance can there be of perfect peace, life or salvation, where that which only maketh all, is left made of, and other things which make least are most esteemed? For to say the simple truth, what else is the whole course and body of the Popes law now set forth, but a doctrine of laws, a heap of ceremonies, a teaching of traditions, a meditation of merits, a foundation of new religions? all which confer not one jot to the justification of our souls before the terrible judgment of God.

The scope and summe of the Popes doctrine whither it tendeth.

And therefore as it may be truly faid that this doctrine of the Pope is void of all true comfort and salvation: so likewise it seemeth that these, which addict themselves so devoutly to the Popes learning, were never earnestly afflicted in conscience, never humbled in spirit, nor broken in heart, never entred into any serious feeling of Gods judgment, nor ever felt the strength of the law and of death. For if they had, they should soon have seen their own weakness, and been driven to Christ: then should they have seen what a horrible thing it is to appear before God the Father, or once to think on him (as Luther saith) without Christ. And on the contrary side, then should they know what a glory, what a Kingdom, what liberty and life it were to be in Christ Jesus by faith, holding their inheritance, not with the bondson of Agar, but with the free son of Sara: by promise, and not by the law; by grace, and not by works; by gift, and not by deserving: that God only might be praised, and not man.

Papists never lightly afflicted in conscience deeply.

An horrible thing to think of God without Christ. Luther.

The right faith of the old Romans. Cornelius a Rome, first baptised of all the Gentiles.

And thus were the old Romans first taught by St. Paul writing to the Romans. The same did Cornelius the Roman, and first that was baptised of all the Gentiles, learn of St. Peter when he received the Holy Ghost, not by the deeds of the law, but only by hearing the faith of Jesus preached. And in the same Doctrine the said Church of the Romans many years continued, so long as they were in affliction. And in the same Doctrine the Bishop of Rome with his Romans now also should still remain, if they were such ancient Catholicks as they pretend, and would follow the old mother Church of Rome, and hold the first liquor wherewith they were first seasoned. But the sweet verdor and force of that liquor and pleasant Must is now clean put out through other unsavoury infusions of the Popes thrusting in; so that almost no taste nor piece remaineth of all that primitive Doctrine, which St. Paul and other Apostles first planted among the Gentiles. And what marvel if the Romans now in so long tract of time have lost their first sap, seeing the Church of the Galatians then in the very time of St. Paul their Schoolmaster, he being amongst them, had not so soon turned his back a little, but they were all turned almost from the Doctrine of faith, and had much ado to be reconvered again.

The Church of Rome hath lost the liquor wherewith it was first seasoned.

The Galatians almost gone from Faith in St. Pauls time.

Of this defection and falling from faith, St. Paul expreffly foretelleth us in his letters both to the Thessalonians, and also to Timothy, where he sheweth, that a defection shall come, and that certain shall depart from the faith, attending to spirits of error, &c. 1 *Tim.*4. and to know what errors these shall be, the circumstance plainly leadeth us to understand in the same place, where the said Apostle speaketh of marked consciences, forbidding men to marry, and to eat meats ordained of God to be taken with thanksgiving, for mans sustenance; most evidently, as with his finger, pointing out unto us the Church of Rome, which not in these points only, but also in all other conditions almost is utterly revolted from the pure original sincerity of that doctrine, which St. Paul planted in the Church of the Romans, and of all other Gentiles.

1 Tim.4.

The summe of St. Paul's Doctrine delivered to the Gentiles.

A brief sum of St. Pauls doctrine delivered to the Gentiles

1. First, the doctrine of St. Paul ascribeth all our justification freely and meerly to faith only in Christ, as to the only means and cause immediate, whereby the merits of Christs Passion be applied unto us, without any other respect of work or works of the law whatsoever: and in this Doctrine, the Church of the Romans was first planted.

2. Secondly, the same Doctrine of St. Paul cutting off, and excluding all glory of mans deserving, flayeth only upon Gods promise and upon grace, not mans merits: upon mercy, not mans labouring or running: upon election and calling, not mans willing, &c.

Salvation by mercy only, and not by merits.

3. Thirdly, the same Doctrine calling down the strength of man and his Integra naturalia (as the Schools do term them) concludeth all fleth under sin, and maketh the same destitute of the glory of God.

All flesh concluded under sin.

4. Item, it maketh manifest difference between the Law and the Gospel, declaring the use and end of them to be divers: the one to kill, the other to quicken; the one to condemn, the other to justifie; the one to have an end and a time, the other to be perpetual, &c.

Difference between the Law and the Gospel.

5. Item, the same Doctrine of St. Paul, as it sheweth a difference between the Law and the Gospel; so it maketh no less difference between Justicia Dei, and Justicia propria; that is, the righteousness of God and the righteousness of Man, abhorring the one, that is, mans own righteousness, coming by the law and works; and imbracing the other which God imputeth freely and graciously to us for Christ his Sons sake, in whom we believe.

Justicia Dei & Justicia propria.

6. Item, it wipeth away all traditions, and constitutions of men whatsoever, especially from binding of conscience, calling them beggerly elements of this world.

The rights, outlets & Gods, & the righteousness of man, how they differ by Scripture.

7. Likewise it rejecteth and wipeth away all curious subtilties, and superfluous speculations, and knoweth nothing else but Christ only crucified, which is only the object whereunto our faith looketh.

A true Christian knoweth nothing but Christ crucified.

8. Furthermore as the same Doctrine of Saint Paul defineth all men to be transgressors by disobedience of one Adam, though they never touched the apple, they coming of his flock by nature; so doth it prove all men to be justified by the obedience of one, though they did not his obedience, they being likewise born of him by spiritual regeneration and faith.

All men condemned by one.

All men saved by one.

9. And therefore as all men coming of Adam be condemned originally, before they grow up to commit any sin against the Law: so all men regenerated by faith in Christ, be saved originally before they begin to do any good work of charity, or any other good deed.

10. Item, the Doctrine of St. Paul perpending the high glory of a Christian mans state in Christ Jesus by faith, first setteth him in a perfect peace with Almighty God, *Rom.*5. Secondly, exempteth him from all condemnation, *Rom.*8. Thirdly, it matcheth him with Angels; it equalleth him with Saints and fellow Citizens of Heaven; it numbreth him with the houshold of God; and inheriteth him with Jesus Christ himself, *Ephes.*2. Fourthly, it adopteth him from the state of a servant, to the state of the Son of God, crying Abba Father, *Gal.*4. Fifthly, it openeth to him a bold access and entrance to the high majesty and throne of grace, *Ephes.*2. *Heb.*4. Sixthly, it subjecteth all things under him, as ministers, yea the Apostles themselves in their highest office, death, life, things present, things to come, with the whole World besides, and all ingineth him no spiritual head, but only Christ, saying, And you are Christs, and Christ is Gods, 1 *Cor.*3. Seventhly, it advanceth and setteth him in a spiritual liberty or freedom, above all terrours of spirit, rising either of Gods Law, or Mans Law, above all dreadful fears of sin, damnation, malediction, rejection, death, hell, or purgatory: above all servile bondage of ceremonies, mens precepts, traditions, superstitious vices, yokes, customs, or what else soever oppresseth and entangleth the spiritual freedom of a Conscience, which Christ hath set at liberty; and requireth moreover that we walk and stand stout in that liberty whereto we are brought with the free-son of Sara, and not suffer our selves any more to be clogged with any such servile bondage: that is to say, although we must be content to subject our bodies to all service, and to all men, yet must we not yield our spiritual consciences and souls as slaves and servants, to be subject to the fear or bondage of any terrene thing in this world, for so much as we are in that part made Lords and Princes over all things whatsoever can harm, or bind, or terrifie us, *Gal.*4. *Col.*2.

Original sin. Original justice. Rom.5. Rom. 8. Gal. 4. Ephes. 2. Heb. 4. 1 Cor. 3. The glorious state of christian liberty and spiritual freedom in christ Jesus.

11. Item, the right vein of Saint Pauls Doctrine putteth no difference nor obfervation in days and times. *Gal.*4. *Col.*2.

Days and times indifferent.

12. Item,

Meats indifferent with thanksgiving.

12. Item, it leaveth all meats to be indifferent, with thanksgiving, to serve the necessity of the body, and the mercy of the body to serve them, *Colos.*2. 1 *Tim.*4.

Marriage lawful for all men.

13. Item, it permitteth Marriage without restraint or exception, lawful and also expedient for all men, having need thereof, 1 *Cor.*7.

One sacrifice for sin and no more. Heb. 7.

14. Item, it admitteth no sacrifice for sin but the sacrifice of Christ alone, and that done once for all with blood. For without blood there is no remission of sin, which is applied to us by faith only, and by nothing else, *Heb.*9.

The use of the holy Communion in ancient time of the primitive Church.

15. Item, as touching the holy Communion, by the Letters of Saint Paul to the *Corinthi.*11. we understand, that the use then amongst them was, to have the participation of the Bread called the Lords Body, and of the Cup called the Lords Blood, administred not at an Altar, but at a plain Board or Table, the Congregation there meeting together after the time of their Supper, where not the Minister alone did receive, and the other looked on; but the whole Congregation together did communicate with reverence and thanksgiving, nor sitting over the Priests head, nor worshipping, nor kneeling, nor knocking their breasts; but either sitting at the Supper, or standing after the Supper. According to which form the Muscovites yet to this day, following the old Rite of the Country (although being drowned otherwise in much superstition) use to receive it after they be risen from their Dinner, standing. Experience whereof was seen here at London the first day of October, 1569.

No more Sacraments mentioned in St. Paul, but the Lords Supper and Baptism.

16. Item, the said Apostle, besides the Sacramental Supper, maketh mention of Baptism, or washing of regeneration, although he himself baptized but few, 1 *Cor.*1. of the other Sacraments he maketh no mention.

17. Item, by the same Doctrine of St. Paul, no tongue is to be used in the Congregation, which is not known, and doth not edifie, 1 *Cor.*14.

The authority and office of the civil Magistrate.

18. Item, the Rule of Saint Paul's Doctrine subjecteth every creature under the obedience of Kings and Princes, and ordinary Magistrates, ordained of God to have the sword and authority of publick Regiment, to order and dispose in all things, not contrary to God, whatsoever pertaineth to the maintenance of the good, or to the correction of the evil: from whose Jurisdiction there is no exemption of vocations or persons, whether they be Ecclesiastical or Political. And therefore to this office it appertaineth to preserve peace, to set things in lawful order, to conserve Christian Discipline in the Church of Christ, to remove offences, to bridle the disobedient, to provide and procure wholesome and faithful teachers over the people, to maintain learning, and set up Schools, to have oversight not only of the People, but also of all Ecclesiastical Ministers, to see every one to do his duty, and to remove or punish such as be negligent: also to call Councils and Synods, and to provide that the Church Goods be faithfully dispensed by the hands of true dealers, to the sustentation of the Church, of true Teachers, and to the publick necessity of the poor, &c.

The office and authority of the Clergy how far it doth extend.

19. Furthermore, by St. Paul's Doctrine, the Ministers and superintendents of Christs Church have their authority and armour likewise to them limited, which armour is only spiritual and not carnal, whereby they fight not against fleth and blood, but against the power of darkness, error and sin; against the spiritual seduction and craftiness in heavenly things, against the works and proceedings of Satan the Prince of this World, in comforting weak Consciences against the terrors of the Devil and deliperation, and finally against every cogitation lifted up against Christ, to subdue every celitude to the subjection and power of Christ Jesus the Son of God.

Another brief recapitulation of the same.

Another brief recapitulation of St. Pauls doctrine reduced to five points.

BRiefly to reduce the whole Doctrine of St. Paul into a compendious sum, it consisteth chiefly in these five points:

1. First, in setting forth the grace, great love and good will, and free promises of God the Father in Christ Jesus his Son to mankind, which so loved the World, that he hath given his own Son for the redemption thereof. John 3. *Rom.*5. *Ephes.*2.

John 3. Rom.5. Ephes. 2.

2. Which gave his Son to die for us being his enemies, *Rom.*5. Which hath quickned us being dead in sin, *Ephes.*2. Which so mercifully hath reconciled the World to himself by his Son; and also by his Embassadors delireth us to be reconciled unto him, 2 *Cor.*5. Who hath given his own Son to be Sin for us, 2 *Cor.*5. To be accurfed for us. *Gal.*3. Which by firm promise hath assured us of our inheritance, *Rom.*4. Which not by the works of righteousness that we have done, but of his own mercy hath saved us by the washing of Regeneration, *Tit.*3.

The great mercy of God in Christ. Galat. 3. 2 Cor. 5. Rom. 5. Titus 3.

2. The second point consisteth in preaching and expressing the glorious and triumphant majesty of Christ Jesus the Son of God, and the excellency of his glory; who being once dead in the infirmity of fleth, rose again with power, and ascending up with majesty, hath led away captivity captive, *Eph.*4. sitteth and reigneth in glory on the right hand of God in heavenly things above all principates and potestates, powers and dominations, and above every name that is named, not only in this World, but also in the world to come, *Ephes.*1. At whose name every knee is to bend both in heaven and in earth, and under the earth, and every tongue to confess our Lord Christ Jesus to the glory of God the Father, *Phil.*2. In whom and by whom all things are made both in heaven and earth, things visible and invisible, whether they be thrones or dominations, or principates or potestates, all are by him and for him created, and he is before all, and all things consist in him who is the head of his body the Church, the beginning and first born from the dead, in whom dwelleth all fullness, *Col.*1. To whom the Father hath given all judgment, and judgeth no man himself any more, John 5. To whom the Father hath given all things to his hands, John 13. To whom the Father hath given power of all flesh, John 17. To whom all power is given in heaven and earth, Matthaeus. In whom all the promises of God are Ea & Amen, 2 *Cor.*1.

3. Thirdly, he declareth the vertue of his Cross and Passion, and what exceeding benefits proceed to us by the same. By whose blood we have redemption and remission of our sins. Ephes. 1. By whose stripes we are made whole, *Esay.*53. By whose Cross all things are pacified, both in heaven and in earth, *Col.*1. By whose death we are reconciled, *Rom.*5. Who hath destroyed death, and brought life to light, 1 *Tim.*1. Who by death hath destroyed him which had the power of death, that is, the Devil, and hath delivered them which lived under fear of death all their life in bondage, *Heb.*2. By whose obedience we are made just: by whose righteousness we are justified to life, Rom. 5. By whose curse we are blessed, and delivered from the malediction of the Law, *Gal.*3. By whose blood we that once were far of, are made near unto God, *Ephes.*5. Who in one body hath reconciled both Jews and Gentiles unto God, *Ephes.*2. Who by his fleth hath taken away the division and separation between God and us, abolishing the law which was set against us in precepts and decrees, Ephes. 2. Who is our peace, our advocate, and propitiation for the sins of the whole world, 1 John 2. Who was made accursed, and sin for us, that we might be the righteousness of God in him, 2 *Cor.*5. Who is made of God for us, our wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption, 1 *Cor.*1. By whom we have boldness and entrance with all confidence through faith in him, Ephes. 3. Who forgiveth all our sins, and hath torn in pieces the obligation or hand-writing, which was against us in the law of commandments, and hath crucified it upon the Cross, and utterly hath dispatched and abolished the same, and hath spoiled principates and potestates, as in an open shew of conquest, triumphing over them openly in himself, *Col.*2. Who justifieth the wicked by faith, *Rom.*4. In whom we are made full and compleat, *Col.*2. &c.

The third branch. The vertue and effect of Christs death, and what exceeding benefits proceed of. Ephes. 1. Elay 53. Colos. 1. Rom. 5. 1 Tim. 1. Heb. 2. Rom. 5. Gal. 3. Ephes. 2. 2 Cor. 5. 1 Cor. 1. Ephes. 3. Colos. 2. Rom. 4. Colos. 2.

4. The fourth branch is, to teach us and inform us, to whom these benefits of Christs Passion and Victory do appertain, by what means the same is applied and redounded unto us: which means is only one, that is, only faith in Christ Jesus, and no other thing. Which faith it pleaseth Almighty God to accept for righteousness. And this righteousness it is, which only standeth before God, and none other, as we are plainly taught by the Scriptures, and especially by the Doctrine of St. Paul. Which righteousness thus ruling of faith in Christ, St. Paul calleth the righteousness of God, where he speaketh of himself, utterly refusing the other righteousness which is of the law, that he might be found in him, not having his own righteousness which

The fourth branch. Faith only the mean cause of justification and nothing else.

The righteousness of the law. Philip. 3.

which is of the law, but the righteousness of Christ, which is of faith, Phil. 3. Again, the said Apostle writing of the Jews, which sought for righteousness and found it not; and also of the Gentiles, which sought not for it, and yet found it, sheweth the reason why: Because (faith he) the one sought it by works and the Law, and not knowing the righteousness of God, and seeking to set up their own righteousness, did not submit themselves to the righteousness which is of God. The other, which were the Gentiles, and sought not for it, obtained righteousness, that righteousness which is of faith, &c. Rom. 9. Also in another place of the same Epistle, Saint Paul writing of this righteousness which cometh of faith, calleth it the righteousness of God, in these words: Whom God (saith he) hath set up for a propitiation by faith in his blood, whereby to make manifest the righteousness which is of himself in tolerating our sins, &c. Rom. 3. By the which righteousness it is evident that St. Paul meaneth the righteousness of faith, which Almighty God now revealeth and maketh manifest by preaching of the Gospel. With thou see yet more plainly this righteousness of God, how it is taken in St. Paul, for the righteousness of faith, and therefore is called the righteousness of God, because it is imputed only of God to faith, and not deserved of man? In the same Epistle to the Romans and in the third Chapter aforesaid, his words be manifest: The righteousness of God (saith he) is by faith of Jesus Christ, in all, and upon all that do believe, &c.

A lesson out of St. Paul Doctrine of all Christians to be observed.

Wherefore whosoever studieth to be accepted with God, and to be found righteous in his sight, let him learn diligently by the Doctrine of St. Paul to make a difference and a separation, as far as from Heaven to Earth, between these two, that is, between the righteousness of works, and righteousness of faith: and in any wise beware he bring no other means for his Justification, or remission of his sins, but only faith apprehending the body or person of Christ Jesus crucified. For as there is no way into the house but by the door, so is there no coming to God but by Christ alone, which is by faith. And as the mortal body, without bodily sustenance of bread and drink, cannot but perish; so the spiritual soul of man hath no other refreshing but only by faith in the body and blood of Christ, whereby to be saved. With this faith the idolatrous Gentiles apprehended Jesus Christ, and received thereby righteousness. Cornelius (the first baptized Roman) so soon as he heard Peter preach Christ, received straightway the Holy Ghost. Peter himself confessed, and for his confession had the Keys of Heaven, Mat. 16. Zachæus received the person of Christ into his house, and withal received salvation both to him and his whole household, Luke 19. What a sinner was Mary, which had no less in her than seven Devils, and yet because she set her heart and affection upon that person, many sins were forgiven her? Luke 7. The right hand Thief, how far was he from all works of the Law, and yet by Faith entred he justified into Paradise the same day with Christ? Luke 23. In like manner although the poor Publican came to the Church with less holiness after the Law, yet went he home to his house more justified than the Pharisee with all his works, and all by reason of faith, Luke 18. The Parable of the Prodigal Son which was lost, yet revived again; also of the lost groat, and of the lost sheep which went astray and was found again: what do these declare, but that which is lost by the Law to be recovered by faith and grace? And how oft do we read in the Gospels? Thy faith hath saved thee, &c. Jesus seeing their belief, &c. He that believeth in me, I will raise him up in the last day, &c. Believe also in me, &c. He that believeth in me hath everlasting life, &c. Without me ye can do nothing, &c. He that is in me, &c. He that loveth me, &c. He that heareth me, &c. He that abideth in me, &c. He that receiveth me, &c. Unless ye eat my flesh, and drink my blood, &c. That they may receive remission of sins by their faith in me, &c. Acts 26. To him all the Prophets give witness, to have remission of sins, whosoever believeth in his Name, &c. Acts 10. He that believeth and is baptized, Mat. ult. He that believeth not shall do the works that I do, and greater than these, &c.

And likewise in the writings of St. Paul, how often do we hear the name of Christ almost in every third or fourth line, where he still repeateth: In Christo Jesu, per Christum Jesum. per Jesum Christum Dominum nostrum &c. Qui credunt in ipso, &c. Omnes qui credunt in eo, &c. Credentes in illo, in eum, credentes illi, in nomen ejus, in nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi. &c. Believe (saith St. Paul to the Jaylor) in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved and thy whole house, &c. Acts 16.

The Writings of St. Paul full of the name of Christ Jesus.

Belief only in Christ saveth. Acts 16.

Thus then thou seest, as the Passion of Christ is only the efficient or personal cause immediate of our salvation: so is Faith only the instrumental or mean cause that maketh the merits of Christ to us available. For as the passion of Christ serveth to none but such as do believe; so neither doth faith (as it is only a bare quality or action in mans mind) it self justifie, unless it be directed to the body of Christ crucified as to his object, of whom it receiveth all his virtue. And therefore these two must always joyntly concur together, faith, and Christ Jesus crucified. As for example, when the Children of Israel were bid of Moses to look up to the brazen Serpent; neither could the Serpent have helped them, except they had looked up, nor yet their looking upward have profited them, unless they had directed their eyes upon the said Serpent, as the only object set up to the same purpose for them to behold. So our Faith in like cafe directed to the body of Jesus our Savior, is the only means whereby Christs merits are applied unto us, and we now justified before God, according to the Doctrine of St. Paul (who in express words defining to us what this faith is, and how it justifieth) faith: If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe with thy heart that God raised him from death, thou shalt be saved, &c. Rom. 10. Besides this, what action or quality soever is in man, either hope, charity, or any other kind of faith and believing, be it never so true, except it apprehend this object (which is) the body of Christ the Son of God, it serveth not to justification. And that is the cause why we add this particle (only) to faith, and say that only faith in Christ justifieth us, to exclude all other actions, qualities, gifts, or works of man, from the cause of justifying; for so much as there is no other knowledge nor gift given of God to Man, be it never so excellent, that can stand before the judgment of God unto Justification, or whereunto any promise of salvation is annexed; but only this faith looking up to the Brazen Serpent, that is, to the body of Christ Jesus for us crucified.

The personal cause of Salvation. The instrumental cause.

The membar and cause why faith only justifieth.

How faith Christ the only object which justifieth. Example of the brazen Serpent.

What faith is by S. Paul. Rom. 10.

Faith only.

As for Example, when the Turk faith, that he believeth in one living God that made Heaven and Earth, his belief therein is true, yet it justifieth him not, because it lacketh the right object, which is Christ. So when the Jew saith, that he believeth in one God maker of Heaven and Earth, and believeth also the same God to be omnipotent, merciful, just, and true of promise, and that he hath elected the feed of Abraham: true it is that he believeth, and yet all this serveth him not, because Christ the Son of God is not joyned withal. And though the said Jew should be never so devout in his prayers, or charitable in almes, or precise in keeping the Law, and believe never so stedfastly that he is elect to be saved; yet he is never the nearer to salvation for all this, so long as his faith is not grounded upon the head corner stone, which is the person and body of Jesus Christ the true Savior. After like sort it may be said of the Papist, when he faith, that he is baptized, and believeth in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three Persons, and one God, and also confesseth Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, which died for our sins, and rose again for our righteousness, &c. his belief therein is true, and indeed would save him, if he did stay his salvation in this faith, and upon Christ his Savior only, according to the promise and grace of God, and go no further.

Divers sorts of believing The Turks faith. The Jews faith.

Every truth may be believed, but the believing of every truth saveth not. The Papists faith.

Only.

But that he doth not: for neither doth he admit Christ only to be his perfect Savior without the help of the Patrons, Heads, Advocates, and Mediators, nor yet permitteth his faith in Christ only to be the means of his Justification, but setteth up other by-means, as Hope, Charity, Sacrifice of the Mass, Confession, Penance, Satisfaction, Merits and Pardons, supposing thereby to work his Justification before God, contrary to the word of promise, to the Gospel of Grace, and to the Doctrine of Saint Paul, whereof we shall see more (the Lord willing) hereafter.

Hope and charity be no parts of our justification, nor causes to make us merits of Christ ours.

And thus much of the true causes of our Justification after the Doctrine of Saint Paul. Concerning which causes this distinction furthermore by the way is to be added, that as touching the original causes of our salvation, which be divers and sundry, some are external, and without us; some are internal, and within us. Of the external causes which are without us, the first and principal is the mercy and grace of God. Of this followeth Predestination and Election. Then cometh Vocation. The last and next cause to us is the death and bloodshed of Christ, whereby we are redeemed, and all these be external causes, because they are without us. Of internal causes that be in man through the gift of God, there is but one, and no more in Scripture appointed, that is our faith in Christ, which is the gift of God in us. Besides this, there is no gift of God given to man, vertue, work, merit, nor any thing else, that is any part or cause of salvation, but only this gift of faith, to believe in Christ Jesus. And this is the cause why we hold that faith only justifieth, meaning that amongst all the works, deeds, actions, labours and operations, whatsoever man doth or can do, there is nothing in man that worketh salvation, but only his faith given to him of God to believe in Christ his Son, following therein the trade of St. Pauls teaching: who in precise words so ascribeth justification to faith, that he excludeth all other actions of man, and works of the law. And therefore in the same Epistle to the Romans, St. Paul reasoning of the glory of justifying, asketh this question, how this glory is excluded; whether by the law of works? And concludeth no: ascribing only the glory thereof to the law of faith, and consequently upon the same he inferreth: Colligimus enim justificari hominem per fidem sine operibus legis: We hold that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law.

Grace and mercy. Election. Vocation. Christs passion.

Christian faith.

All works of man excluded from the glory of justifying.

And how then can that be accounted for any part of our Justification, which St. Paul utterly debarreth and excludeth in that behalf? Of which like excludives, and negatives the whole course of St. Pauls Doctrine is full, where he still concludeth; Sine operibus, absque operibus legis, non ex operibus, Dei donum est; secundum misericordiam; non ex operibus, ne quis gloietur, Ephes. 2. Non ex operibus justitiæ quæ fecimus nos, sed secundum propria nostra, &c. Tit. 3. Now secundum opera nostra, &c. Tim. 1. That is to say, It is the gift of God, not of works, that no man should glory, &c. Not of the works of righteousness, which we have done, but of his own mercy, &c. Not after our works, but after his own purpose and grace which is given to us, &c. Again, Gal. 2. Non justificatur homo ex operibus, &c. That is, A man is not justified by works, &c. Item, Ei qui non operatur, credenti autem in eum qui justificat impium, fides imputatur ad justitiam, &c. Rom. 4. To him that worketh not, but believeth in him which justifieth the wicked, his faith is imputed for righteousness, &c. By these exclusives and negatives in St. Pauls Doctrine, what doth he else mean, but utterly to exclude all kind of mans merits, and works of the law from the office and dignity of justifying? And although he expresseth not the word, Only: yet upon his exclusives, and negatives, this excepive must needs be inferred. For in all Logick the consequence is necessary and formal, as, One man is suffered to come into the house, and no person else is suffered but one: Ergo one man only is suffered to enter into the house. And thus much concerning faith in Christ proved to be the only mean, or instrumental, or conditional cause of our salvation, and no other besides the same alone, by the doctrine of St. Paul taught to the ancient Romans.

The fifth branch. The true use and end of good works.

5. The fifth branch, which I note in Saint Paul's Doctrine, is this: that after he hath thus established us in certainty of our salvation through faith in Christ, then after that, he exhorteth us vehemently and with all instance to good works, shewing the true use and end to good works: which is, First, to shew our obedience and dutiful service (as we may) unto God, who hath done so great things for us. Secondly, to relieve our neighbours with our charity and kindness, as God hath been kind to us his enemies. Thirdly, to stir up others by our example to praise God, to embrace the same Religion, and to do the like. For requisite it is, that as God hath been so merciful to us and gracious in eternal gifts, we should be merciful likewise to other in temporal commodities. And seeing it hath pleased him of his fatherly goodness (of our parts so little deserved) to call us to so high a vocation, to give the blood of his Son for us, to forgive us all our sins, to deliver us from this present wicked world, to make us Citizens of Heaven, yea his Children, more than Servants: little then can we do, and well may we think those benefits ill bestowed, if we forgive not our neighbours, and shew not something again worthy that holy calling wherewith he hath called us, in mortifying our worldly lusts here, and studying after heavenly things: and finally, if we being provoked with such love and kindness, render not again some love for love, some kindness for kindness, seeking how to walk in the steps which he hath prepared for us to walk in, serving him (so much as we may) in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life. And though our obedience shall always be imperfect, do the best we can: yet reason would that some obedience we should shew, as loving Children to such a loving father.

Good works justifie not but follow the justified.

The office of faith, and the office of the Law compared together.

The works of man be imperfect, and therefore have nothing to do with Justification.

And this is the cause why St. Paul is so vehement and urgent to call upon good works, not that works should justifie, but that we being justified so mercifully and tenderly through his grace, should not abuse his grace in vain, but endeavour our selves to our uttermost to render our service again to him, in such conversation of life as may not make to his glory, and profit of our neighbour. And though the words of our Saviour seem in some places to attribute to our obedience and charity here in earth, great rewards in heaven, that is of his own free grace and goodness so to impute small matters for great deserts, and not for us to claim any meed thereby or thank at his hand, as by any worthiness of our doings: no more than the servant can, who when he cometh from the Plough and serving the Cattel in the field, serveth first his Master at home and waiteth upon his Table: the Master is not bound (saith Christ) to thank his Servant therefore, and bid him sit down: So you (saith he) when you have done that is commanded you, say ye are unprofitable servants; ye have done but what your bound duty was to do, Luke. 17. Luke 17.

Again, here also is to be understood, that where such rewards be ascribed unto mens deeds, it is not for the worthiness of the deed it self, but for the faith of the doer, which faith maketh the work to be good in Gods sight: for else if an Infidel should do the same work that the Christian doth, it were nothing but meer sin before God. In that therefore the Christian mans work is accepted be it never so small (as to give a Cup of cold water) the same is only for his faith sake that doth it, and not for the work which is done. Whereby again we may learn how faith only doth justifie a man, and that three manner of ways.

Faith justifieth three manner of ways.

First, it justifieth the person in making him accepted, and the Child of God by regeneration, before he begin to do any good work.

Secondly, it justifieth a man from sin, in procuring remission and forgiveness of the same.

Thirdly, it justifieth the good deeds and works of man, not only in bringing forth good fruits, but also in making the same works to be good and acceptable in the sight of God, which otherwise were impure and execrable in his sight.

The office therefore of faith and works is divers, and must not be confounded. Faith first goeth before, and regenerateth a man to God, and justifieth him in the sight of God, both in covering his ill deeds, and making his good deeds acceptable to God, climbing up to Heaven, and there wrestling with God and his judgment for righteousness, for salvation, and for everlasting life. Works and Charity follow faith, and are exercised here upon the earth, and glory only before Man, but not before God, in shewing forth obedience both to God and to Man. Further than this our good works do not reach, nor have any thing to do in the judgment of God touching salvation. I speak of our good works (as St. Paul speaketh, Rom. 7.) as they be ours and imperfect. For else if our works could be perfect according to the perfection of the law, as Christ wrought them in the perfection of his flesh; that is, if we could perfect them then as it is said: Qui fecerit ea, vivet in eis. But now seeing the imbecility of our flesh cannot attain thereto, it followeth thereof that all glory of justifying is taken from works, and transferred only to faith.

And thus much concerning the principal contents of St. Paul's Doctrine: wherein the Church of the ancient Romans was first grounded and planted, and so continued in the same, or at least did not much alter, during the primitive state of the Church. Likewise the same form of Doctrine the later Romans also that followed should have maintained, and not have fallen away for any mans preaching, but but hold him accurſed, yea if he were an Apoſtle or Angel from Heaven, teaching any other Doctrine beſides that inſtitution which they have received, *Gal.*1. for ſo were they warned before by the Apoſtle St.Paul to do. And yet notwithſtanding all this forewarning and diligent inſtruction of this bleſſed Apoſtle of the Gentiles, what a defection of faith is fallen among the Gentiles, eſpecially among the Romans, whereof the ſaid Apoſtle alſo foretold them ſo long before, fore-prophecying: *That the day of the Lord ſhall not come, except there come a defection before, and that the man of ſin ſhould be revealed, the proud adverſary of God, &c. Theſ.*2. meaning (no doubt) by this defection, a departing and a falling from that faith which the Holy Ghoſt had then planted by his Miniſtry among the Gentiles, as we ſee it now come to paſs in the Church of Rome. Which Church is ſo gone from the faith that St. Paul taught, that if he were now alive, and ſaw theſe Decrees and Decretals of the Biſhop of Rome, theſe heaps of ceremonies and traditions, theſe Maſs-books, theſe Portеſes, theſe Feſtivals and Legends, theſe Proceſſionals, Hymns, and Sequences, theſe Beads and Graduals, and the manner of their Invocation, their Canons, Cenſures, and later Councils, ſuch ſwarms of ſuperſtitious Monks and Friers, ſuch Sects, and ſo many divers Religious, the teſtament of St. Francis, the rule of St. Benedict, of St. Bridget, of St. Anthony, &c. the intricate ſubtilties and labyrinths of the Schoolmen, the infinite caſes and diſtinctions of the Canoniſts, the Sermons in Churches, the affertions in Schools, the glory of the Pope, the pride of the Clergy, the cruelty of perſecuting Prelats with their Officials and Promoters: he would ſay this were not a defection, but rather a plain deſtruction, and a ruine of faith; neither that this were any true Church of Chriſt, but a new found Religion, or Paganiſme rather, brought in under the ſhadow of Chriſtianity, wherein remaineth almoſt nothing elſe but the name only of Chriſt, and the outward form of his Religion, the true vein and effect whereof is utterly decayed: as to them which liſt to examine all the parts of this new Romiſh Religion may ſoon appear.

Gal. 1.

Defection of Faith in the Church of Rome.

A view of the Popes catholick Church. Theſſ. 2.

The Church of Rome degenerated again almoſt to new Paganiſm.

For ſave only that they pretend the ſolemn form and words of the Creed, and are baptiſed, confeſſing the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt: as touching all other points and true ſincerity of the Chriſtian Faith, which they outwardly profeſs, they are utterly degenerated from that which S.Paul and the Word of God firſt had taught them.

The Popes Church only in words Catholick, in deed hæreticall.

Firſt, they confeſs the Father in Word, but his Will in his Word expreſſed they renounce; his grace they acknowledge not, his benefits and promiſes given unto us in his Son they receive not, the vigor of his Law they feel not, the terror of his judgments earneſtly they fear not, his commandments they obſerve by traditions and commandments of their own.

Likewiſe the name of Chriſt his Son in word they confeſs, but his office in deed they deface and diminiſh; his glory they ſeek not, but under his name they do ſeek their own; the power of his blood and paſſion they know not, or elſe diſſemble it, whom neither they admit to be the Head of his Church alone, nor Saviour alone, nor to be our only Patron and Advocate, but match him with our Lady, and other Patrons, ſo that every Pariſh almoſt in Chriſtendom hath his peculiar Patron beſides Chriſt to hold by.

The Religion of the Popes Church prodeſcribeth contrary to the working of the Holy Ghoſt.

In like manner they confeſs the name of the Holy Ghoſt, but God himſelf knoweth how far they are from the comfort, knowledge and taſte of the Holy Ghoſt; as well may appear by their Councils, by their expounding of Scripture, by their ſuperſtitious ceremonies, by their outward worſhipping and idolatrous Invocation to ſtocks and ſtones, and to dead creatures, by their ſcrupulous obſervation of days, times, places, numbers and geſtures: and no leſs alſo by their Doctrine, which defraudeth the poor hearts of ſimple Chriſtians of their due conſolation, joy and liberty in the Holy Ghoſt, and keepeth them ſtill in a ſervile bondage, and a doubtful uncertainty of their ſalvation, contrary to the working of the Holy Spirit of God.

The Church of Rome pretendeth a fair face of religion, but is void of the effect thereof.

And thus the Church of Rome, pretending only the name of Chriſt and of his Religion, is ſo far altered from the truth of that which it pretendeth, that under the name of Chriſt, it perſecuteth both Chriſt and his Religion: working more harm to the Church of Chriſt, than ever did the open Tyrants and perſecuting Emperors among the Heathen: not much unlike herein to the old Synagogue of the Scribes and Phariſes, who under the name of God crucified the Son of God, and under pretence of the Law, fought againſt the Goſpel, and under the title of Abraham's children, perſecuted the Children of Abraham. And as they bragging ſo highly of the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord, did indeed deſtroy the true Temple of the Lord: right ſo theſe pretended Catholicks in theſe days, after they have raiſed up a Catholick Church of their own, and have armed the ſame with laws, and have gathered unto them a power of Prieſts, Prelats, Abbots, Priors, of religious men, of Cardinals, and alſo of ſecular Princes to take their part; now under the name of the Catholick Church they perſecute the true Catholick Church, and colouring their proceeding ſtill with In-nomine Domini, moſt cruelly put them to death which die Pro nomine Domini; condemning them for Hereticks, Schiſmaticks, and Rebels, not which deny any part of the Creed, which they themſelves profeſs, nor ſuch whom they can convince by any Scripture; but only ſuch, which will not joyn with their errors and hereſies, contrary to the honour of God, and truth of his Word.

The old Phariſies and the later Church of the Romes compared together.

The Popes Church under the name of the Catholick Church perſecuteth the true Catholick Church of Chriſt.

And leſt any ſhould think this, that we here proteſt againſt the corrupt errors and manifold deformities of this later church of Rome, to proceed of any rancour or affection, rather than grounded upon neceſſary cauſes, and demonſtrations evident, my purpoſe is (by the Lords leave) to take herein ſome little pains, as I have collected a little before the ſum and contents of St. Paul's Doctrine, wherewith the old Church of Rome was firſt ſeaſoned and acquainted, ſo now as in a like ſummary table to deſcry the particular branches and contents of the Popes Doctrine now ſet forth, to the intent that all true Chriſtian Readers, comparing the one with the other, may diſcern what great alteration there is between the Church of Rome that now is, and the Church of Rome that then was planted by the Apoſtles in the Primitive time. And to the end to open unto the ſimple Reader ſome way whereby he may the better judge in ſuch matters of Doctrine, and not be deceived in diſcerning truth from error; firſt we will propound certain principles or general poſitions, as infallible rules or truths of the Scripture, whereby all other Doctrines and Opinions of Men being tried and examined, as with the touchſtone, may the more eaſily be judged whether they be true or contrary, and whether they make againſt the Scripture, or no.

These Principles and infallible Rules of the Scripture, as no man can deny: ſo if they be granted, the Doctrine then of the Popes Church muſt needs be found not to be Catholick, but rather full of errors and hereſies, as in the ſequel following remaineth more expreſly and particularly by the Grace of Chriſt to be convinced.

Here followeth a ſummary collection of the Errors, Hereſies, and Abſurdities, contained in the Popes Doctrine, contrary to the Rules of Gods Word, and the firſt Inſtitution of the Church of Rome.

Of Faith and Juſtification.

The errors, hereſies and abſurdities in the Popes doctrine.

FIrſt as touching the only means and inſtrumental cauſe of our Juſtification, whereby the merits of Chriſts Paſſion be applied to us and made ours, ye heard before how Saint Paul aſcribeth the ſame only to faith; as appeareth by all his Letters, eſpecially to the Romans. Where he excluding all kind of works, aſcribeth all our ſalvation, juſtification, righteouſneſs, reconciliation and peace with God only unto faith in Chriſt. Contrary to which Doctrine, the Pope and his Church hath ſet up divers and ſundry other means of their own deviling whereby the merits of Chriſts Paſſion (they ſay) are applied to us and made ours, to the putting away of ſins, and for our juſtification, as hope, charity, facrifice of the Maſs, auricular confeſſion, ſatisfaction, merits of Saints, and holy Orders, the Popes Pardons, &c. So that Chriſts ſacrifice, ſtripes, and ſuffering, by this teaching doth not heal us, nor is beneficial to us, though we believe never ſo well, unleſs we add alſo theſe works and merits above recited. Which if it be true, then it is falſe that Eſay the Prophet doth promiſe: Chap. 53. In his ſtripes we are all made whole, &c. This error and hereſie of the Church of Rome, though it ſeem at firſt fight to the natural reaſon of man to be but of ſmall importance; yet if it be earneſtly conſidered, it is in very deed the moſt pernicious hereſie that ever almoſt crept into the Church upon the which, as the only foundation, all or the moſt part of all the errors, abſurdities and inconveniences of the Popes Church are grounded. For this being once admitted, that a man is not juſtified by his faith in Chriſt alone, but that other means muſt be fought by our own working and merits to apply the merits of Chriſts Paſſion unto us; then is there neither any certainty left of our ſalvation, nor end in ſetting up new means and merits of our own deviling for remiſſion of ſins. Neither hath there been any hereſie that either hath rebelled more pear to what horrible blindneſs and blaſphemy the Church of Rome is fallen, where this kind of Doctrine is not only ſuffered, but alſo publickly profeſſed, which ſpeaking againſt faith, thus blaſphemouſly dare ſay: Fides illa qua quis firmiter credit, & certo ſtatuit propter Chriſtum ſibi remiſſa eſſe peccata, ſeſeque poſſeſſurum vitam æternam, non fides eſt, ſed temeritas; non ſpiritus ſanctì perſuaſio, ſed humanæ audaciæ præſumptio. That is, That faith wherewith a man firmly believeth, and certainly aſſureth himſelf, that for Chriſts ſake his ſins be forgiven him, and that he ſhall poſſeſs eternal life, is not faith, but raſhneſs; not the perſwaſion of the Holy Ghoſt, but preſumption of a mans boldneſs.

Ex Lindano in epitome doctrinæ evangelicæ.

Of Works and the Law.

The firſt error of the Papiſts, touching good works.

AS touching the Doctrine of good works, and the Law, what the teaching of Saint Paul was to the Romans, ye heard before. Who although he excludeth good works from the office of juſtifying, yet excludeth he them not from the practice and converſation of Chriſtian life, but moſt earneſtly calleth upon all faithful believers in Chriſt, to walk worthy their vocation, to lay down their old converſation, to give their members ſervants of righteouſneſs, to offer their bodies up to God a lively ſacrifice, &c. The like example of whole teaching, if the Churches now reformed do not follow, let their ſermons, their preachings, writings, exhortings and lives alſo bear record. Who although they cannot ſay with Chriſt, Which of you can blame me of ſin? yet they may ſay to the adverſaries, Whoſoever of you is without fault, caſt the firſt ſtone of reproach againſt us. Wherefore Hoſius, Pighius, with their fellows do them open wrong, and ſlanderouſly belie them in comparing them in this behalf to Aetius, Eunomius, and other Hereticks called Anomei, who taking the good ſentences of Saint Paul, did abuſe the ſame to filthy licence of the fleſh, and corruption of wicked life, &c.

Hoſius in 2. tom. confeſſion. cap. 1.

But to let theſe ſlanders paſs, now what the errors be of the Church of Rome touching this part of Doctrine, remaineth to be declared. Whoſe error firſt ſtanderth in this, that they, miſunderſtanding the definition of good works, do call good works, not ſuch as properly are commanded by the Law of God, but ſuch as are agreeable to the Popes law; as building of Abbies and Churches, giving to the High Altar, founding of Trentals, finding of Chanteries, gilding of Images, hearing of Maſſes, going on Pilgrimage, fighting for the Holy Croſs, keeping of Vows, entring to Orders, faſting of Vigils, creeping to the Croſs, praying to Saints, &c. All which are not only reputed for good works, but ſo preferred alſo before all other works, that to theſe is given pardon from the Pope, double and triplefold, more than to any other good work of Charity commanded in the Law of Almighty God.

The ſecond error of the Papiſts in the doctrine of good works.

Another error alſo may be noted in the Papiſts, touching the efficient or formal cauſe of good works. For albeit they all confeſs in their Books, that Gratia Dei gratis data is the chief and principal cauſe thereof, and worketh in us Juſticiam primam (as they call it) yet the good works after regeneration they refer to other ſubordinate cauſes, under God, as to free-will, or to Habitum virtutis, or Ad integra naturalia, and nothing at all to faith, when as faith only next under God is the root and fountain of all well doing: as in the fruits of a good tree, albeit the Planter or the Husbandman be the principal agent thereof, and ſome cauſe alſo may be in the good ground; yet the next and immediate cauſe is the root that maketh the tree fruitful. In like manner, the grace of God in a ſoft and repentant mollified heart, planteth the gift of faith. Faith as a good root cannot lie dead or unoccupied, but ſpringeth forth, and maketh both the tree fruitful, and alſo the fruit thereof to be good, which otherwiſe had no acceptation nor goodneſs in them, were it not for the goodneſs of the root from whence they ſpring; So St. Paul, although he had certain works in him, ſuch as they were, before his converſion: yet had he no good works before the Grace of Chriſt had rooted faith in him. So Mary Magdalene the ſinner, and Zacheus the Publican. So all the Nations of the Gentiles began to bring forth fruit, and eſpecially good fruit, when they began to be ingraffed in Chriſt, and to receive the root of his faith, whole fruits before that, were all damnable and unſavoury. As touching the cauſe therefore of good works, there is no other in man but faith, whoſe office as it is to juſtifie us in Heaven, ſo the nature of it is here in earth to work by love, as the root worketh by the Sap. For as a man feeth and feeleth by faith the Love and Grace of God toward him in Chriſt his Son: ſo beginneth he to love again both God and man, and to do for his neighbour as God hath done to him. And hereof properly ſpringeth the running fountain of all good works and deeds of Charity.

Faith the root and cauſe of good works.

Works are not to be called good, but by reaſon of faith.

The office of faith to juſtifie.

The office of faith to bring forth good works.

Thirdly, as they err in the cauſe of good works, ſo do they err much more in the end of the Law, and of good works: for where S. Paul teacheth the Law to be given to this uſe and end: to convict our tranſgreſſions, to prove us ſinners, to ſhew and condemn our infirmity, and to drive us to Chriſt: they take and apply no other end to the Law, but to make us perfect, to keep us from wrath, and to make us juſt before God. And likewiſe where St. Paul proveth all our good works to be unperfect, and utterly ſhudeth them from the end of juſtifying: they contrariwiſe do teach, as though the end of good works were to merit remiſſion of ſins, to ſatisfie unto God, to deſerve Grace, to redeem ſouls from Purgatory, and that by them the perſon of the regenerate man doth pleaſe God, and is made juſt before God. For ſo they teach moſt wickedly and horribly, ſaying, that Chriſt ſuffered for original ſin, or ſins going before Baptiſm; but the actual ſins, which follow after Baptiſm, muſt be done away by mens merits. And ſo they aſſign to Chriſt the beginning of ſalvation, or obtaining the firſt grace (as they call it) but the perfection or conſummation of grace they give to works and our own ſtrength. Neither can they in any caſe abide, that we be juſtified freely by the mercy of God through faith only apprehending the merits of Chriſt. Howbeit neither do all Papiſts in this their error agree in one. For ſome make diſtinction, and ſay, that we are juſtified by Chriſt Principaliter, id eſt, principally: Et minus principaliter, id eſt, leſs principally, by the dignity of our own deeds, contrary to the eighth principle before mentioned. Others hold that we are made righteous before God, not by our works that go before faith, but by our vertues that follow after. Some again do thus expound the ſaying of St. Paul, We are juſtified by faith: that is (ſay they) by faith, preparing us, or ſetting us in a good way to be juſtified. Others expound it by the figure Synecdoche, that is, by faith conjoyned together with other vertues: Others thus: By faith, that is, being formed with charity, &c. Thus all theſe do derogate from the benefit of Chriſt, and attribute unto works a great or the greateſt part of our juſtification, directly againſt the true vein of St. Paul's Doctrine, and firſt inſtitution of the ancient Church of Rome, and againſt all the principles of Holy Scripture.

The divers opinions of the catholick Papiſts how faith juſtifieth.

Furthermore, as touching the ſaid Doctrine of the Law and good works, they err in miſunderſtanding the nature of the Law and works. For where S. Paul diſputeth that the Law is ſpiritual, and requireth of us perfect obedience of the whole power of man, which we being carnal, are never able to accompliſh: they affirm otherwiſe, that the Law doth require but only outward obedience of man, and therewith is contented. And this obedience (they ſay) man is not only able to perform, but alſo to do more and greater things than the Law requireth. Whereof riſe the works of Supererogation, contrary to the ſixth and eighth principles above ſpecified. Alſo there be (ſay they) among other, certain works of the Law, which pertain not to all men, but are Conſilia, Counſels, left for perfect men, as matter for them to merit by, and theſe they call Opera perfectionis, or Opera indebita, adding alſo unto theſe new devices, to ſerve God after their own traditions befides the Word of God; as Monaſtical Vows, willful poverty, difference of meats and garments, Pilgrimage to Relicks and Saints, worſhipping of the dead, ſuperſitious ceremonies, rоſaries, &c. with ſuch like; and theſe they call works of perfection, which they prefer before the other commanded in the Law of God. Inſomuch that in compariſon of theſe, the other neceſſary duties commanded and commended by the Word of God (as to bear office in the Commonwealth, to live in the godly ſtate of matrimony, to ſuſtain the office of a ſervant in a houſe) are contemned, and accounted as prophane in compariſon of theſe, contrary to the tenth principle above mentioned.

Of

Of Sin.

Erroneous Doctrine of the later Church of Rome concerning ſin.

OF Sin likewiſe they teach not rightly, nor after the inſtitution of the Apoſtles, and the ancient Church of Rome, while they conſider not the deepneſs and largeneſs of ſin, ſuppoſing it ſtill to be nothing elſe but the inward actions with conſent of will, or the outward, ſuch as are againſt will: whereas the ſtrength of ſin extendeth not only to theſe, but alſo comprehendeth the blindneſs and ignorance of the mind, lack of knowledge and true fear of God, the untowardneſs of mans mind to God-ward, the privy rebellion of the heart againſt the Law of God, the undelighting will of man to God and his Word. The ſenſe of fleſh St. Paul alſo calleth an enemy againſt God, and feeleth in himſelf, that is, in his fleſh, nothing dwelling but ſin.

Original ſin what it is.

As touching alſo original ſin, wherein we are born, which is the deſtruction of original juſtice, and of Gods image in us (remaining in us, and bringing forth in us wicked cogitations, affections, and motions of naughtineſs againſt the Law of God, and never ceaſing ſo long as man liveth) this original ſin the Popes Doctrine doth not deny, but yet doth much extenuate the ſame, and holdeth that this inward concupiſence, and vitious affections not burſting out in us with conſent of will, are no mortal nor damnable ſin, but only Fomes peccati: and fay moreover, that this Concupiſcentia in us is no depravation of the higher, but only of the lower parts of man being a thing ἀδιάφορον, indifferent, and no leſs natural in us, than is the appetite to eat and drink, and that the ſame is left to remain in the Saints after Baptiſm, to be to them occaſion of more meriting, &c.

Of Penance or Repentance.

Falſe doctrine of the later Church of Rome touching Penance.

OF Penance, this later Lateran Church of Rome of late hath made a Sacrament (contrary to the fourth principle before) which Penance, ſay they, ſtandeth of three parts, contrition, confeſſion, and ſatisfaction canonical. Contrition (as they teach) may be had by ſtrength of free-will, without the Law and the Holy Ghoſt, Per Actus elicitos, through mans own action and endeavour. Which contrition firſt muſt be ſufficient, and ſo it meriteth remiſſion of ſin. In confeſſion they require a full rehearſal of all ſins, whereby the Prieſt knowing the crimes, may miniſter ſatisfaction accordingly. And this rehearſing of ſins, Ex opere operato, deſerveth remiſſion, contrary to the fourteenth principle before. Satisfactions they call Opera indebita, injoyned by the ghoſtly Father. And this ſatisfaction (ſay they) taketh away and changeth eternal puniſhment into temporal pains, which pains alſo it doth mitigate. And again, theſe ſatisfactions may be taken away by the Popes indulgence, &c.

Contrition. Confeſſion.

Satisfaction.

True Doctrine of repentance by the Scripture. Parts of repentance. 1. Contrition. 2. Faith. 3. New obedience.

This unfavoury and Heatheniſh Doctrine of Penance far differeth from the true teaching of Holy Scripture: By the which teaching, repentance properly containeth theſe three parts, contrition, faith and new life. Contrition is called in Scripture the ſorrow of heart, riſing upon the conſideration of ſin committed, and of the anger of God provoked, which ſorrow driveth a man to Chriſt for ſuccour: whereupon riſeth faith. Faith bringeth afterward amendment or newneſs of life, which we call new obedience, working fruits worthy of repentance.

Difference between the Law and the Goſpel.

The blind ignorance of the Popes Church in not diſtinguiſhing the Law from the Goſpel.

AS there is nothing more neceſſary and comfortable for troubled Conſciences, than to be well inſtructed in the difference between the Law and the Goſpel: ſo is the Church of Rome much to blame in this behalf, becauſe it confoundeth together thoſe two, being in nature ſo divers and contrary one from another; as threatnings with promiſes, things temporal with things eternal, forrowful things with glad tidings, death with life, bondage with freedom, &c. Teaching the people that whatſoever the Law ſaith, the Goſpel confirmeth; and whatſoever the Goſpel ſaith, the ſame is agreeable to the Law, and ſo make they no difference between Moſes and Chriſt; ſave only that Moſes (they ſay) was the giver of the old law, Chriſt is the giver of the new and a more perfect Law. And thus imagine they the Goſpel to be nothing elſe but a new law given by Chriſt, binding to the obſervation of our doings and deſervings, no otherwiſe than to the old law. And ſo divide they the whole law after this diſtinction, into three parts, to wit, the law of Nature, the law of Moſes, and the law of Chriſt. And as for the Goſpel (they ſay) it is revealed for no other cauſe, but to ſhew to the world more perfect precepts, and councels, than were in the old law: to the fulfilling whereof they attribute juſtification, and ſo leave the poor conſciences of men in perpetual doube, and induce other manifold errours; bringing the people into a falſe opinion of Chriſt, as though he were not a remedy againſt the law, but came as another Moſes, to give a new law to the world.

A Babyloni. cal confuſion in the Popes doctrine.

Papiſts make the Goſpel a new law.

Papiſts divide the law into the law of Nature, the law of Moſes, and the law of Chriſt.

The Popes Church blind in the office of Chriſt.

Furthermore, as they make no difference between the nature of the law, and the nature of the Goſpel, confounding Moſes and Chriſt together: ſo neither do they diſtinguiſh or diſcern the time of the law, and the time of the Goſpel aſunder. For where St. Paul bringeth in the law to be a Schoolmaſter, and limiteth him his time unto Chriſt, and ſaith that Chriſt is the end of the law, that is, whereas the law ceaſeth, there Chriſt beginneth, and where Chriſt beginneth there the law endeth: they contrary make the law to have no end nor ceaſing, but give to it immortal life and kingdom equal with Chriſt, ſo that Chriſt and the Law together do reign over the ſoul and conſcience of man. Which is untrue: For either Chriſt muſt give place, and the law ſtand; (I mean) muſt end, and Chriſt reign. For both theſe, Chriſt and the law, grace and malediction cannot reign and govern together. But Chriſt the Son of God, which once died can die no more, but muſt reign for ever. Wherefore the law with his ſtrength, ſting and curſe, muſt needs ceaſe and have an end. And this is it that S. Paul ſpeaking of the triumph of Chriſt faith, that he Aſcending up led away captivity captive, and hath ſet man at liberty; not at liberty to live as fleſh luſteth, neither hath freed him from the uſe and exerciſe of the law, but from the dominion and power of the law. ſo that, There is now no condemnation to them that be in Chriſt Jeſus, which walk not after the fleſh, &c. Rom. 8. And in another place S. Paul ſpeaking of the ſame power and dominion of the law, ſaith, that Chriſt had taken the obligation written againſt us in decrees, and hath nailed it upon the Croſs triumphing over all, &c. So that as the Kingdom of Chriſt firſt began upon the Croſs; even ſo upon the ſame Croſs, and at the ſame time the Kingdom of the law expired, and the malediction of the law was ſo crucified upon the Croſs, that it ſhall never riſe again, to have any power againſt them that be in Chriſt Jeſus. For like as if a woman be diſcharged from her firſt husband being dead, and hath married another man, the firſt husband hath no more power over her: even ſo we now being eſpouſed unto Chriſt our ſecond husband, are diſcharged utterly from our firſt husband the law, and (as St. Paul in another place ſaith) Are no more under the law, that is, under the dominion and malediction of the law, but under grace, that is, under perpetual remiſſion of ſins, committed not only before our Baptiſm, but as well alſo after Baptiſm, and during all our life long. For therein properly conſiſteth the grace of God, in not imputing ſin to us, ſo often as the repenting ſinner riſing up by faith, fleeth unto Chriſt, and apprehendeth Gods mercy and remiſſion promiſed in him, according to the teſtimony both of the Pſalm, Bleſſed is he to whom the Lord imputeth no ſin, &c. and alſo of all the Prophets, Which (as Saint Peter ſaith) give record to him, that through his name, all that believe in him ſhall receive remiſſion of their ſins, &c. Act. 10. Which being ſo, as it cannot be denied, then what need theſe private and extraordinary remiſſions to be brought into the Church by auricular confeſſion, by meritorious deeds, and by the Popes pardons? For if there be no condemnation but by the Law, and if this Law it ſelf which was the firſt husband, be captived, crucified, aboliſhed and departed, what condemnation then can there be to them that be in Chriſt Jeſus, or by whom ſhould it come? If there be no condemnation, but a free and general deliverance for all men, once gotten by the Victory of Chriſt from the penalty of the Law: what needeth then any particular remiſſion of ſins at ſundry times to be ſought at the Prieſts hands, or the Popes pardons? He that hath a general pardon, needeth no particular. If remedy for ſin be general and perpetual, once gotten, for ever to all them that be in Christ Jesus, what needeth any other remedy by auricular confession? If it be not general and perpetual, how then is it true that St. Paul saith, The Law is crucified, and condemnation abolished? Or how standeth redemption perpetual and general, if remission be not general? For what is redemption else, but remission of sin, or sins bought out? Or what else to kill the Law, but to discharge us from condemnation for ever? He that delivereth his friend for a time out of his enemies hand doth him a pleasure: but he that killeth the enemy once out of the way, giveth perpetual safety. So if remission of sins by Christ were for some sins, and not for all, the Law then must needs live still. But now the killing and crucifying of the Law importeth full remission and absolute, and our safety to be perpetual. But here, percase, will be objected of some: How standeth remission of sins certain and perpetual, seeing new offences being daily committed, do daily require new remission? Hereto I answer: Albeit sins do daily grow, whereby we have need daily to desire God to Forgive our trespasses, &c. Yet notwithstanding the cause of our remission standeth ever one and perpetual, neither is the same to be repeated any more, nor any other cause to be sought besides that alone. This cause is the body of Christ sacrificed once upon the Cross for all sins that either have been or shall be committed. Beside this cause there is no other, neither confession, nor mens pardons that remitteth sins.

The Law crucified by Christ, what it meaneth.

Objection.

Answer.

The cause of remission ever one and perpetual.

Furthermore as the cause is one and ever perpetual, which worketh remission of sins unto us: so is the promise of God ever one, once made, and standeth perpetual, that offereth the same to the faith of the repenting sinner. And because the said promise of God is always sure and cannot fail, which offereth remission to all them that believe in Christ, being limited neither to time nor number, therefore we may boldly conclude, that what time sower a repenting sinner believeth, and by faith applieth to him the sacrifice of Christ, he hath by Gods own promise, remission of his sins, whether they were done before, or after Baptism.

The promise of remission ever perpetual.

Remission of sins freely provided without limitation of time or number.

And moreover, for so much as the said promise of God offereth remission to the repentant sinner, by no other means nor condition, but only one, that is, by faith in Christ: therefore excluding all other means and conditions of mans working, we say, that what repenting sinner sower believeth in Christ, hath already in himself (and needeth not to seek to any Priest) perpetual assurance of remission, not for this time or that time only, but for ever and ay. For the promise saith not, He that believeth in Christ shall be pardoned this time, so he sin no more: neither doth it say, that the Law is staid, or the sentence reprived, but saith plainly, that the Law with her condemnation and sentence it self, is condemned and hanged up, and shall never rise again to them that be in Christ Jesus: and promiseth indeterminately, without limitation, remission of sins, To all that Acts 10. believe in his name, &c. Act. 10 And likewise in another place, the Scripture speaking absolutely, saith, Sin shall not prevail over you, and addeth the reason why, saying, Because ye are not under the Law, but under Rom. 6. Grace, Rom. 6. Adding this lesson withal (as followeth in the same place) Not that sinners should sin more therefore, because they are under grace, but only that weak infirmities might be relieved, broken consciences comforted, and repenting sinners holpen from desperation, to the praise of Gods glory. For as God forgiveth not sinners, because they should sin, so neither doth infirmity of falling diminish the grace of Christ, but rather doth illustrate the same, as it is written, My strength is made perfect in infirmity, 2 Cor. 12. And again, Where Sin abounded, 2 Cor. 12. there Grace superabounded also.

The means whereby remission is promised: is only faith.

The words of promise Free and absolute.

Mans infirmity hindereth not the Grace of Christ, but augmenteth it.

Rom. 5. Four things concur in remission of sins.

In remission of sins therefore, these four things must concur together: first the cause that worketh (which is the sacrifice of Christs body), secondly, the promise that offereth, thirdly, faith that apprehendeth, fourthly, the repenting sinner that receiveth. And although sins daily do grow, which daily provoke us to crave remission: yet as touching the cause that worketh remission of our daily sins, and the means which apprehend and apply the said cause unto us, they remain always one and perpetual: besides which no other cause nor means is to be fought of man. So that to them that be repenting sinners, and be in Christ Jesus, there is no law to condemn them, though they have deserved condemnation: but they are under a perpetual Kingdom, and a Heaven full of Grace, and remission to cover their sins, and not to impute their iniquities, through the promise of God in Christ Jesus our Lord.

And therefore wicked and impious is the doctrine of them, first, which seek any other cause of remission, than only the bleed of our Saviour: secondly, which assign any other means to apply the bloodshedding of Christ unto us, besides only faith: thirdly and especially, which so limit and restrain the eternal priviledge of Christs passion, as though it served but only for sins done without and before faith, and that the rest after Baptism committed, must be done away by confession, pardons, and satisfactory deeds. And all this riseth because the true nature of the Law and the Gospel is not known, nor the difference rightly considered between the times of the one and of the other. Neither again do they make any distinction between the malediction of the Law and use of the Law. And therefore whensoever they hear us speak of the Law (meaning the malediction of the Law) to be abolished, thereupon they maliciously slander us, as though we spake against the good exercises of the Law, and give liberty of flesh to carnal men to live as they list. Whereof more shall be said (by the Lords grace) as place and time shall hereafter require.

The Popes errors touching remission of sins detected.

What inconvenience riseth for lack of distinction between the Law and the Gospel.

Of Free-will.

Concerning Free-will, as it may peradventure in some case be admitted, that men without Grace may do some outward functions of the Law, and keep some outward observances or traditions: so as touching things spiritual and appertaining to salvation, the strength of man being not regenerate by grace, is so infirm and impotent, that he can perform nothing, neither in doing well nor willing well. Who, after he be regenerated by Grace, may work and do well, but yet in such sort that still remaineth, notwithstanding, a great imperfection of flesh, and a perpetual repugnance between the flesh and spirit. And thus was the original Church of the ancient Romans first instructed. From whom see now how far this later Church of Rome hath degenerated, which holdeth and affirmeth, that men without Grace may perform the obedience of the Law, and prepare themselves to grace by working, so that those works may be meritorious, and of congruity obtain grace, Which grace once obtained, then men may (say they) perfectly perform the full obedience of the Law, and accomplish those spiritual actions and works which God requireth, and so those works of congruity, deserve everlasting life. As for the infirmity which is still remaineth in nature, that they nothing regard nor once speak of.

Of Invocation and Adoration.

Over and besides these unethelick and almost unchristian absurdities and defections from the Apostolical faith above specified, let us consider the manner of their invocation, not to God alone, as they should; but to dead men, saying: that Saints are to be called upon, Tanquam mediatores intercessionis, As Mediators of intercession: Christum vero tanquam mediatorem salutis. And Christ as the Mediator of salvation: And affirm moreover, that Christ was a Mediator only in time of his passion. Which is repugnant to the words of S. Paul, writing to the old Romans, chap. 8. where he speaking of the intercession of Christ: Which is (saith he) on the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us, &c. And if Christ be a mediator of salvation: what needeth then any other intercession of Saints for our sutes? For salvation being once had, what can we require more? Or what lacketh he more to be obtained of the Saints, which is sure to be saved only by Christ? And then in their Catholick devotions, why do they teach us thus to pray to the blessed Virgin: Salve ma omnes qui te glorificant, that is, Save all them that glorifie thee, &c. if salvation belong only to Christ? unless they study of purpose to seem contrary to themselves.

False doctrine of invocation of Saints.

Mediator of intercession, Mediator of Salvation.

Christ a continual mediator by the ordaine of St. Paul. Rom. 8. Christ only being our mediator of Salvation, what needeth any other mediation of Saints.

Hitherto also pertaineth the worshipping of relikes, and the false adoration of Sacraments, that is, the outward signs of the things signified, contrary to the seventh Principle before. Add to this also the prophanation of the Lords Supper, contrary to the use for which it was ordained, in reserving it after the Communion ministred, in setting it to sale for money, and falsly persuading both themselves and others, that the Priest doth merit both to himself that faith, and to him that heareth, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu utentis, &c. that is, Only by the mere doing of the work, though the party that useth the same hath no motion in him.

Idolatry committed to the Sacrament.

Prophanation of the Lords Supper. False meriting by Masse.

Of Sacraments, Baptism, and the Lords Supper.

As touching Sacraments, their Doctrine likewise is corrupt and erroneous.

False Doctrine touching Sacraments. The number.

1. First, They err falsely in the number. For where the Institution of Christ ordaineth but two, they (contrary to the fourth Principle above prefixed) have added to the Prescription of the Lords Word, five other Sacraments.

Cause final.

2. Secondly, In the cause final they err. For where the Word hath ordained those Sacraments to excite our faith, and to give us admonitions of spiritual things: they contrariwise do teach that the Sacraments do not only stir up faith, but also that they avail and are effectual without faith, Exopere operato, sine bono motu utentis, &c. As is to be found in Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, Catharinus, and others more.

The operation.

3. Thirdly, In the operation and effect of the Sacraments they fail, where they contrary to the mind of the Scriptures do say, that they give Grace, and not only do signifie, but also contain and exhibit that which they signifie, to wit, Grace and Salvation.

The application of Sacraments.

4. Fourthly, They err also in Application, applying their Sacraments both to the quick and the dead, to them also that be absent, to remission of sins, and releasing of pain, &c.

Errors and abuse of Baptism.

In the Sacrament of Baptism they are to be reproved, not only for adding to the simple words of Christs Institution divers other new-found Rites and Phantasies of men: but also where the use of the old Church of Rome was only to baptize men; they baptize also Bells, and apply the words of Baptism to water, fire, candels, flocks and stones, &c.

Baptizing of Bells.

False Doctrine of the Popes Church concerning the Lords Supper.

But especially in the Supper of the Lord their Doctrine most filthily swerveth from the right mind of the Scripture, all order, reason and fashion; most worthy to be exploded out of all Christian Churches. Touching the which Sacrament, the first Error is their Idolatrous abuse by worshipping, adoring, censing, knocking and kneeling unto it, in reserving also and carrying the same about in pomp and procession in Towns and Fields. Secondly, also in the substance thereof their teaching is manifoldes, leaving there no substance of Bread and Wine to remain, but only the real Body and Blood of Christ, putting no difference between calling and making. Because Christ called Bread his Body, therefore say they, he made it his Body, and so of a wholesome Sacrament, make a perilous Idol: and that which the old Church of Rome did ever take to be a mystery, they turn into a blind mist of meer accidents to bleer the peoples eyes, making them believe they see that they see not: and not to see that which they see, and to worship a thing made, for their Maker, a Creature for their Creator: and that which was threshed out of a wheaten Sheaf, they set up in the Church, and worship for a Saviour: and when they have worshipped him, then they offer him to his Father: and when they have offered him, then they eat him up, or else close him fast in a pit, where if he corrupt and putrifie before he be eaten, then they burn him to powder and ashes. And notwithstanding they know well by Scriptures, that the Body of Christ can never corrupt and putrifie: yet for all this corruption, will they needs make it the body of Christ, and burn all them which believe not that which is against true Christian belief.

Of Matrimony.

What order and rule Saint Paul hath set for marriage in his Epistle to the Corinthians it is manifest: where, as he preferreth single life in such as have the gift of Continence, before the married estate: so again, in such as have not the gift, he preferreth the coupled life before the other: willing every such one to have his wife: Because of Fornication. Furthermore, how the said Apostle alloweth a Bishop to be the Husband of one wife (so he exceed not to the manner of the Jews, which were permitted to have many) and how vehemently he reproveth them that restrain marriage, his Letters to Timothy do record. Moreover, what degrees be permitted by the Law of God to marry, in the Book of Leviticus is to be seen, Chapter eighteen. Also how Children ought not to marry without consent of their Parents by manifest Examples of the Scriptures it is notorious.

Contrary to these Ordinances of the Scripture, the new Catholicks of the Popes Church, first do repute and call marriage a state of Imperfection, and prefer single life, as if never so impure, before the same, pretending that where the one repleniseth the Earth, the other filleth Heaven. Furthermore, as good as the third part of Christendom, if it be no more, both Men and Women, they keep through co-acted Vows from marriage, having no respect whether they have the gift or no. Ministers and Priests such as are found to have wives, not only they remove out of place, but also pronounce Sentence of death upon them, and account their Children for Bastards and illegitimate: Again, as good as the third part of the year they exempt, and suspend from liberty of marriage. Degrees of Copulation forbidden they extend further than ever did the Law of God, even to the fifth or sixth degree. Which degrees notwithstanding they release again when they list for money. Over and besides all this, they have added a new-found Prohibition of spiritual Kindred, that is, that such as have been Gossips, or Godfathers and Godmothers together in Christening another mans Child, must not by their Law marry together. Briefly and finally in this Doctrine and Cases of Matrimony, they gain and rake to themselves much money from the people, they augment horrible Sodomitry, they nourish wicked Adultery and much Fornication, they till the world with Offendions and Bastards, and give great occation of murthering Infants.

Of Magistrates and civil Government.

Ye heard before what Rules and Lessons Saint Paul gave to the old Romans concerning Magistrates, to whose Authority he would have all humane Creatures to be subjected, and how they are the Ministers of God, having the Sword given unto them, wherewith they ought to repress false Doctrine and Idolatry, and maintain that which is true and right, Rom. 13. Now let us survey a little the Popes proceedings, and mark how far he transgresseth in this, as he doth in all other points almost from true Christianity.

3. Yea they take upon them to depose and set up Rulers and Magistrates, whom they list.

Of Purgatory.

The Paradoxes, or rather the Fantasies of the later fet Church of Rome concerning Purgatory, be monstrous, neither old nor Apostolical.

The Fantasies and untruths of the Popes Church concerning Purgatory.

1. First (say they) There is a Purgatory, where Souls do burn in fire after this life.

2. The pain of Purgatory differeth nothing from the pains of Hell, but only that it hath an end; the pains of Hell have none.

3. The painful suffering of this fire fretteth and scowreth away the sins before committed in the body.

4. The time in these pains indureth in some longer, in some less, according as their sins deserve.

5. After which time of their pains being expired, then the mercy of God doth translate them to Heavenly bliss, which the body of Christ hath bought for them.

6. The pains of Purgatory be so great, that if all the Beggers of the World were seen on the one side, and but one Soul of Purgatory on the other side, the whole World would pity more that one, than all the others.

7. The whole time of punishment in this Purgatory must continue so long, till the fire have clean fretted and scowred away the rusty spots of every sinful Soul there burning, unless there come some release:

8. Helps and releases that may shorten the time of their Purgation, by the Popes Pardons and Indulgences, Sacrifice of the Altar, Dirges, and Trentals, Prayer, Fasting, meritorious Deeds out of the Treasure-House of the Church, Alms and Charitable Deeds of the living, in satisfying Gods Justice for them, &c.

9. Lack of belief of Purgatory bringeth to Hell.

Manifest defection of the Popes Church from the old Faith of Rome.

Many other false Errors and great Deformities, Heresies, Absurdities, Vanities, and Follies, besides their blasphemous Raylings, and Contumelies, may be noted in the said latter Church of Rome, wherein they have made manifest defection from the old Faith of Rome, as in depriving the Church of one kind of the Sacrament, in taking from the people the knowledge and reading of Gods Word, in praying and speaking to the people, and administring Sacraments in a Tongue unknown, in mistaking the Authority of the Keys, in their unwritten Verities, in making the Authority of the Scripture insufficient, in untrue judgment of the Church, and the wrong Notes of the same in the Supremacy of the See of Rome, in their wrong Opinions of Antichrist.

Contrariety between the Religion of Christ and of the Pope briefly noted.

But because these, with all other parts of Doctrine, are more copiously and at large comprehended in other Books both in Latin and English, set forth in these our days: I shall not need further herein to travel, especially seeing the contrariety between the Popes Church and the Church of Christ, between the Doctrine of the one, and the Doctrine of the other, is so evident, that he is blind that seeth it not, and hath no hands almost that feeleth it not.

Christs Doctrine is wholely Spiritual.

For (briefly in one note to comprehend, that which may suffice for all) whereas the Doctrine of Christ is altogether Spiritual, consisting wholly in Spirit and Verity, and requireth no outward thing to make a true Christian man but only Baptism (which is the outward profession of Faith) and receiving the Lords Supper: Let us now examine the whole Religion of this latter Church of Rome, and we shall find it, from top to toe, to consist in nothing else but altogether in outward and ceremonial Exercises; as outward Confession, Absolution at the Priests hand, outward Sacrifice of the Mass, buying of Pardons, purchasing of Obits, externe worshipping of Images and Reliques, Pilgrimage to this place or that, building of Churches, founding of Monasteries, outward Works of the Law, outward Gestures, Garments, Colours, choice of Meats, difference of Times and Places, peculiar Rites and Observances, set Prayers, and number of Prayers prescribed, fasting of Vigils, keeping of Holidays, coming to Church, hearing of Service, extern succession of Bishops, and of Peters See, extern Form and Notes of the Church, &c. So that by this Religion to make a true Christian and a good Catholick, there is no working of the Holy Ghost almost required. As for example, to make this matter more demonstrable, let us here define a Christian-man after the Popes making: whereby we may see the better what is to be judged of the Scope of his Doctrine.

No outward thing is required in Christs Doctrine to make a Christian man, but only Baptism and the Lords Supper.

All doctrine of th' Popes standeth only in outward things

A Christian man after the Popes making defined.

A Christian man defined after the Popes Doctrine.

AFter the Popes Catholick Religion, a true Christian man is thus defined: first, to be baptized in the Latin-Tongue (where the Godfathers profess they cannot tell what) then confirmed by the Bishop: the Mother of the Child to be purified; after he be grown in years, then to come to the Church, to keep his Fasting-days, to fast the Lent, to come under Benedicite; that is, to be confessed of the Priest, to do his Penance, at Easter to take his Rites, to hear Mass and Divine Service, to set up Candles before Images, to creep to the Cross, to take holy bread and holy water, to go on procession, to carry his Palms and Candle, and to take Ashes, to fast the Ember-days, Rogation-days, and Vigils, to keep the Holidays, to pay his Tythes and Offering-days, to go on Pilgrimage, to buy Pardons, to worship his Maker over the Priests head, to receive the Pope for his Supream Head, and to obey his Laws, to receive Saint Nicholas Clerkes, to have his Beads, and to give to the high Altar, to take Orders if he will be a Priest, to say his Mattens, to sing his Mass, to lift up fair, to keep his vow, and not to marry. when he is sick to be annoled and take the Rites of the Holy Church, to be buried in the Church-yard, to be rung for, to be sung for, to be buried in a Fryers Coole, to find a Soul-Priest, &c.

Corporal exercise profiteth to small profit.

All which Points being observed, who can deny but this is a devout man, and a perfect Christian Catholick, and sure to be saved, as a true faithful Child of the holy Mother-Church?

Now look upon this definition, and tell me (good Reader) what Faith or Spirit, or what working of the Holy Ghost in all this Doctrine is to be required. The Grace of our Lord Jesus give the true light of his Gospel to shine in our Hearts. Amen.

THE

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE Acts and Monuments,

CONTAINING

The three hundred Years next after CHRIST, with the Ten Persecutions of the Primitive Church.

THese things before premised, having thus hitherto prepared the way unto our story, let us now (by the grace and speed of Christ our Lord) enter into the matter: that as we have heretofore set forth in a general description the whole state as well of the primitive as of the later times of this Church of Rome: so now consequently we may discourse in particular sort the acts and doings of every age, by it self, in such order as is before prefixed.

1. First, To declare of the suffering time of the Church, which containeth about the time of three hundred years after Christ.
2. Secondly, The flourishing and growing time of the same, containing other three hundred years.
3. Thirdly, The declining time of the Church, and of true Religion, other three hundred years.
4. Fourthly, Of the time of Antichrist, reigning and raging in the Church, since the loosing of Satan.
5. Lastly, Of the reforming time of Christs Church, in these later three hundred years.

In the tractation of all which things our chief purpose and endeavour shall be (so near as the Lord will give us Grace) not so much to intermeddle with outward Affairs of Princes, or matters civil (except sometime for example of life) as specially minding (by the help of the Lord) to prosecute such things which to the Ecclesiastical state of the Church are appertaining: as first to intreat of the stablishing of Christian Faith, then of the Persecutions of Tyrants, the Constancy and Patience of Gods Saints, the first Convertion of Christian Realms to the Faith of Christ, namely, of this Realm of England and Scotland: first beginning with King Lucius, and so forward following the order of our English Kings here in this Land, to declare the Maintenance of true Doctrine, the false practise of Prelates, the creeping in of Superstition and Hypocrisie, the manifold Assaults, Wars and Tumults of the Princes of this World against the people of God. Wherein may appear the wonderful Operation of Christs mighty Hand, ever working in his Church, and never ceasing to defend the same against his Enemies, according to the verity of his own Word, promising to be with his Church while the World shall stand, so as by the process of this story may well be proved, and will be testified in the Sequel thereof.

Two things in this history chiefly to be noted.

In the tractation of all which things two special Points I chiefly commend to the Reader, as most requisite and necessary for every Christian man to observe and to note for his own experience and profit; as first the disposition and nature of this World; secondly, the nature and condition of the Kingdom of Christ; the vanity of the one, and stablishment of the other; the unprosperous and unquiet state of the one, ruled by mans Violence and Wisdom, and the happy success of the other ever ruled by Gods Blessing and Providence; the wrath and revenging hand of God in the one, and his mercy upon the other. The World call all such as be without or against Christ, either by ignorance not knowing him, or by Heathenish life not following him, or by violence refishing him. On the other side, the Kingdom of Christ in this World, I take to be all them which belong to the Faith of Christ, and here take his part in this world against the world: the number of whom although it be much smaller than the other, and always lightly is hated and molested of the World, yet it is the number, which the Lord peculiarly doth bless and prosper, and ever will. And this number of Christs Subjects is it, which we call the visible Church here in Earth. Which visible Church, having in it self a difference of two sorts of people, so is it to be divided in two parts, of which the one standeth of such as be of outward Profession only, the other which by Election inwardly are joyned to Christ: the first in words and lips seem to honour Christ, and are in the visible Church only, but not in the Church invisible, and partake the outward Sacraments of Christ, but not the inward blessing of Christ. The other are both in the visible and also in the invisible Church of Christ, which not in words only and outward profession, but also in heart do truly serve and honour Christ, partaking not only the Sacraments, but also the heavenly Blessings and Grace of Christ.

The Kingdom of Christ in this world.

The visible Church.

The Church of Christ divided in two sorts of people.

And many times it happeneth, that as between the World and the Kingdom of Christ there is a continual repugnance: so between these two parts of this visible Church aforesaid oft times groweth great Variance and mortal Persecution, insomuch that sometime the true Church of Christ hath no greater Enemies, than of their own Profession and Company, as happened not only in the time of Christ and his Apostles, but also from time to time almost continually. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 1. but especially in these later days of the Church under the Persecution of Antichrist and his Retinue, as by the reading of this Volume more manifestly hereafter may appear.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 1.

At the first Preaching of Christ, and coming of the Gospel, who should rather have known and received him, than the Pharisees and Scribes of that people, which had his Law? And yet who persecuted and rejected him more than they themselves? What followed? They in refusing Christ to be their King, and choosing rather to be subject unto Cæsar, were by the said their own Cæsar at length destroyed; when as Christs Subjects the same time escaped the danger. Whereby it is to be learned, what a dangerous thing it is to refuse the Gospel of God, when it is so gently offered.

Gods punishment for refusing the Gospel.

The like example of Gods wrathful punishment is to be noted no less in the Romans also themselves. For when Tiberius Cæsar, having received by Letters from Pontius Pilate of the doings of Christ, of his Miracles, Resurrection and Ascension into Heaven, and how he was received as God of many, was himself also moved with belief of the same, and did confer thereof with the whole Senate of Rome, to have Christ adored as God: they not agreeing thereunto refused him, because that contrary to the Law of the Romans he was consecrated (said they) for God before the

The vain cause why the Senate of Rome refused Christ.

the Senate of Rome had so decreed and approved him, &c. Tertul. Apol. cap. 5. Thus the vain Senate following rather the Law of man, than of God, and which were contented with the Emperor to Reign over them, and were not contented with the meek King of Glory, the Son of God to be their King; were after much like sort to the Jews scourged and intrapped for their unjust refusing, by the same way which they themselves did prefer. For as they preferred the Emperor, and rejected Christ: so the just permission of God did stir up their own Emperors against them in such sort, that both the Senators themselves were almost all devoured, and the whole City most horribly afflicted for the space almost of three hundred years together. For first the fame Tiberius, which for a great part of his Reign was a moderate and a tolerable Prince, afterward was to them a sharp and heavy Tyrant, who neither favoured his own Mother, nor spared his own Nephews, nor the Princes of the City, such as were his own Counsellors, of whom to the number of twenty he left not past two or three alive, and so cruel was he to the City, that as the story recordeth, Nullus a paene hominum ceffabat dies, no religious quidem ac sacer. Suetonius reporteth him to be so stern of nature, and tyrannical, that in time of his Reign, very many were accused, and condemned with their Wives and Children, Maids also first defloured, then put to death. In one day he recordeth twenty persons to be drawn to the place of Execution. By whom also, through the just punishment of God, Pilate, under whom Christ was crucified, was apprehended and accused at Rome, depoſed, then banished to the Town of Lions, and at length did slay himself. Neither did Herod and Caiaphas long escape, of whom more followeth hereafter. Agrippa also by him was cast into Prison, albeit afterward he was restored. In the Reign of Tiberius, the Lord Jesus the Son of God, in the four and thirtieth year of his Age, which was the seventeenth of this Emperor, by the malice of the Jews suffered his blessed Passion for the conquering of sin, death, and Satan the Prince of this World, and rose again the third day. After whose blessed Passion and Resurrection, this foresaid Tiberius Nero (otherwise called Biberius Mero) lived six years, during which time no Persecution was yet stirring in Rome against the Christians, through the Commandment of the Emperor.

Saint Paul converted.

In the Reign also of this Emperor, and the year which was the next after the Passion of our Saviour, or foreknew what more, Saint Paul was converted to the Faith. After the death of Tiberius, when he had reigned three and twenty years, succeeded C. Cæsar Caligula, Claudius Nero, and Domitius Nero: which three were likewise such Scourges to the Senate and people of Rome, that the first not only took other mens Wives violently from them, but also defloured three of his own Sisters, and afterward beheaded them. So wicked he was, that he commanded himself to be worshipped as God, and Temples to be erected in his Name, and used to sit in the Temple among the gods, requiring his Images to be set up in all Temples, and also in the Temple at Hierusalem; which caused great disturbance among the Jews, and then began the Abomination of Desolation to be set up in the holy place, spoken of in the Gospel. His cruel condition, or else displeasure was such towards the Romans, that he wished that all the people of Rome had but one Neck, that he at his pleasure might destroy such a multitude. By this said Caligula, Herod the Murtherer of John Baptist, and Condemner of Christ, was condemned to perpetual Banishment, where he died miserably. Caiaphas also, which wickedly sate upon Christ, was the same time removed from the High Priests room, and Jonathan set in his place. The raging fierceness of this Caligula incensed against the Romans had not thus ceased, had not he been cut off by the hands of a Tribune and other Gentlemen, which flew him in the fourth year of his Reign. After whose death were found in his Closet two little Libels, one called a Sword, the other the Dagger: in the which Libels were contained the Names of those Senators and Noblemen of Rome, whom he had purposed to put to death. Besides this Sword and Dagger, there was found also a Coffer, wherein divers kinds of Poison were kept in Glasses and Vessels for the purpose, to destroy a wonderful number of people, which Poisons, afterward being thrown into the Sea, destroyed a great number of Fish. *Gotfri. Ex Sifrid Viterbiensi, part. 15.

But that which this Caligula had only conceived, the same did the other Two which came after, bring to pass; Claudius Nero, who reigned thirteen years with no little cruelty; but especially the third of these Neroes, called Domitius Nero, which succeeding after Claudius, reigned fourteen years, with such fury and tyranny, that he slew the most part of the Senators, and destroyed the whole Order of Knighthood in Rome. So prodigious a Monster of nature was he, more like a Beast, yea rather a Devil than a man, that he seemed to be born to the destruction of men. Such was his monstrous Uncleanness, that he abstained not from his own Mother, his natural Sister, nor from any degree of Kindred. Such was his wretched cruelty, that he caused to be put to death his Mother, his Brother in Law, his Sister, his Wife great with child, all his Instructors, Seneca and Lucan, with divers more of his own Kindred and Consanguinity. Moreover, he commanded Rome to be set on fire in twelve places, and so continued it six days and seven nights in burning, while that he to see the example how Troy burned, sung the verses of Homer. And to avoid the Infamy thereof, he laid the fault upon the Christian-men, and caused them to be persecuted. And so continued this unfaithful Emperor in his Reign fourteen years, till at last the Senate proclaiming him a publick Enemy unto Mankind, condemned him to be drawn through the City, and to be whipped to death. For the fear whereof, he flying the hands of his Enemies, in the night fled to a Manor of his Servants in the Countrey, where he was forced to slay himself, complaining that he had then neither Friend nor Enemy left that would do so much for him. In the latter end of this Domitius Nero, Peter and Paul were put to death for the Testimony and Faith of Christ. Anno 69.

Thus ye see, which is worthy to be marked, how the just Scourge and heavy Indignation of God from time to time ever followeth there, and how all things there go to ruine, neither doth any thing well prosper, where Christ Jesus the Son of God is contemned, and not received; as by these Examples may appear, both of Romans which not only were thus consumed and plagued by their own Emperors, but also by Civil Wars, whereof three hapned in two years at Rome, after the death of Nero, and other Casualties (as in Sueton is testified) so that in the days of Tiberius aforesaid, five thousand Romans were hurt and slain at one time by the fall of a Theater. And also most especially by the destruction of the Jews, which about this same time in the year threescore and thirteen, and forty years after the Passion of Christ, and the third year after the suffering of Saint Peter and Paul, were destroyed by Titus and Vespasian his Father (who succeeded after Nero in the Empire) to the number of eleven hundred thousand, besides them which Vespasian slew in subduing the Country of Galilee: over and beside them also which were sold and sent into Egypt and other Provinces to vile slavery, to the number of seventeen thousand. Two thousand were brought with Titus in his triumph: of which, part he gave to be devoured of the wild Beasts, part otherwise most cruelly were slain. By whose case all Nations and Realms may take example, what it is to reject the Visitation of Gods verity being sent, and much more to persecute them which be sent of God for their Salvation.

The destruction of the Jews.

A note for all Realms to mark.

And as this wrathful Vengeance of God thus hath been shewed upon this rebellious people, both of the Jews and of the Romans, for their contempt of Christ, whom God so punished by their own Emperors: so neither the Emperors themselves, for persecuting Christ in his members, escaped without their just reward. For among so many Emperors which put so many Christian Martyrs to death, during the space of these first three hundred years, few or none of them scaped either not slain themselves, or not by some miserable end or other worthily revenged. First, of the poysoning of Tiberius, and of the slaughter of the other three Neroes after him, sufficiently is declared before. After Nero, Domitius Galba within seven months was slain by Otho. And so did Otho afterward slay himself, being overcome by Vitellius. And was not Vitellius shortly after drawn through the City of Rome, and after he was tormented was thrown into Tiber? Titus a good Emperor is thought to be poysoned of Domitian his Brother. The said Domitian, after he had been a Persecutor of the Christians, was slain in his Chamber, not without the con-consent of his Wife. Likewise Commodus was murdered of Narcissus. The like end was of Pertinax and Julianus. Moreover, after that Severus was slain here in England (and lieth at York) did not his Son Bassianus slay his Brother Geta, and he after slain of Martialis? Macrinus with his Son Diadumenus were both slain of their own Souldiers. After whom Heliogabalus, that monstrous bellipanch, was of his own people slain, and drawn through the City and cast into Tiber. Alexander Severus that worthy and learned Emperor, which said he would not feed his Servants doing nothing with the bowels of the Common wealth, although in life and vertues he was much unlike other Emperors, yet proved the like end, being slain at Mentz with his godly Mother Mammea, by Maximinus, whom the Emperor before of a muletor had advanced to great Dignities. The which Maximinus also after three years was slain himself of his Souldiers. What should I speak of Maximus and Balbinus in like fort both slain in Rome? Of Gordian slain by Philip: of Philip the first christened Emperor, slain, or rather martyred for the same cause: of wicked Decius drowned, and his Son slain the same time in battel: of Gallus and Volusianus his Son, Emperors after Decius, both slain by Conspiracy of Aemilianus, who rose against them both in War, and within three months after was slain himself? Next to Aemilianus succeeded Valerianus and Galienus his Son, of whom Valerianus (who was a Persecutor of the Christians) was taken Prisoner of the Persians, and there made a riding Fool of Sapores their King, who used him for a stool to leap upon his Horse, while his Son Galienus sleeping at Rome, either would not, or could not once profter to revenge his Fathers Ignominy. For after the taking of Valerian, so many Emperors rose up as were Provinces in the Roman Monarchy. At length Galienus also was killed by Aureolus which warred against him. It were too long here to speak of Aurelianus another Persecutor, slain of his Secretary; of Tacitus and Florinus his Brother, of whom the first reigned six months, and was slain at Pontus; the other reigned two months, and was murdered at Tarsis: of Probus, who although a good civil Emperor, yet was he destroyed by his Souldiers. After whom Carus the next Emperor was slain by Lightning. Next to Carus followed the impious and wicked Persecutor Diocletian, with his Fellows Maximian, Valerius, Maximinus, Maxentius, and Licinius, under whom all at one time (during the time of Diocletian) the greatest and most grievous Persecution was moved against the Christians ten years together. Of which, Diocletian and Maximian depoſed themselves from the Empire. Galerius the chiefest Minister of the Persecution, after his terrible Persecutions, fell into a wonderful Sickness, having such a Sore risen in the nether part of his belly, which confumed his Privy-members, and so did swarm with Worms, that being unable neither by Surgery nor Physick, he confessed that it happened for his cruelty towards the Christians, and so called in his Proclamations against them. Notwithstanding he not able to sustain (as some say) the stink of his Sore slew himself. Maximinus in his War, being tormented with pain in his guts there died. Maxentius was vanquished by Constantine, and drowned in Tiber. Licinius likewise, being from his Empire, and afterward slain of his Souldiers. But on the other side, after the time of Constantine, when as the Faith of Christ was received into the Imperial Seat, we read of no Emperor after the like fort destroyed or molested, except it were Julianus or Basilius (which expelled one Zeno, and was afterward expelled himself) or Valens. Beside these we read of no Emperor to come to ruine and decay, as the others before mentioned. Ex lib. hist. tripart.

And thus have we in brief sum collected out of the Chronicles the unquiet and miserable state of the Emperors of Rome, until the time of Christian Constantine, with the Examples, no less terrible than manifest, of Gods severe Justice upon them, for their contemptuous refusing and persecuting the Faith and Name of Christ their Lord.

Moreover, in much like fort and condition, if leisure of time or matter would suffer me a little to digress unto more lower times, and to come more near home, the like Examples I could also infer of this our Country of England, concerning the terrible Plagues of God against the churlish and unthankful refuling or abusing the benefit of his truth. First, we read how that God stirred up Gildas to Preach to the old Britans, and to exhort them unto Repentance and Amendment of Life, and afore to warn them of Plagues to come if they repented not: What availeth it? Gildas was laughed to Scorn, and taken for a false Prophet, and a malicious Preacher. The Britans with lusty Courages, whorish Faces, and unrepentant Hearts went forth to sin, and to offend the Lord their God. What followed? God sent in their Enemies on every side and destroyed them, and gave the Land to other Nations. Not many years past, God seeing Idolatry, Superstition, Hypocrisie, and wicked living used in this Realm, raised up that godly learned man John Wickliffe, to Preach unto our Fathers Repentance, and to exhort them to amend their lives, to forsake their Papistry and Idolatry, their Hyprocrisie and Superstition, and to walk in the fear of God. His Exhortations were not regarded, he with his Sermons was despised, his Books and he himself after his death were burnt. What followed? They flew their right King, and set up three wrong Kings on a row, under whom all the Noble blood was flain up, and half the Commons thereto, what in France, and with their own Sword in fighting among themselves for the Crown; and the Cities and Towns were decayed, and the Land brought half to a Wilderness, in respect of that it was before. O extream Plagues of Gods Vengeance! Since that time even of late years, God, once again having Pity of this Realm of England, raised up his Prophets; namely, William Tindall, Thomas Bilney, John Frith, Doctor Barnes, Jerome Garret, Anthony Person, with divers others, which both with their Writings and Sermons earnestly laboured to call us unto Repentance, that by this means the fierce Wrath of God might be turned away from us. But how were they intreated? How were their painful Labours regarded? They themselves were condemned and burnt as Hereticks, and their Books condemned and burnt as heretical. The time shall come, saith Christ, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doth God high good Service. Whether any thing fince that time hath chanced to this Realm worthy the name of a Plague, let the godly wife judge. If God hath deferred his Punishment, or forgiven us their our wicked Deeds, as I trust he hath, let us not therefore be proud, and high minded, but most humbly thank him for his tender Mercies, and beware of the like ungodly enterprises hereafter. Neither is it here any need to speak of these our lower and later times, which have been in King Henries and King Edwards days, seeing the memory thereof is yet fresh and cannot be forgotten. But let this pass, of this I am sure, that God yet once again is come on Visitation to this Church of England, yea and that more lovingly and beneficially than ever he did before. For in this Visitation he hath redressed many Abuses, and cleansed his Church of much Ungodliness and Superstition, and made it a glorious Church, if it be compared to the old form and state. And now how grateful Receivers we be, with what heart, study, and reverence we embrace that which he hath given, that I refer either to them that tak our Fruits, or to the Sequel, which peradventure will declare it. But this by the way of digression. Now to regress again to the state of the first former times. It remaineth, that as I have set forth the Justice of God upon these Roman Persecutors: so now we declare their Persecutions raised up against the People and Servants of Christ, within the space of three hundred years after Christ. Which Persecutions in number commonly are counted to be Ten, besides their Persecutions first moved by the Jews in Hierusalem and other places against the Apostles. In the which, first Saint Stephen the Deacon was put to death, with divers others more, in the same rage of time either slain or cast into Prison. At the doing whereof, Saul, at the same time played the doughty Pharisee, being not yet converted to the Faith of Christ, whereof the History is plain in the Acts of the Apostles set forth at large by S. Luke.

how that not long after the stoning of Stephen, King Herod stretched forth his hand, to take and afflict certain of the Congregation: among whom James was one, whom he slew with the Sword, &c. Of this James, Eusebius also inferreth mention, alledging Clement, thus writing a memorable story of him. This James (saith Clement) when he was brought to the Tribunal Seat, he that brought him (and was the cause of his trouble) seeing him to be condemned, and that he should suffer death: as he went to the Execution, he being moved therewith in Heart and Conscience, confessed himself also of his own accord to be a Christian. And so were they led forth together, where in the way he desired of James to forgive him that he had done. After that James had a little paused with himself upon the matter, turning to him; Peace (saith he) be to thee Brother, and kissed him; and both were beheaded together, in the year of our Lord thirty and six.

Hist. Eccle. lib. 2. cap. 9. ex Clemente Alexandrino Hypotyposeon.

A notable conversion of a wicked Actor: and after a Martyr.

Dorotheus in his Book named Synopsis, testifieth, that Nicanor one of the seven Deacons, with two thousand others, which believed in Christ, suffered also the same day, when as Stephen did suffer.

Nicanor one of the seven Deacons, with two thousand others martyred.

The said Dorotheus witnesseth also, that Simon, another of the Deacons, Bishop afterward of Bostrum in Arabia, was there burned. Parmenas also another of the Deacons suffered.

Ex Dorotheo in Synops. Simon a Deacon martyred.

S. Thomas the Apostle suffered.

Thomas preached to the Parthians, Medes and Persians, also to the Germans, Hiracanies, Bactries, and Magies. He suffered in Calamina, a City of Juda, being slain with a Dart.

Simon Zelotes cruelfied.

Simon Zelotes preached at Mauritania, and in the Country of Africk, and in Britannia; he was likewise crucified.

Thaddeus the Apostle slain.

Judas Brother of James, called also Thaddeus, and Lebbeus, preached to the Edessens, and to all Mesopotamia: he was slain under Augarus, King of the Edessens in Berito.

Simon Cananeus crucified.

Simon called Cananeus, which was Brother to Jude above mentioned, and to James the younger, which all were the Sons of Mary Cleophas, and of Alpheus, was Bishop of Hierusalem after James, and was crucified in a City of Egypt in the time of Trajanus the Emperor, as Dorotheus recordeth. But Abdias writeth, that he with his Brother Jude were both slain by a tumult of the people in Suanir a City of Parthidis.

Mark the Evangelist buried.

Mark the Evangelist, and first Bishop of Alexandria, preached the Gospel in Egypt, and there, drawn with ropes unto the fire, was burned, and afterward buried in a place called there Bucolus, under the Reign of Trajanus the Emperor.

Bartholomew the Apostle crucified and beheaded.

Ex Joan. de mirabilibus regalii.

Bartholomeus is said also to Preach to the Indians, and to have converted the Gospel of Saint Matthew into their Tongue, where he continued a great space, doing many Miracles. At last in Albania a City of greater Armenia, after divers Persecutions, he was beaten down with staves, then crucified, and after being excoriate, he was at length beheaded. John de mirabilibus regalii.

Andrew the Apostle crucified for the Gospel.

Ex Hieronymo in Catalogo Script. Eccles. Ex Cyprianus lib. de duplici martyrio, ex Bernardo sermo. 2. de festo S. Andreæ.

Of Andrew the Apostle and Brother to Peter thus writeth Hierome in his Book De Catalogo Scriptorum Ecclesiæ. Andrew the Brother of Peter (in the time and Reign of Vespasianus, as our Ancestors have reported) did Preach in the fourscore year of our Lord Jesus Christ to the Scythians, Sogdians, to the Saxons, and in a City which is called Angustia, where the Ethiopians do now inhabit. He was buried in Patris a City of Achaia, being crucified of Egeas the Governor of the Edessians. Hereto writeth Hierome, although in the number of years he seemeth a little to miss: for Vespasianus reached not to the fourscore year after Christ. But Bernard in his second Sermon, and Saint Cyprian in his Book De duplici Martyrio, do make mention of the Confession and Martyrdom of this blessed Apostle; whereof partly out of these, partly out of other credible Writers we have collected after this manner: that, When as Andrew being Conversant in a City of Achaia called Patris, through his diligent Preaching had brought many to the Faith of Christ: Egeas the Governor knowing this, resorted thither, to the intent he might constrain as many as did believe Christ to be God, by the whole consent of the Senate, to do sacrifice unto the Idols, and so give divine honour unto them. Andrew thinking good at the beginning to resist the wicked counsel, and the doings of Egeas, went unto him, saying to this effect unto him; that, It behoved him which was Judge of men, first to know his Judge which dwelleth in Heaven, and then to worship him being known, and so in worshipping the true God, to revoke his mind from false gods and blind Idols. These words spake Andrew to the Consul.

The words of Andrew to the Consul.

But he greatly therewith discontented, demanded of him, Whether he was the same Andrew that did overthrow the Temple of the gods, and persuaded men of that Superstitious Sect, which the Romans of late had commanded to be abolished and rejected. Andrew did plainly affirm, That the Princes of the Romans did not understand the Truth, and that the Son of God, coming from Heaven into the World for mans sake, hath taught and declared how these Idols, whom they so honoured as gods, were not only not gods, but also most cruel Devils, Enemies to Mankind, teaching the people nothing else but that wherewith God is offended, and being offended, turneth away and regardeth them not; and so by the wicked service of the Devil, they do fall headlong into all wickedness, and after their departing, nothing remaineth unto them, but their evil deeds.

The fervency of Andrew against Idolatry.

But the Proconsul esteeming these things to be as vain, especially seeing the Jews (as he said) had crucified Christ before, therefore charged and commanded Andrew not to Teach and Preach such things any more: or if he did, that he should be fastened to the Cross with all speed.

Andrew abiding in his former mind very constant, answered thus concerning the punishment which he threatened, He would not have preached the honour and glory of the Cross, if he had feared the death of the Cross. Whereupon Sentence of Condemnation was pronounced, that Andrew teaching and enterprising a new Sect, and taking away the Religion of their gods, ought to be crucified. Andrew coming to the place, and seeing a fit off the Cross prepared, did change neither countenance nor colour, as the imbecillity of mortal men is wont to do, neither did his blood shrink, neither did he fail in his speech, his body fainted not, neither was his mind molested, his understanding did not fail him, as it is the manner of men to do, but out of the abundance of his heart his mouth did speak, and fervent Charity did appear in his words as kindled sparks; he said, O Cross, most welcome and long looked for; with a willing mind joyfully and desirously I come to thee, being the Scholar of him which did hang on thee: because I have been always thy lover, and have coveted to embrace thee. So being crucified, he yielded up the ghost and fell on sleep, the day before the Kalends of December.

The constant faith of Andrew to the end.

The Cross here meant taken for the material Cross of wood, but for the manner of death upon the Cross, which Andrew was to undergo. S. Matthew the Apostle slain with a Spear.

Matthew, otherwise named Levi, first of a Publican made an Apostle, wrote his Gospel to the Jews in the Hebrew Tongue, as recordeth Eusebius, lib. 3. cap. 24. 39. lib. 5. cap. 8. cap. 10. Also Irenæus, lib. 3. cap. 1. Item Hieronymus in Catalogo Script. Ecclesiast. Concerning the doings and decreements of this blessed Apostle and Evangelist, divers things be recorded by Julius Africanus, under the pretenced name of Abdias; also of Vincentius, Perionius, and others, but in such sort, as by the contents may greatly be suspected, the matter not to lack some crafty forgery, for the more establishment of later decretals, and Romish Doctrine, as touching Merits, consecration of Nunns, the superstitious prescription of Lent-fast, not only in abstaining from all flesh meats, but also from all Matrimonial Copulation between man and wife, during the said time of holy Lent. Item, the strict Prohibition not to taste any bodily sustenance, before receiving of the Lords Supper. In ordaining of Mass, and that no Nunn must marry after the Vow of her Profession, with such other like.

Matthias the Apostle stoned and beheaded.

Joan. de Monte Regali, testifieth of Matthias, after he had preached to the Jews, at length he was stoned and beheaded. Some others record that he died in Ethiopia.

Philippus the Apostle crucified.

Philippus the holy Apostle, after he had much laboured among the barbarous Nations in preaching the Word of Salvation to them, at length he suffered as the other Apostles did, in Hierapolis a City of Phrygia, being there crucified and stoned to death, where also he was buried, and his Daughters also with him.

Of James the Brother of the Lord, thus we read in the story of Clement and Egesippus.

James Bishop of Jerusalem.

AFter that Festus had sent the Apostle Paul to Rome after his Appellation made at Cesarea, and that the Jews by the means thereof had loft their hope of performing their malicious Vow againft him conceived, they fell upon James the Brother of our Lord, who was Bifhop at Jerufalem, againft whom they being bent with like malice, brought him forth before them, and required him to deny before all the people the Faith of Chrift. But he, otherwife than they all looked for, freely and with a greater conftancy before all the multitude confeffed Jefus to be the Son of God, our Saviour, and our Lord. Whereupon, they not being able to abide the teftimony of this man any longer, becaufe he was thought to be the juftefl among them all, for the highneft of Divine Wifdom and Godlineft, which in living he declared; they killed him, finding the more opportunity to accomplifh their mifchief, becaufe the Kingdom the fame time was vacant. For Feftus being dead in Jewry, the Adminiftration of that Province was deftitute of a Ruler, and a Deputy. But after what manner James was killed, the words of Clement do declare, which writeth that he was caft down from the Pinacle of the Temple, and being fmitten with the Inftrument of a Fuller, was flain: but Egefippus, which lived in the time next after the Apoftles, defcribeth the caufe diligently in his fifth Commentary, after this manner as followeth:

Ex Clemente. Ex Egesippo in Commentariis.

James the Brother of our Lord took in hand to govern the Church after the Apoftles, being counted of all men from the time of our Lord to be a juft and perfect man. Many and divers other James there were befide him, but this was born holy from his mothers Womb, he drunk no Wine nor any ftrong Drink, neither did he eat any living Creature, the Razor never came upon his head, he was not anointed with Oil, neither did he ufe Bath, to him only was it lawful to enter into the holy place, neither was he clothed with woollen Cloth, but with Silk, and he only entred into the Temple, falling upon his Knees, asking remiffion for the people, fo that his Knees by oft kneeling loft the fenfe of feeling, bing benummed and hardened like the knees of a Camel. He was (for worfhipping God, and craving forgivenefs for the people,) called juft, and for the excellency of his juft life named Obliar, which (if you do interpret it) is the fafeguard and juftice of the people, as the Prophets declare of him: therefore when as many of the Hereticks which were among the people asked him what manner of door Jefus fhould be, he anfwered, That he was the Saviour. Whereof fome do believe him to be Jefus Chrift; but the aforefaid Hereticks neither believe the Refurrection, neither that any fhall come, which fhall render unto every man according to his works, but as many as believe, they believed for James his caufe. Whereas many therefore of the Princes did believe, there was a tumult made of the Scribes, Jews, and Pharifees, faying, It is dangerous left that all the people do look for this Jefus, as for Chrift. Therefore they gathered themfelves together, and faid to James, We befeech thee reftrain the people, for they believe in Jefus, as though he were Chrift; we pray thee perfwade them all which come unto the Feaft of the Paffover of Jefus; for we are all obedient unto thee, and all the people do teftifie of thee that thou art juft, neither that thou doeft accept the perfon of any man; therefore perfwade the people that they be not deceived in Jefus, and all the people and we will obey thee: therefore ftand upon the Pillar of the Temple, that thou mayeft be feen from above, and that thy words may be perceived of all the people, for to this Paffover all the Tribes do come with all the Country. And thus the forenamed Scribes and Pharifees did fet James upon the Battlements of the Church, and they cried unto him and faid, Thou juft man, whom all we ought to obey, becaufe this people is led after Jefus, which is crucified, tell what is the door of Jefus crucified. And he anfwered with a great voice, What do you ask me of Jefus the Son of Man, feeing that he fitteth on the right hand of God in Heaven, and fhall come in the Clouds of the Sky? But when many were perfwaded of this, they glorified God upon the witnefs of James, and faid, Ofanna in the higheft to the Son of David. Then the Scribes and the Pharifees faid among themfelves, We have done evil, that we have caufed fuch a Teftimony of Jefus, but let us go up, and let us take him, that they, being compelled with fear, may deny that Faith. And they cried out, faying, O, O, this juft man alfo is feduced; and they fulfilled that Scripture which is fpoken of in Efay, Let us take away the juft man, becaufe he is not profitable for us, wherefore let them eat the fruits of their works. Therefore they went up to throw down the juft man, and faid among themfelves, Let us ftone thus juft man: James and they took him to ftrike him with ftones, for he was not yet dead when he was caft down. But he turning, fell down upon his knees, faying, O Lord God, Father, I befeech thee to forgive them, for they know not what they do.

Apoc. 14.

Efay 3.

But when they had fmitten him with ftones, one of the Priefts of the Children of Rechas, the Son of Charobins, fpake to them the teftimony which is in Jeremy the Prophet, Leave off, what do ye? The juft man prayeth for you. And one of thofe which were preient took a Fullers Inftrument, wherewith they did ufe to beat and purge Cloth, and fmote the juft man on his head, and fo he finifhed his Martyrdom, and they buried him in the fame place, and his Pillar abideth ftill by the Temple. He was a true teftimony to the Jews and the Gentiles. And fhortly after, Vefpafianus the Emperor deftroying the Land of Jewry, brought them into Captivity. Thefe things being thus written at large of Egefippus, do well agree to thofe which Clement did write of him. This James was fo notable a man, that for his juftice he was had in honour of all men, infomuch that the wife men of the Jews, fhortly after his Martyrdom, did impute the caufe of the befieging of Jerufalem, and other Calamities which happed unto them, to no other caufe, but unto the violence and injury done to this man. Alfo Jofephus hath not left this out of his hiftory, where he fpeaketh of him after this manner: Thefe things fo chanced unto the Jews for a vengeance, becaufe of that juft man James, which was the Brother of Jefus, whom they called Chrift, for the Jews killed him, although he was a righteous man.

Luk. 23.

Joseph. lib. 20.

The fame Jofephus declareth his death in the fame Book and Chapter, faying, Cæfar hearing of the death of Feftus, fent Albinus the Lieutenant into Jewry: but Ananus the younger being Bifhop, and of the Sect of the Sadducees, trufting that he had obtained a convenient time, feeing that Feftus was dead, and Albinus entred on his journey, he called a Council, and calling many unto him, among whom was James, by name the Brother of Jefus which is called Chrift, he ftoned them, accufing them as Breakers of the Law.

Whereby it appeareth, that many other befides James alfo at the fame were martyred and put to death among the Jews, for the Faith of Chrift. Martyrs.

A Defcription of the ten firft Perfecutions in the Primitive Church, with a lively Portraiture of the variety of their Tormients.

The ten firft Perfecutions in the Primitive Church.

THefe things being thus declared for the Martyrdom of the Apoftles, and the Perfecution of the Jews: now let us (by the Grace of Chrift our Lord) comprehend with like brevity, the Perfecutions raifed by the Romans againft the Chriftians in the Primitive Age of the Church during the fpace of three hundred years, till the coming of godly Conftantine, which Perfecutions are reckoned of Eufebius, and by the moft part of Writers, to the number of ten moft fpecial.

The ftudiey torments of the holy Martyrs in the Primitive Church.

Wherein marvellous it is to fee and read the numbers incredible of Chriftian Innocents that were flain and tormented, fome one way, fome another, as Rohanus faith, and faith truly, Alii ferro perempti: Alii flammis exuffi; alii flagris verberati, Alii uectibus perforati, Alii cruciati patibulo; Alii demerfi pelagi periculo; Alii vivi decoriati; Alii vinculis mancipati; Alii linguis privati; Alii lapidibus obruti; Alii frigore afflicti; Alii fame cruciati; Alii truncatis manibus, aliique cæfis membris, fpectaculum contumeliæ mdi propter nomen Domini portantes, &c. that is, Some flain with Sword; Some burnt with fire; Some with Whips fcourged; Some ftabbed with Forks of Iron; Some falfued to the Crofs or Gibbet; Some drowned in the Sea; Some their Skins pluckt off; Some their Tongues cut off; Some stoned to death; Some killed with cold; Some starved with hunger; Some their hands cut off, or otherwise dismembred, have been so left naked to the open shame of the world, &c. Whereof Augustine also in his Book De civit. 22. cap. 6. thus saith, Ligabantur, includebantur, cædebantur, torquebantur, urebantur, laniabantur, trucidabantur, multiplicabantur, non pugnantes pro salute, sed salutem contemnentes pro servatore. Whose kinds of Punishments, although they were divers, yet the manner of constancy in all these Martyrs was one. And yet notwithstanding the sharpness of these so many and sundry Torments, and like cruelness of the Tormentors, yet such was the number of these constant Saints that suffered, or rather such was the power of the Lord in his Saints, that as Hieromе in his Epistle to Cromatius and Heliodorus, saith, Nullus esset dies qui non ultra quinque millium numerum martyrum reperiri posset ascriptus, excepto die calendarum Januarii; that is, There is no day in the whole year, unto which the number of five thousand Martyrs cannot be ascribed, except only the first day of January.

The first Persecution.

1. The first Persecution. { Anno 67. }

THe first of these ten Persecutions was stirred up by Nero Domitius, the sixth Emperor before mentioned, about the year of our Lord threescore and seven. The tyrannous Rage of which Emperor was so fierce against the Christians (as Eusebius recordeth) Usque adeo ut videres repletas humanis corporibus civitates, jacentes mortuos simul cum parvulis senes, fœminarumque absque ulla sexus reverentia nudata in publico rejectaque stavent cadaverа; that is, Insomuch that a man might then see Cities lie full of mens bodies, the old there lying together with the young, and the dead bodies of women cast out naked, without all reverence of that Sex in the open streets, &c. Likewise Orosius writing of the said Nero, saith, That he was the first which in Rome did raise up Persecution against the Christians, and not only in Rome, but also through all the Provinces thereof, thinking to abolish and to destroy the whole name of Christians in all places, &c. Whereunto accordeth moreover the testimony of Hieromе upon Daniel, saying, That many there were of the Christians in those days, which seeing the filthy Abominations and intolerable Cruelty of Nero, thought that he should be Antichrist.

Eusebius lib. 2. cap. 24, 25, 26.

Orosius lib. 7.

Nero thought to be Antichrist.

In this Persecution, among many other Saints, the blessed Apostle Peter was condemned to death, and crucified, as some do write, at Rome; albeit other some, and not without cause, do doubt thereof: concerning whose life and history, because it is sufficiently described in the Text of the Gospel, and in the Acts of Saint Luke 4. 5. 12. I need not here to make any great repetition thereof. As touching the cause and manner of his death, divers there be which make relation, as Hieromе, Egesippus, Eusebius, Abdias, and others, although they do not all precisely agree in the time. The words of Hieromе be these, Simon Peter the Son of Jona, of the Province of Galilee, and of the Town of Bethsaida, the Brother of Andrew, &c. After he had been Bishop of the Church of Antioch, and had preached to the dispersion of them that believed, of the Circumcision, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithinia, in the second year of Claudius the Emperor (which was about the year of our Lord forty and four) came to Rome to withstand Simon Magus, and there kept the Priestly Chair the space of five and twenty years, until the last year of the aforesaid Nero, which was the fourteenth year of his Reign, of whom he was crucified, his Head being down, and his Feet upward, himself so requiring, because he was (he said) unworthy to be crucified after the same form and manner as the Lord was, &c. Egesippus prosecuting this matter something more at large, and Abdias also (if any authority is to be given to his Book, who following not only the sense, but also the very form of words of Egesippus in this History, seemeth to be extracted out of him, and of other Authors) saith, That Simon Magus being then a great man with Nero, and his President and Keeper of his life, was required upon a time to be present at the raising up of a certain Noble young man in Rome of Nero's kindred lately departed: whereas Peter also was desired to come to the reviving of the said Personage. But when Magus in the presence of Peter could not do it, then Peter calling upon the Name of the Lord Jesus, did raise him up, and restored him to his Mother, whereby the estimation of Simon Magus began greatly to decay and to be detested in Rome. Not long after the said Magus threatned the Romans that he would leave the City, and in their sight fly away from them into Heaven. So the day being appointed, Magus taking his wings in the Mount Capitolinus, began to fly in the Air: but Peter by the Power of the Lord Jesus brought him down with his wings headlong to the ground, by the which fall, his legs and joynts were broken, and he thereupon died. Then Nero, sorrowing for the death of him, fought matter against Peter to put him to death. Which, when the people perceived, they intreated Peter with much ado that he would fly the City. Peter, through their importunity at length persuaded, prepared himself to avoid. But coming to the Gate, he saw the Lord Christ come to meet him, to whom he worshipping, said, Lord, Whither dost thou go? To whom he answered and said, I am come again to be crucified. By this Peter perceiving his suffering to be understood, returned back into the City again, and so was he crucified in manner as is before declared. And this out of Egesippus.

Egesippus lib. 3. de excidio Hierosol. cap. 2. Abdias lib. 1. de vita patri.

Eusebius moveover writing of the death not only of Peter, but also of his Wife, affirmeth, that Peter seeing his wife going to her Martyrdom (belike as he was yet hanging upon the Cross) was greatly joyous and glad thereof, who crying unto her with a loud voice, and calling her by her name, Bad her remember the Lord Jesus. Such was then (saith Eusebius) the blessed bond of marriage among the Saints of God. And thus much of Peter.

Euseb. lib. 2. hist. Eccles. cap. 30.

Peter's Wife put to death for Christ.

The words of Peter to his wife going to death.

Paul the Apostle, before was called Saul, after his great travel and unspeakable Labours in promoting the Gospel of Christ, suffered also in this first Persecution under Nero, and was beheaded. Of whom thus writeth Hieromе in his Book, De viris illustribus. Paul, otherwise called Saul, one of the Apostles, yet out of the number of the twelve, was of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of a Town of Jewry called Giscalis, which Town being taken of the Romans, he with his Parents, fled to Tharsus, a Town of Cilicia; afterward was sent up by his Parents to Jerusalem, and there brought up in the knowledge of the Law, at the feet of Gamaliel, and was a doer of the death of Stephen. And when he had received Letters from the High Priest to persecute the Christians, by the way going to Damascus, he was stricken down of the Lords Glory, and of a Persecutor was made a Professor, an Apostle, a Martyr, a witness of the Gospel, and a Vessel of Election.

Eu. Hieron. in lib. de viris illustribus.

Saul brought up under Gamaliel.

Saul a Persecutor.

Saul converted.

Among his other manifold Labours and travels in spreading the Doctrine of Christ, he won Sergius Paulus the Proconsul of Cyprus, to the Faith of Christ, whereupon he took his name, as some suppose, turned from Saulus to Paulus. After he had passed through divers places and Countries in his laborious Peregrinations, he took to him Barnabas, and went up to Jerusalem to Peter, James and John, where he was Ordained and sent out with Barnabas to Preach unto the Gentiles.

Saulus turned to Paulus.

Paul sent to the Gentiles.

And because it is in the Acts of the Apostles sufficiently comprehended, concerning the admirable Conversion, and Conversation of this most worthy Apostle, that which remaineth of the rest of his History, I will here add, how the said Apostle Paul, the five and twentieth year after the Passion of the Lord, in the second year of Nero, at what time Festus ruled in Jewry, was sent up in bonds to Rome, where he remaining in his free Hostery two years together, disputed daily against the Jews, proving Christ to be come. And here is to be noted, that after his first Answer, or Purgation there made at Rome, the Emperor Nero, not yet fully confirmed in his Empire, and yet not burthing out into those mischiefs which Histories report of him, he was at that time by Nero discharged, and dismissed to Preach the Gospel in the West parts, and about the Coasts of Italy, as he himself writing unto Timothy, afterward in his second Apprehension, in his second Epistle witnesseth, saying, In my first Purgation no man stood with me, but did all forsake me, the Lord lay it not to their Charge: but the Lord stood with me, and did comfort me, that the preaching of his Word might proceed by me, and that all the Gentiles might hear and be taught; and I was delivered vered out of the Lions mouth, &c. In which place by the Lion, he plainly meaneth Nero. And afterwards likewise he saith, I was delivered from the mouth of the Lion, &c. And again, The Lord hath delivered me out from all evil works, and hath saved me unto his heavenly Kingdom, &c. Speaking this, because he perceived then the time of his Martyrdom to be near at hand. For in the same Epistle before, he saith, I am now offered up, and the time of my dissolution draweth on.

Thus then, this worthy Preacher and Messenger of the Lord, in the fourteenth year of Nero, and the same day in which Peter was crucified (although not in the same year, as some write, but in the next year following) was beheaded at Rome for the testimony of Christ, and was buried in the way of Ostia, the seven and thirtieth year after the Passion of the Lord. He wrote nine Epistles to seven Churches, to the Romans one, to the Corinthians two, to the Galathians one, to the Ephesians one, to the Philippians one, to the Colossians one, to the Thessalonians two. Moreover he wrote to his Disciples, to Timothy two, to Titus one, to Philemon one.

The Epistles of S. Paul to seven Churches.

The Epistle to the Hebrews.

The Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews is thought to be written of Timothy, as Tertullian supposeth, or of S. Luke, as others think; or else of Clement afterward Bishop of Rome, who, as they say, was adjoyned with Paul, and compiling together his sayings and sentences, did phrase them in his stile and manner. Or else as some do judge, because S. Paul wrote unto the Hebrews, for the odiousness of his name among that people, therefore he dissembled, and confessed not his name in the first entry of his salutation, contrary to his accustomed condition. And as he wrote to the Hebrews, he being an Hebrew, so he wrote in Hebrew; that is, his own Tongue more eloquently. And that is thought to be the cause why it differeth from his other Epistles, and is after a more eloquent manner translated into the Greek, than his other Epistles be. Some also read the Epistle written to Laodicea, but that is exploded of all men. Thus much Hieromе.

The Epistle to the Laodiceans.

Abdias de vitis lib. 2.

As touching the time and order of the death and Martyrdom of Saint Paul, as Eusebius, Hieromе, Maximus, and other Authors do but briefly pass it over: so Abdias (if his Book be of any substantial authority) speaking more largely of the same, doth say, That after the crucifying of Peter, and the ruine of Simon Magus, Paul yet remaining in free Custody, was dismissed and delivered at that time from Martyrdom by Gods permission, that all the Gentiles might be replenished with preaching of the Gospel by him.

Paul declareth his Doctrine to the Emperor.

The sum of Paul's Doctrine.

And the same Abdias proceeding in his story, declareth moreover, that as Paul was thus occupied at Rome, he was accused to the Emperor, not only for teaching new Doctrine, but also for stirring up Sedition against the Empire. For this he being called before Nero, and demanded to shew the order and manner of his Doctrine, there declared what his Doctrine was, To teach all men Peace and Charity, how to love one another, how to prevent one another in honour; Rich men not to be puffed up in pride, nor to put their truft in their treasures, but in the living God; Men to be contented with food and rayment, and with their present state; Poor men to rejoyce in their poverty with hope; Fathers to bring up their Children in the fear of God; Children to obey their Parents; Husbands to love their Wives; Wives to be subject to their Husbands; Citizens and Subjects to give their Tribute unto Cæsar, and to be subject to their Magistrates; Masters to be courteous, not churlish to their Servants; Servants to deal faithfully with their Masters: and this to be the sum of his teaching. Which his Doctrine he received not of men, nor by men, but by Jesus Christ, and the Father of Glory, which spake to him from Heaven, the Lord Jesus saying to him, That he should go and preach his Name, and that he would be with him, and would be the Spirit of life to all that believed in him, and that whatsoever he did or said, he would justifie it, &c. After that Paul had thus declared unto the Emperor, shortly after, sentence of death was pronounced against him, that he should be beheaded. Unto whose Execution then Nero sent two of his Esquires, Ferega and Parthemius, to bring him word of his death. They coming to Paul, instructing then the people, desired him to pray for them, that they might believe. Who told them, that shortly after they should believe, and be baptized at his Sepulchre (as Abdias writeth.) This done, the Souldiers came and led him out of the City to the place of Execution, where he, after his prayers made, gave his Neck to the Sword. Abdias reporteth, that as his head was stricken off, instead of blood issued out white Milk, and that at laying down his head, he signed himself with the sign of a Cross in his Forehead: but this being found in no other History, Abdias seemeth either to add of his own, or else to borrow out of the Legend, as he doth many other things beside, whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) hereafter. Although the same miracle of Milk flowing out of his neck, is referred also unto Ambrose, who in his Sermon threescore and eight (if it be not counterfeited) seemeth to affirm the same. Of the time and year when the blessed Apostles did suffer, Histories do not all agree. They that follow the common opinion, and the Popes decrees, say, That both Peter and Paul suffered both in one day, and in one year: which opinion seemeth to be taken out of Dionysius Bishop of Corinth. Hieromе in his Book De viris illustr. affirmeth, that they both suffered in one day, but he expresseth not the year. So doth Isidorus and Eusebius. Simon Metaphrastes bringeth in the opinion of some, which think that Paul suffered not with Peter, but after Peter, Prudentius, in his Periſtephano, noteth, that they both were put to death upon the same day, but not in the same year, and saith, that Paul followed Peter a year after.

A legend miracle.

The story of Abdias suspected.

Histories did vary about the time of their Martyrdom.

If this be true Prudentius recordeth of Paul to suffer and be beheaded after Peter, then it is false which Hieromе hath before testified, Peter to have suffered the last year of Nero.

Abdias, above mentioned, recordeth, that Paul suffered two years after Peter. Moreover, if it be true which Abdias saith, that after the crucifying of Peter, Paul remained in his fair Custody at Rome, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, which was as Hieromе witnesseth, the third or fourth year of Nero, then must it be ten years betwixt the Martyrdom of Peter and of Paul, forasmuch as it is by all Writers confessed, that Paul suffered the fourteenth year, which was the last year of Nero. And so Abdias seemeth neither to agree with other Authors, nor with himself. And thus much of the first Persecution.

The second Persecution.

THe first Romen Persecution beginning under Nero, as is aforesaid, ceased under Vespasianus, who gave some rest to the poor Christians. After whose Reign was moved, not long after, the second Persecution, by the Emperor Domitian, Brother of Titus. Of whom Eusebius and Orosius so write, that he first beginning mildly, afterward did so far outrage in Pride intolerable, that he commanded himself to be worshipped as God, and that Images of Gold and Silver in his honour should be set up in Capitolio. The chiefest Nobles of the Senators, either upon envy, or for their Goods, he caused to be put to death, some openly, and some he sent into banishment, there causing them to be slain privily.

The second Persecution Anno 93.

Eu. Orosius lib. 7.

The tyranny and intemperance of Domitian

And as his Tyranny was unmeasurable, so the intemperancy of his life was no less. He put to death all the Nephews of Juda, called the Lords Brother, and caused to be fought out and to be slain all that could be found of the stock of David (as Vespasian also did before him) for fear, left he were yet to come of the House of David, which should enjoy the Kingdom. In the time of this Persecution, Simeon, Bishop of Jerusalem, after other torments, was crucified to death, whom Justus afterward succeeded in that Bishoprick.

Simeon Bishop of Jerusalem crucified.

In this Persecution, John the Apostle and Evangelist, was exiled by the said Domitianus into Pathmos. Of whom divers and sundry memorable Acts be reported in sundry Chronicles. As first, how he was put in a Vessel of boyling Oil, by the Proconsul of Ephesus. The Legend and Peristnius say, It was done at Rome. Isidorus also writing of him, and comprehending many things in few words, declareth, that he turned certain places of wood into gold, and stones by the Sea side into margarites, to satisfie the desire of two, whom he had before perswaded to renounce their riches: and afterward they repenting that for worldly treasure they had lost Heaven, for their sakes again he changed the same into their former substance. Also how he raised up a Widow and a certain young man from death to life. How he drank poyson and it hurt him not, raising also to life two which had drank the same before. These and such other Miracles, although they may be true, and are found in Isidorus, and other Writers more, yet because they are no

John the Evangelist.

Isidorus de nativitate nostri testamenti lib.

Eusebius lib. 3. cap. 20. Hieron. de scriptor. Eccles.

{ Anno 97. } John banished. Pato released out of banishment.

Articles of our Christian Belief, I let them pass, and only content my self with that which I read in Eusebius, declaring of him in this wise, That in the fourteenth year after Nero, in the second Persecution, in the days of Domitian, John was banished into Pathmos for the testimony of the Word, in the year fourscore and seventeen. And after the death of the aforesaid Domitian, he being slain, and his Acts repealed by the Senate, John was again released under Pertinax the Emperor, and came to Ephesus in the year one hundred. Where he continued until the time of Trajanus, and there governed the Churches in Asia, where also he wrote his Gospel, and so lived till the year after the Passion of our Lord, threescore and eight, which was the year of his age, one hundred and twenty.

Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 23.

Moreover, in the aforesaid Ecclesiastical story of Eusebius, we read, that John the Apostle and Evangelist, whom the Lord did love, was in Asia, where he being returned out of Pathmos, after the death of Domitian, governed the Churches and Congregations.

Iren. lib. 2.

Irenæus in his second Book thus writeth: And of him all the Elders do witness, which were with John the Disciple of the Lord in Asia, that he spake and wrote these things, &c. for there he continued with them unto the time of Trajanus, &c. Also the said Irenæus, lib. 3. Hypothes. in like words declareth, saying, The Church of the Ephesians being first founded by Paul, afterward being confirmed of John (who continued in the same City unto the time of Trajanus the Emperor) is a true witness of this Apostolical tradition, &c.

Clemens Alexandrinus.

Clemens Alexandrinus moreover noteth both the time of this holy Apostle, and also addeth to the same a certain History of him, not unworthy to be remembred of such which delight in things honest and profitable. Of the which History Sozomenus also in his Commentaries maketh mention. The words of the Author setting forth this History be these, Hear a Fable, and not a Fable, but a true Report, which is told us of John the Apostle, delivered and commended to our remembrance. After the death of the Tyrant, when John was returned to Ephesus, from the Ile of Pathmos, he was desired to resort to the places bordering near unto him, partly to constitute Bishops, partly to dispose the causes and matters of the Church, partly to Ordain and set such of the Clergy in Office, whom the Holy Ghost should elect. Whereupon, when he was come to a certain City not far off, the name of which also many do yet remember, and had among other things comforted the Brethren, he looking more earnestly upon him which was the chief Bishop among them, beheld a young man mighty in body, and of beautiful countenance, and of a fervent mind: I commend this man (saith he) to thee with great diligence, in witness here of Christ and of the Church.

A notable History of John the Evangelist.

When the Bishop had received of him this Charge, and had promised his faithful diligence therein: again, the second time John spake unto him, and desired him in like manner and countenation as before. This done, John returned again to Ephesus. The Bishop receiving the young man, commended and committed to his charge, brought him home, kept him, and nourished him, and at length also did illuminate (that is) he baptized him, and in short time through his diligence brought him into such order and towardness, that he committed unto him the oversight of a certain Cure in the Lords behalf. The young man thus having more his liberty, it chanced that certain of his Companions and old Familiars being idle, dissolute and accustomed of old time to wickedness, did joyn in company with him, who first brought him to sumptuous and riotous Banquets; then incited him forth with them in the night to rob and steal, after that he was allured by them unto greater mischief and wickedness. Wherein by custom of time, by little and little, he being more practised, and being of a good wit, and a flout courage, like unto a wild or unbroken Horse, leaving the right way, and running at large without bridle, was carried headlong to the profundity of all misorder and outrage. And thus, being past all hope of Grace, utterly forgetting and rejecting the wholesome Doctrine of Salvation, which he had learned before, began to set his mind upon no small matters. And for as much as he was entred so far in the way of perdition, he cared not how further he proceeded in the same. And so associating unto him the company of his Companions, and fellow Thieves, took upon him to be as Head and Captain among them, in committing all kind of Murder and Felony.

What wicked company doth.

In the mean time it chanced that of necessity John was sent for to those quarters again, and came. The causes being decided, and his business ended for the which he came, by the way meeting with the Bishop afore specified, he requireth of him the pledge, which in the witness of Christ and of the Congregation then present he left in his hands to keep. The Bishop something amazed at the words of John, supposing he had meant of some money committed to his custody, which he had not received, (and yet durst not mistrust John, nor contrary his words) could not tell what to answer. Then John perceiving his doubting, and uttering his mind more plainly: The young man (saith he) and the Soul of our Brother committed to your custody, I do require. Then the Bishop with a loud voice sorrowing and weeping said, He is dead. To whom John said, How, and by what death? The other said, He is dead to God, for he is become an evil man, and pernitious, to be brief, a Thief: and now he doth frequent this Mountain with a company of Villains and Thieves like unto himself against the Church. But the Apostle rent his Garments, and with a great lamentation said, I have left a good keeper of my Brothers soul; get me a Horse, and let me have a Guid with me; which being done, his Horse and Man procured, he hasted from the Church as much as he could, and coming to the same place was taken of Thieves that watched. But he, neither flying nor refusing, said, I came for this same cause hither, lead me, said he, to your Captain. So he being brought, the Captain all armed, fiercely began to look upon him; and eft-soons coming to the knowledge of him, was stricken with confusion and shame, and began to fly. But the old man followed him as much as he might, forgetting his age, and crying, My Son, why dost thou fly from thy Father? an armed man from one naked, a young man from an old man? have pity on me, my Son, and fear not, for there is yet hope of Salvation; I will make answer for thee unto Christ, I will die for thee if need be; as Christ hath died for us, I will give my life for thee; believe me, Christ hath sent me. He hearing these things, first, as in a maze, flood still, and therewith his courage was abated. After that he had cast down his weapons, by and by he trembled, yea, and wept bitterly: and coming to the old man, imbraced him, and spake unto him with weeping (as well as he could) being even then baptized afresh with tears, only his right hand being hid and covered. Then the Apostle after that he had promised and firmly ascertained him that he should obtain remission of our Saviour, and also prayed, falling down upon his knees, and kissed his murthering right hand, which for shame he durst not shew before, as now purged through repentance, brought him to the Congregation. And when he had prayed for him with continual prayer and daily fastings, and had comforted and confirmed his mind with many Sentences, went not from him (as the Author reporteth) before he had restored him to the Congregation again, and made him a great example and trial of Regeneration, and a token of the visible Resurrection.

A notable Lesson for all Ministers to seek again their lost sheep.

O unspeakable love shewed yet to a wicked sinner.

Moreover, the aforesaid Irenæus in lib. 3. cap. 3. and Eusebius, lib. 3. cap. 28. and lib. 4. cap. 14. prosecuting the History of John, declare in these words, saying, That there were certain which heard Polycarpus say, that John, the Disciple of our Lord going into Ephesus to be washed, seeing Cerinthus within, he leaped out of the Bath unbath-ed, because he feared the Bath should have fallen, seeing that Cerinthus an Enemy to the Truth was within. Such fear had the Apostles (saith Irenæus) that they would not communicate a word with them that adulterate the truth.

An example of the godly to fly the company of the wicked.

And forasmuch as we are here in hand with the story of John the blessed Evangelist, here cometh in matter and occasion not given by him, but taken of others, of a great doubt and difficulty, such as hath occupied all the Catholick, subtil, illuminate, and seraphical Doctors of the Popes Catholick Church, these five hundred years. The difficulty is this, That for so much as auricular confession hath been, and is yet received in the Popes Catholick Church for an holy and necessary Sacrament, extending universally to all and singular Creatures Christian: here then ariseth a question, Who was our Ladies Confessor, or ghostly Father? But that is decreed and confessed with full consent of all the Catholicks to be Saint John. Whosoever denieth, or doubteth of this, is straightways Ipso facto an Heretick. This then so determined, ariseth another question or doubt, that seeing our Lady was without all original sin, and also also actual or mortal: what need then had three of any Confessor? Or what should the confess unto him? for if she had confessed any sin, when she had none; then had she made her self a lyar, and so had sinned indeed. Here therefore (gentle Reader) in this perplexity these our illuminate Doctors stand in need of thine aid to help at a pinch. Magnus Albertus the great Divine, denieth not, but that she indeed, although most pure, yet was confessed to her ghostly Father, to keep the observance of the Law, appointed for such as had that need, which she had not. And therefore (saith he) necessary it was that she should confess with mouth. But then here is to be asked, What did she say in her confession, when she had nothing to confess? To this Albertus answereth again, and telleth us plainly what she said in her confession, which was this, That she had received that great Grace, not Ex condigno; that is, Not of any dignity of her own, but yet notwithstanding of congruity. And this was it (saith Albert) that she said in her confession. Albert. cap. 74. super Evang. Missus est, &c.

Albert. ibidem, cap. 17.

S. Thomas par 3. quæst. 37. art. 3.

Moreover, to help this case out of all doubt, cometh in famous Thomas of Winring, and thus looseth the knot, much after like effect, saying, That as Christ, although he did owe nothing to the Law, yet notwithstanding received Circumcision, to give to others example of Humility and Obedience: in like manner would our Lady shew her self obedient to the observance of the Law, albeit there was no cause why she had any need thereof. And thus hath thou (gentle Reader) this doubtful question moved and soluted, to the intent I would reveal to thee some part of the deep Divinity of our Catholick Masters, that have ruled and governed the Church in these their late Popish days.

Flavia the daughter of a Consul, banished for the testimony of Christ. Ex Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 19.

But breaking off this matter, I return again where we left; that is, to this foresaid second Persecution under Domitianus. In which Persecution, besides these afore mentioned, and many other innumerable godly Martyrs, suffering for the like testimony of the Lord Jesus, was Flavia the Daughter of Flavius Clemens, one of the Roman Consuls, which Flavius, with many others was banished out of Rome, into the Ile Pontia, for the testimony of the Lord Jesus, by the Emperour Domitianus, Euseb. lib. 3.

The Emperour maketh inquiry for all that were of David's stock. Davids flock feared of the Emperors.

This Domitianus feared the coming of Christ as Herod did, and therefore commanded them to be killed which were of the Stock of David in Jewry. There were remaining alive at that time certain of the Lords kindred, which were the Nephews of Jude, that was called the Lords Brother after the flesh. These, when the Lieutenant of Jewry had brought up to Domitian to be slain, the Emperor demanded of them, Whether they were of the Stock of David? Which when they had granted, he asked again, what possessions, and what substance they had? They answered, That they both had no more between them in all, but nine and thirty acres of ground, and how they got their living, and sustained their Families with the hard labours of their hands, shewing forth their hands unto the Emperor, being hard and rough, worn with labours, to witness that to be true which they had spoken: Then the Emperor inquiring of them concerning the Kingdom of Christ, what manner of Kingdom it was, how, and when it should appear? They answered, That his Kingdom was no worldly nor terrene thing, but an Heavenly and Angelical Kingdom, and that it should appear in the consummation and end of the World, what time he coming in Glory, should judge the quick and the dead, and render to every one according to his deservings. Domitian the Emperor hearing this (as the saying is) did not condemn them; but despising them as vile persons let them go, and also staid the Persecution then moved against the Christians. They, being thus discharged and dismissed, afterward had the government of Churches, being taken for Martyrs, and as of the Lords flock, and so continued in good peace till the time of Trajanus. Hæc Egesip. & Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 20.

Two Nephews of Jude the Lords Brother preferred.

The Kingdom of Christ not of this World.

The causes why the Emperors and Senate of Rome did so rage against the Christians. The Kingdom of Christ feared of the Romans.

By this story here cited, may appear, what were the causes why the Emperors of the Roman Monarchy did so persecute the Christians: which causes were chiefly these, Fear and Hatred. First, Fear, for that the Emperors and Senate of blind Ignorance, not knowing the manner of Christs Kingdom, feared and misdoubted left the same would subvert their Empery, (like as the Pope thinketh how that this Gospel will overthrow his Kingdom of Majesty) and therefore fought they all means possible, how, by death and all kinds of torments, utterly to extinguish the name and memory of the Christians. And thereupon seemeth to spring the old Law of the Roman Senate: Non debere domiri Christianos, qui semel ad tribunal venissent, nisi contra Christianos propositum mutent; that is, that the Christians should not be let go, which were once brought to the Judgment-Seat, except they changed their purpose, &c. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 21.

Lex antiqua Romana contra Christianos. Ex Eusebio, lib. 1. cap. 12.

Secondly, Hatred, partly for that this world, of his own natural condition, hath ever hated and maligned the people of God, from the first beginning of the world. Partly again, for that the Christians being of a contrary nature and Religion, serving only the true living God, despised their false gods, frake against their Idolatrous worshippings, and many times stopped the Power of Satan, working in their Idols: And therefore Satan the Prince of this world, stirred up the Roman Princes and blind Idolaters to bear the more hatred and spite against them.

The Kingdom of Christ hated of Roman Princes

Upon these causes, and such like, rose up these malicious Slanders, false Surmises, infamous Lies, and slanderous Accusations of the Heathen Idolaters against the Christian Servants of God, which incited the Princes of this world the more to persecute them: for what Crimes soever malice could invent, or rash suspition could minister, that was imputed to the Christians; as that they were a people incestuous, that in the night in their concourses, putting out their Candles, they ran together in all filthy manner, that they killed their own Children, that they used to eat mans flesh, that they were seditious and rebellious, that they would not swear by the Fortune and Prosperity of Cæsar, that they would not adore the Image of Cæsar in the Market place, that they were pernicious to the Empery of Rome. Briefly, whatsoever mishappened to the City or Provinces of Rome, either Famine, Pestilence, Earthquake, Wars, Wonders, unfeasonableness of weather, or what other evils soever happened, it was imputed to the Christians, as Justinus recordeth. Over and beside all these, a great occasion that stirred up the Emperors against the Christians, came by one Publius Tarquinius the chief Prelate of the Idolatrous Sacrifices, and Mamertinus the chief Governor of the City in the time of Trajanus; who partly with money, partly with sinister and pestilent Counsel, partly with infamous Accusations (as witnesseth Nauclerus) incensed the mind of the Emperor so much against Gods people.

False Accusations and slanders against the Christians. Ex Apologia Justin. Martyr.

Publius Tarquinius and Mamertinus Persecutors.

Also among these other causes abovesaid, crept in some piece of covetousness withall (as in all other things it doth) in that the wicked Promoters and Accusers for lucre sake, to have the Possessions of the Christians, were the more ready to accuse them to have the spoil of their goods.

Ex Tert. Mart. ca. 2. Apolog.

Thus hast thou (Christian Reader) first, the causes declared of these Persecutions; secondly, the cruel law of their Condemnation; thirdly, now hear more what was the form of Inquisition, which was (as is witnessed in the second Apology of Justinus) to this effect; that they should swear to declare the truth, whether they were in very deed Christians or not: and if they confessed, then by the law the sentence of death proceeded. Justi. Apol. 2.

The form of Inquisition against the Christians in the old time.

The cruelty of Tyrants in killing of Christian men.

Neither yet were these Tyrants and Organs of Satan thus contented with death only, to bereave the life from the body. The kinds of death were divers, and no less horrible than divers. Whatsoever the cruelness of mans invention could devise for the punishment of mans body, was practised against the Christians, as partly I have mentioned before, and more appareth by the Epistle sent from the Brethren of France, hereafter following. Crafty trains, Outcries of Enemies, Imprisonment, Stripes and Scourgings, Drawings, Tearings, Stonings, Plates of Iron laid unto them burning hot, deep Dungeons, Racks, strangling in Prisons, the teeth of wild Beasts, Gridirons, Gibbets and Gallows, tossing upon the horns of Bulls: moreover, when they were thus killed, their bodies were laid in heaps, and Dogs there left to keep them, that no man might come to bury them, neither would any prayer obtain them to be interred and buried. Ex Epistola fratrum Viennensium ac Lugdunensium; &c.

Ex Epist. fratrum Viennensium & Lugdunensium, ad fratres per Asiam & Phrygiam scripta.

And yet notwithstanding for all these continual Persecutions, and horrible Punishments, the Church of the Christians daily increased, deeply rooted in the Doctrine of the Apostles, and of men apostolical, and watered plenteously with the blood of Saints, as saith Niceph. lib. 3. Whereof let us hear the worthy testimony of Justinus Martyr in his Dialogue with Tryphone. And that none (saith he) can terrifie or remove us which believe in Jesus, by this it daily appeareth, for when we are ſlain, crucified, caſt to wild Beaſts, into the fire, or given to other Torments, yet we go not from our Confeſſion: but contrary, the more cruelty and ſlaughter is wrought againſt us, the more they be that come to Piety and Faith by the Name of Jeſus: no otherwiſe than if a man cut the Vine-Tree, the better the Branches grow. For the Vine-Tree, planted by God and Chriſt our Saviour, is his people. Hæc Juſt.

The Church increaſeth by Perſecution.

¶ To comprehend the names and number of all the Martyrs that ſuffered in all theſe ten Perſecutions (which are innumerable) as it is unpoſſible, ſo it is hard in ſuch a variety and diverſity of matter to keep ſuch a perfect order and courſe of years and times, that either ſome be not left out, or that every one be reduced into his right place, eſpecially ſeeing the Authors themſelves, whom in this preſent Work we follow, do diverſly diſagree both in the times, in the names, and alſo in the kind of Martyrdom of them that ſuffered. As for example, where the common reading and opinion of the Church and Epiſtles decretal do take Anacletus to ſucceed after Clement, next before Euariſtus: contrary, Euſebius lib. 3. & lib. 5. cap. 6. making no mention of Cletus, but of Anacletus, ſaith, That *Eura*ſ*ius* ſucceeded next to Clement. Likewiſe Ruffinus and Epiphanius, ſpeaking nothing of Anacletus, make mention of Linus, and of Cletus, next before Clement, but ſay nothing of Anacletus: whereby it may appear that Cletus and Anacletus were both one. Sabellicus Aenead. 7. lib. 2. ſpeaking of Linus and of Cletus, ſaith, that they were ordained helpers under Peter, while he laboured in his Apoſtleſhip abroad, and ſo faith alſo Marianus Scotus: contrary, Irenæus, lib. 3. contra hæreſ. ſpeaketh of Anacletus, making no mention of Cletus. Whereby it may appear by the way, what credit is to be given to the decretal Epiſtles, whom all the later Hiſtories of the Pope his Church do follow in this behalf, &c. Moreover, where Antoninus, Vincentius, Jacobus In ſupplemento, Simoneta, Aloiſius, with others, declare of Linus, Cletus, Clement, Anacletus, Euariſtus, Alexander, Biſhops of Rome, that that they died Martyrs: Euſebius, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory writing of them maketh thereof no mention.

Diſagreement in Authors touching the lives and times of Martyrs. Linus Biſhop of Rome.

Cletus and Anacletus both one.

And firſt as touching Clement (whom Marianus Scotus calleth the firſt Biſhop of Rome after Peter) they ſay that he was ſent out into baniſhment of Trajanus, beyond Pontcus, with two thouſand Chriſtians, where he opened a well-ſpring to them which in the Wilderneſs were condemned to the Mines. Afterward being accuſed to the Emperor, he was thrown into the Sea with a millſtone faſtened about his neck, and not long after, his body was caſt up and buried (as Platina ſaith) at the place where the Well was made. Some ſay it was found firſt in the days of Pope Nicholas the firſt, Euſeicul. tempor. But foraſmuch as I find of his Martyrdom no firm relation in the ancient Authors, but only in ſuch new Writers of later times, which are wont to paint out the lives and hiſtories of good men, with fained additions of forged Miracles, therefore I count the fame of leſs credit, as I do alſo certain decretal Epiſtles, untruly (as may ſeem) aſcribed and intituled to his name. Euſebius in his third Book, writing of Clement, giveth no more of him, but thus, After he had governed the Church of Rome nine years, the ſaid Clement left the ſucceſſion thereof to Euariſtus.

Clement a Biſhop counted a Martyr.

The lives of Martyrs painted out with fained Miracles.

Of which Euariſtus next Biſhop of Rome, thus we find in Irenæus, lib. 3. cap. 3. Peter and Paul (ſaith he) committed the Charge of that Church to Linus: after whom came Anacletus, then ſucceeded Clemens, next to Clemens followed Euariſtus, after whom came Alexander, and then Sixtus the ſixth Biſhop of Rome after the Apoſtles: after Sixtus fate Telesphorus, then Higinus, then Pius, then Anicetus. And when Soter took the place after him, then the twelfth Biſhop of Rome was Eleutherius. Thus after Clement followed (as is ſaid) Euariſtus in the ſecond or third year of Trajanus, as ſaith Euſebius; or as Nicephorus ſaith, the fourth year of the ſaid Emperor. But howſoever the count of years ſtandeth, little or nothing remaineth of the Acts and Monuments either of this, or of other Biſhops of Rome in thoſe days. Whereby it may appear that no great account was then made of Roman Biſhops in thoſe days, whoſe Acts and Deeds were then either ſo lightly reputed, or ſo ſlenderly committed to Hiſtory. Notwithſtanding, certain decretal Epiſtles are remaining, or rather thruſt upon us in their names, containing in them little ſubſtance of any Doctrine, but altogether ſtuffed with Laws, Injunctions, and ſtately Decrees, little to the purpoſe, and leſs favouring of the nature of that time then preſent. Amongſt whom alſo are numbred the two Epiſtles of this Euariſtus.

Euariſtus Biſhop of Rome and Martyr.

The decretal Epiſtles.

And when he had given theſe Orders, and had made ſix Prieſts, two Deacons, and five Biſhops for ſundry places (ſaith the ſtory) he ſuffered Martyrdom. But what kind of death, for what cauſe he ſuffered, what conſtancy he ſhewed, what was the order or converſation of his life, is nothing touched, and ſeemeth therefore the more to be doubted that which our new Hiſtories do ſay: becauſe the old ancient Writers have no remembrance thereof, which otherwiſe would not have paſſed ſuch things over in ſilence, if they had been true. Again, neither do the Authors fully agree in the time of his Martyrdom, which Nauclerus witneſſeth to be in the laſt year of Trajanus: but Platina thinketh rather that he ſuffered under Hadrianus, Faſciculi. temporum referreth it to the third year of Hadrian; Volateranus to the beginning of the ſame. Contrary, Euſebius coming near to the ſimple truth (as ſeemeth) doth affirm that Euariſtus ſucceeded Clement in the third year of Trajanus, and ſo giving to him nine years, it ſhould follow thereby that Euariſtus deceaſed the twelfth year of Trajanus.

Sixtus 2. Platina. Volateran. Anchirpol.

Euſeb. lib. 3. cap. 34.

After whom ſucceeded next Alexander in the Government of that Church, of whoſe time and death the like diſcrepance is among the Writers. Marianus Scotus ſaith he was the fourth Biſhop from Peter: but that could not be. Some ſay he was the ſixth, and ſome the ſeventh: but they likewiſe were deceived; for the moſt part all do grant Sixtus to be the ſixth: Damaſus affirmeth, that he was in the Reign of Trajan. And how can that be? when the ſaid Damaſus affirmed before that Euariſtus his Predeceſſor ſuffered in the laſt year of Trajan, and then the Biſhoprick ſtood at leaſt a month void: except he mean that the ſaid Alexander ſucceeded Euariſtus in the laſt year of Trajanus. But then how can that ſtand with Bede and Marianus Scotus? which ſay that he ſuffered under Trajanus, or with Otho Friſingenſis; which ſaith he ſuffered the fourth year of Hadrian, when he had been Biſhop ten years by the general conſent of moſt Writers?

Alexander Biſhop of Rome and Martyr.

Authors diſagree.

They which write of the deeds and doings of this bleſſed Biſhop, as Bergomenſis, Antoninus, Equilinus, and ſuch as follow them, declare that he had converted a great part of the Senators to the Faith of Chriſt, amongſt whom was Hermes a great man in Rome, whoſe Son being dead Alexander raiſed again to life, and likewiſe reſtored ſight to his Maid being blind. Hadrian the Emperor then abſent, hearing this, ſent word to Aurelianus Governor of Rome, to apprehend Alexander, with Euentius and Theodulus, otherwiſe called Theodorus, as Platina ſaith, his two Deacons, and Hermes, and to commit them to ward with Quirinus the Tribune: which being done, as their ſtory recordeth, Alexander, incloſed in a drivers Priſon from Hermes, notwithſtanding, by the guiding of an Angel through three doors with three locks a piece, was brought with Candle-light to the lodging of Hermes; and ſo returning to the Priſon again cured the Daughter of Quirinus his Keeper, named Balbina, by reaſon whereof the ſaid Quirinus, with his whole Houſhold, were all baptized, and puniſhed alſo for the Faith of Chriſt.

Alexander, Euentius, Theodulus, Hermes with his Houſhold, Quirinus with his Houſhold Martyrs.

Thus then (ſaith the ſtory) about the ſecond year of Hadrian, Aurelianus the Ruler took Alexander the Biſhop, with Hermes, his Wife, Children, and his whole Houſhold, to the number of one thouſand two hundred and fifty, and threw them in Priſon. And not long after the ſaid Alexander, with Euentius his Deacon, and Hermes, and the reſt were burned in a Furnace. Theodulus another Deacon of Alexander, ſeeing and rebuking the cruelty of the Tyrant, ſuffered alſo the ſame Martyrdom.

Quirinus alſo the ſame time (as ſaith Antoninus) having firſt his Tongue cut out, then his hands and feet, afterward was beheaded and caſt to the dogs: Equilinus ſaith, that he was beheaded and caſt into Tiber in the Reign of the Emperor Claudius: but that cannot be: albeit Platina maketh relation but only of Alexander with his two Deacons aforeſaid, declaring moreover, that in the time of this Biſhop, Saphira of Antioch, and Sabina a Roman ſuffered Martyrdom.

Ex Vincentio lib. 6. Speculi.

Saphira and Sabina mar. Ex Flori-lego.

Florilegus.

Florilegus, the Author of Flores hiſtoriarum, affirmeth, that Alexander Biſhop of Rome was beheaded ſeven miles out of Rome (where he lieth buried) in the year one hundred and five; but that agreeth not with the Chronicles above recited. Euſebius recordeth of him no more, but that in the third year of Hadrian, he ended his life and office, after he had been Biſhop ten years.

Divers Miracles are reported of this Alexander, in the Canon Legends, and lives of Saints; which as I deny not, but they may be true, ſo becauſe I cannot avouch them by any grave teſtimony of ancient Writers, therefore I dare not affirm them, but do refer them to the Authors and Patrons thereof, where they are found. Notwithſtanding, whatſoever is to be thought of his Miracles, this is to be affirmed and not doubted, but that he was a godly and vertuous Biſhop.

The inſtitution of Euariſtus. Diſt. 93. cap. Diaconi.

And as I ſay of his Miracles, the like judgment alſo I have of the Ordinances both of him and of Euariſtus his Predeceſſor, teſtified in the Popes Decrees by Gratianus as Diſt. 93. cap. Diaconi, where is ſaid that Euariſtus divided divers Titles in the City of Rome to the Prieſts, alſo ordained in every City ſeven Deacons to aſſociate and aſſiſt the Biſhop in his preaching, both for his defence, and for the witneſs of truth. Notwithſtanding, if probable conjectures might ſtand againſt the authority of Gratianus and his decrees, here might be doubted whether this abſolute ordination of Prieſts was firſt by him brought in or not: wherein an inſtance may be given to the contrary, that this inſtitution ſeemeth to take his firſt beginning at the Council of Chalcedon, and of Pope Urban in the Council of Placentia. In the which Council of Chalcedon the words of the Canon (making no mention of Euariſtus at all) do expreſly forbid, that any Eccleſiaſtical perſon either Prieſt or Deacon ſhould be ordained abſolutely; otherwiſe the impoſition of hands, without ſome proper title of the party ordained, to ſtand void and fruſtrate, &c. And likewiſe Urbanus in the Council of Placentia doth decree the ſame, alledging no name of Euariſtus, but the ſtatutes of former Councils.

Ex Diſt. 70. cap. Nemo.

Ibidem cap. Sanctorum.

Moreover, in the time of Euariſtus, the Church then being under terrible Perſecutions, was divided into no peculiar Pariſhes or Cures whereby any title might riſe, but was ſcattered rather in corners and deſerts, where they could beſt hide themſelve. And as the Church of Rome in thoſe days was not divided into ſeveral Pariſhes or Cures (as I ſuppoſe) ſo neither was then any ſuch open or ſolemn preaching in Churches, that the aſſiſtance or teſtimony of ſeven Deacons either could avail among the multitude of the heathen, or elſe needful amongſt the Chriſtian ſecret Congregations. Again, the conſtitution of ſeven Deacons ſeemeth rather to ſpring out of the Council of Neocæſarea long after Euariſtus, where it was appointed that in every City, were it never ſo ſmall, there ſhould be ſeven Deacons after the rule. And this rule the ſaid Council taketh out of the book of the Acts of the Apoſtles, making no word or mention of Euariſtus at all, Diſt. 93. But that theſe (as is ſaid) be but only conjectures, not denying that which is commonly received, but only ſhewing what is to be doubted in their Epiſtles Decretal.

Ex Diſt. 93. cap. Diaconi.

The inſtitution of Alexander, Holy water firſt invented. De conſecr. diſtinct. diſt. 3.

More unlike it ſeemeth to be true that is recorded and reported of Alexander, whereof we read, De conſecr. diſt. 2. that he ſhould be the firſt founder and finder of holy water mixt with ſalt, to purge and ſanctifie them upon whoms it is ſprinkled. The words of the diſt. be theſe: Aquam ſale conſperſam in populis benedicimus, ut ea cuncti aſperſi ſanctificentur & purificentur, quod omnibus ſacerdotibus faciendum eſſe mandamus, &c. that is, We bleſs water mixt with ſalt among the people, that all men being ſprinkled therewith may be ſanctified and purified; and this we command all Prieſts to do, &c.

The mixing of water with the Wine in the Chalice. Qui pridie put in the Maſs Canon.

The opinion is alſo, but how true I have not to affirm, that by him firſt was ordained water to be mixt with Wine in the Chalice.

Item, that by him was brought in the piece of the Maſs Canon, beginning, Qui pridie &c. And thus much of theſe forelaid Biſhops of Rome, martyred in the days of Trajan and Hadrian.

The Third Perſecution,

The third Perſecution of the Church. Anno 100.

BEtween the ſecond Roman Perſecution and the third, was but one year, under the Emperor Nerva, after whom ſucceeded Trajanus: and after him followed the third Perſecution. So the ſecond and the third are noted of ſome to be both one, having no more difference but one year between them. This Trajanus, if we look well upon his Politick and Civil Governance, (might ſeem, in compariſon of others) a right worthy and commendable Prince, much familiar with inferiors, and ſo behaving himſelf toward his ſubjects, as he himſelf would have the Prince to be to him, if he himſelf were a Subject. Alſo he was noted to be a great obſerver of Juſtice, inſomuch that when he ordained any Prætor, giving to him the Sword, he would bid him uſe the ſword againſt his enemies in juſt cauſes: and if he himſelf did otherwiſe than juſtice, to uſe then his power againſt him alſo. But for all theſe Vertues, toward Chriſtian Religion he was impious and cruel, who cauſed the third Perſecution of the Church. In the which Perſecution Pliny the ſecond, a man learned and famous, ſeeing the lamentable ſlaughter of Chriſtians, and moved therewith to pity, wrote to Trajanus of the pitiful perſecution: certifying him that there were many thouſands of them daily put to death, of which none did any thing contrary to the Roman laws worthy perſecution: ſaving that they uſed to gather together in the morning before day, and ſing Hymns to a certain God whom they worſhipped, called Chriſt. In all other their obſervances they were godly and honeſt. Wherefore the Perſecution by commandment of the Emperor was greatly ſtayed and diminiſhed. The Form and Copy of which Epiſtle of Pliny I thought here not inconvenient to ſet down, as followeth.

Plinius ſecundus wrote to Trajan to ſtop the perſecution.

The Epiſtle of Pliny, an Heathen Philoſopher, to Trajan the Emperor.

The Epiſtle of Pliny to Trajanus.

IT is my property and manner (my Sovereign) to make relation of all thoſe things unto you wherein I doubt. For who can better, either correct my ſlackneſs, or inſtruct mine ignorance, than you? I was never yet preſent my ſelf at the examination and execution of theſe Chriſtians; and therefore what puniſhment is to be adminiſtred, and how far, or how to proceed in ſuch inquiſitions, I am plain ignorant, not able to reſolve in the matter whether any difference is to be had in age and perſon, whether the young and tender ought to be with like cruelty intreated as the elder and ſtronger, whether repentance may have any place, or whether it is may profit him or not, to deny, which hath been a Chriſtian, whether the name only of Chriſtians without other offences, or whether the offences joyned with the name of a Chriſtian ought to be puniſhed. In the mean ſeaſon, as touching ſuch Chriſtians as have been preſented unto me, I have kept this order. I have enquired the ſecond and third time of them, whether they were Chriſtians, menacing them with fear of puniſhment; and ſuch as did perſevere, I commanded to execution. For thus I thought, that whatſoever their profeſſion was, yet their ſtubbornneſs and obſtinacy ought to be puniſhed. Whether they were alſo of the ſame madneſs; whom, becauſe they were Citizens of Rome, I thought to ſend them back again to the City. Afterward, as further proceſs and handling of this matter, as the Sect did further ſpread, ſo the more caſes did thereof enſue.

There was a Libel offered to me bearing no name, wherein were contained the names of many which denied themſelves to be Chriſtians, contented to do Sacrifice with Incenſe and Wine to the Gods, and to your Image (which Image I for that purpoſe cauſed to be brought) and to blaſpheme Chriſt: whereunto none ſuch as were true Chriſtians indeed could be compelled, and thoſe I did diſcharge and let go. Other ſome confeſſed that they had been Chriſtians, but afterward denied the ſame, &c. affirming unto me the whole ſum of that ſect or errour to conſiſt in this, that they were wont at certain times appointed, to convent before day, and to ſing certain Hymns to one Chriſt their God, and to confederate among themſelves, to abſtain from all Theft, Murder, and Adultery, to keep their faith, and to defraud no man: which done, thus then to depart for that time, and afterward to resort again to take meat in companies together both Men and Women one with another, and yet without any act of evil.

Two Maidens racked for Christ.

In the truth whereof to be further certified whether it were so or not, I caused two Maidens to be laid on the Rack, and with torments to be examined of the same. But finding no other thing in them, but only lewd and immoderate superstition, I thought to surcease of further inquiry, till time that I might be further advertised in the matter from you; for to the matter seemed unto me worthy and needful of advisement, especially for the great number of those that were in danger of your statute. For very many there were of all ages and states, both Men and Women, which then were, and more are like hereafter to incur the same peril of condemnation. For that infection hath crept not only in Citys, but Villages also and Boroughs about, which seemeth that it may be stayed and reformed. For as much as we see in many places that the Temples of our Gods, which were wont to be desolate, begin now to be frequented, and that they bring Sacrifices from every part to be sold, which before very few were found willing to buy. Whereby it may easily be conjectured, what multitudes of Men may be amended, if place and time be given them, wherein they may be reclaimed.

The Epistle of Trajanus to Pliny.

The answer of Trajan to Pliny's letter.

THe Act and Statute, my Secundus, concerning the causes of the Christians, which ye ought to follow, ye have rightly executed. For no such general Law can be enacted, wherein all special cases particularly can be comprehended. Let them not be sought for, but if they be brought and convicted, then let them suffer execution: so notwithstanding, that whosoever shall deny himself to be a Christian, and do it unfeignedly in open audience, and do Sacrifice to our Gods, howsoever he hath been suspected before, let him be released, upon promise of amendment. Such Libels as have no names, suffice not to any just crime or accusation; for that should give both an evil president, neither doth it agree with the example of our time.

Tertullian writing upon this Letter of Trajanus above prefixed, thus saith, O Sentence of a confused necessity; he would not have them to be sought for as men innocent, and yet causes them to be punished as persons guilty. And thus the rage of that Persecution ceased for a time, although notwithstanding many naughty disposed men and cruel officers there were, which upon false pretence to accomplish their wicked minds, ceased not to afflict the Christians in divers Provinces: and especially if any occasion were given never so little for the enemies to take hold of, or if any commotion were raised in the Provinces abroad, by and by the fault was laid upon the Christians. As in Hierusalem after that the Emperor Trajanus had sent down his commandment, that whosoever could be found of the stock of David, he should be enquired out and put to death: Upon this Egesippus writing, saith, that certain Sectaries there were of the Jewish Nation, that accused Simeon the Bishop then of Hierusalem and Son of Cleophas, to come of the stock of David, and that he was a Christian. Of the which his accuses it happened also (saith the said Egesippus) that certain of them likewise were apprehended and taken to be of the stock of David, and so right justly were put to execution themselves which sought the destruction of others. As concerning Simeon the blessed Bishop, the foresaid Egesippus thus writeth, that Simeon the Lords Nephew, when he was accused to Attalus the Proconsul, by the malicious Sect of the Jews, to be of the Line of David, and to be a Christian, was scourged, during the space of many days together, being of age an hundred and twenty years. In which his Martyrdom he endured so constant, that both the Consul and all the multitude did marvel to see him of that age so constantly to suffer, and so at last being crucified, finished his course in the Lord, for whom he suffered, as partly before also is recorded.

In this Persecution of Trajanus above specified (which Trajanus next followed after Nerva) besides the other afore mentioned, also suffered Phocas Bishop of Pontus, whom Trajanus, because he would not do Sacrifice to Neptunus, caused to be cast into a hot lime-kilne, and afterward to be put into a scalding Bath, where the constant godly Martyr, in the testimony of Christ, ended his life, or rather entred into life. *Anton. In the same Persecution suffered also Sulpitius and Servilianus, two Romans; whose Wives are said to be Euphrosina and Theodora, whom Sabina did convert to the Faith of Christ, and after were also martyred. Of which Sabina, Jacobus Philippus, Author of the Book called Supplementum, reporteth that, in the Mount of Aventine in Rome, the was beheaded of Clepidus the Governour, in the days of Hadrian. Under whom also suffered Seraphia a Virgin of Antioch, as Hermannus witnesseth.

The forenamed Authors Antoninus and Equilius make mention moreover of Nereus and Achilleus, who, in this Persecution of Trajan, had the Crown of Martyrdom, being put to death at Rome. Eusebius in his fourth book, cap. 26. maketh mention of one Sagaris, who about the same time suffered Martyrdom in Asia, Servilius Paulus Martyr, being then Proconsul in that Province.

Nereus and Achilleus Martyrs. Sagaris Martyr.

In this Persecution, betide many others, suffered the blessed Martyr of Christ Ignatius, who unto this day is had in famous reverence among very many. This Ignatius was appointed to the Bishoprick of Antioch next after Peter in succession. Some do say, that he being sent from Syria to Rome, because he professed Christ, was given to the Wild beasts to be devoured. It is also said of him, that when he passed through Asia, being under the most strict custody of his Guarders, he strengthened and confirmed the Parishes through all the Cities as he went, both with his exhortations and preaching of the Word of God: and admonished them especially and before all other things, to beware and shun those Heresies risen up and sprung newly among them, and that they should observe and stick fast to the tradition of the Apostles; which he, for their better safeguard, being about to denounce or put in writing, thought it a thing very necessary to travel in. And thus when he came to Smyrna, where Polycarpus was, he wrote one Epistle to the Congregation of Ephesus, wherein he made mention of Onesimus their Pastor, and another he wrote to the Congregation of Magnesia, being at Meandre; wherein also he forgetteth not Dama their Bishop. Also another he wrote to the Congregation of Trallis, the Governour of which City at that time he noteth to be one Polybius. Unto which Congregation he made an exhortation, left they refusing Martyrdom, should lose the hope that they desired.

But it shall be very requisite that I alledge somewhat thereof to the declaration of this matter. He wrote therefore, as the words lie, in this sort. From Syria (saith he) even till I came to Rome, had I a battel with Beasts, as well by Sea as Land, both day and night, being bound in the midst of ten cruel Libards (that is, the Company or Band of the Souldiers) which, the more benefits that they received at my hands, became so much the worse unto me. But I, being exercised, and now well acquainted with their injuries, am taught every day more and more; but hereby am I not yet justified. And would to God I were once come to the Beasts, which are prepared for me, which also I wish with gaping mouths were ready to come upon me, whom also I will provoke that they without delay may devour me, and forbear me nothing at all, as those whom before they have not touched or hurt for fear: And if they will not unless they be provoked, I will then inforce them against my self. Pardon me I pray you. How much beneficial it is to me, I know. Now begin I to be a Scholar; I force or esteem no visible things, nor yet invisible things, so that I may get or obtain Christ Jesus. Let the zeal to Christ in this Bishop and Martyr to be marked.

The notable constancy and burning zeal to Christ in this Bishop and Martyr to be marked.

And these things wrote he from the foresaid City unto the Congregations which we have recited. And when he was even now judged to be thrown to the beasts, he spake, for the burning desire that he had to suffer, what time he heard the Lions roaring: I am the Wheat or Grain (saith he) of Christ, I shall be ground with the teeth of Wild Beasts, that I may be found pure bread. He suffered in the eleventh year of Trajan the Emperor. Hæc Eusebius & Hieronym.

Besides

Besides this godly Ignatius, many thousands also were put to death in the same Persecution, as appeareth by the letter of Plinius secundus above recited, written unto the Emperor. Hieronie in his Book intituled De viris illustribus maketh mention of one Publius Bishop of Athens, who for the faith of Christ, the same time during this Persecution, was put to death and martyred.

Hadrian Emperor.

NExt after this Trajanus succeeded Hadrian the Emperor, under whom suffered Alexander the Bishop of Rome, with his two Deacons Eventius and Theodorus: also Hermes and Quirinus with their families, as late before was declared.

It is signified moreover in the Histories, that in the time of this Hadrian, Zenon a Noble Man of Rome with ten thousand two hundred and three were slain for Christ. Henricus de Erfordia, and Bergomensis lib. 8. make mention of ten thousand in the days of this Hadrian to be crucified in the Mount Ararat, crowned with Crowns of thorne, and thrust into the sides with sharp darts, after the example of the Lords Passion, whose Captains (as Antoninus and Vincentius in spec. histor. declare) were Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorius, and Carcerius, &c. Whether this story be the same with the other above of Zenon or not, it is doubted. As touching the Miracles done, and the speaking of the Angel, I refer the certainty thereof to Vincentius, and such other like Authors, where more things seem to be told than to be true.

There was one Eustachius a Captain, whom Trajanus in time past had sent out to War against the Barbarians. After he had by Gods grace valiantly subdued his enemies, and now was returning home with Victory; Hadrian for joy meeting him in his journey to bring him home with Triumph, by the way first would do Sacrifice to Apollo for the Victory gotten, willing also Eustachius to do the same with him. But when Eustachius could by no means thereto be enforced, being brought to Rome, there with his Wife and Children he suffered Martyrdom under the foresaid Adrian. It were a long process here to recite all the Miracles contained or rather suspected in this story of this Eustachius concerning his Conversion and Death. How the Crucifix appeared to him between the Horns of an Hart. Of the saving of his Wife from the Shipmen. Of one of his Sons saved from the Lion, the other fared from the Wolf. Of their miraculous preservation from the Wild-beasts, from the torments of fire mentioned in Bergomensis, Vincentius, and others. All which as I find them in no ancient Records, so I leave them to their Authors, and compilers of the Legends.

We read also of Faustinus and Jobita Citizens of the City of Brixia, which suffered Martyrdom with like grievous torments. At the sight whereof one Calocerius, seeing their so great patience in so great torments, cried out with these Words; Vere magnus Deus Christianorum: that is, Verily great is the God of Christians: Which Words being heard, forthwith he was apprehended, and being brought to the place of their Execution, was made partaker of their Martyrdom. *Ex Ant. Quadratus a man Bishop of Athens, & fereth an Apology of Christian Doctrine.

While Adrian the Emperor was at Athens, he purposed to visit the Country of Elusina, and so did: where he sacrificing to the Gentiles Gods, after the manner of the Grecians, had given free leave and liberty, whosoever would, to persecute the Christians. Whereupon Quadratus a man of no less excellent zeal, than of famous learning, being then Bishop of Athens, and Disciple of the Apostles, or at least succeeding incontinent the age of the Apostles, and following after Publius (who a little before was martyred for the testimony of Christ) did offer up and exhibite unto Adrian the Emperor a learned and excellent Apology in the defence of the Christian Religion. Wherein he declared the Christians, without all just cause or desert to be so cruelly intreated and persecuted, &c. The like also did Aristides, another no less excellent Philosopher in Athens, who for his singular learning and eloquence, being notified to the Emperor, and coming to his presence, there made before him an eloquent Oration. Moreover, he did exhibit unto the said Emperor a memorable Apology for the cause of Christians, so full of learning and eloquence, that as Hierome saith, it was a spectacle and admiration to men in his time, that loved to see Wit and Learning. Over and besides these, there was also another named Serenus Granius a man of great Nobility, who likewise did write very pithy and grave Letters to Adrian the Emperor, shewing and declaring therein that it was consonant with no right nor reason, for the blood of innocents to be given to the rage and fury of the people, and so to be condemned for no fault, only for the Name and Sect that they followed.

Aristides, a Philosopher of Athens, defendeth before the Emperor the religion of the Christ.

Serenus Granius a defender of Christian religion. Euf. l. 4. c. 8.

Thus the goodness of God being moved with the prayers and constant labour of these so excellent men, so turned the heart of the Emperor, that he being better informed concerning the order and profession of the Christians, became more favourable unto them. And immediately upon the same directed his Letters to Minutius Fundanus (as is partly before mentioned) Proconful of Asia, willing him from henceforth to execute no more such extremity against the Christians, as to condemn any of them, having no other crime objected against them, but only their name. The Copy of which his Letter, because that Justin in his Apology doth alledge it; I thought therefore to express the same in his own words, as followeth.

The Emperor writeth for the Christians.

The Letter of Adrian the Emperor to Minutius Fundanus.

The Letter of Adrian the Emperor to Fundanus Proconful.

I Have received an Epistle written unto me from Serenus Granius, our right worthy and welbeloved, whose Office you do now execute. Therefore I think it not good to leave this matter without further advisement and circumspection to pass, lest our Subjects be molested, and malicious Sycophants bolned and supported in their evil. Wherefore if the Subjects of our Provinces do bring forth any accusation before the Judge against the Christians, and can prove the thing they object against them, let them do the same and no more, and otherwise for the name only, not to impeach them, nor to cry out against them. For so, more convenient it is, that, if any man will be an accuser, you take the accusation quietly, and judge upon the same. Therefore, if any shall accuse the Christians, and complain of them as Malefactors, doing contrary to the law, then give you judgment according to the quality of the crime. But notwithstanding whosoever upon spite and malicious nesse shall commence or cavil against them, see you correct and punish that man for his unordinate and malicious dealing.

Reside from Persecution

Thus by the merciful providence of God, some more quiet and rest was given to the Church, although Hermannus thinketh these halcion days did not very long continue, but that the Emperor changing his Edict, began to renew again Persecution of Gods People, albeit this soundeth not to be so by the words of Melito in his Apology to Antoninus hereafter ensuing. In the mean time this this is certain, that in the days of this Adrian, the Jews rebelled again and spoiled the Country of Paleſtin. Againſt whom the Emperor ſent Julius Severus, who overthrew in Jewry fifty Caſtles, and burnt and deſtroyed nine hundred and fourſcore Villages and Towns, and ſlew The ſecond deſtruction of the Jews. Jeruſalem rendified and inlarged. Some write that the place where Chriſt was crucified was taken into the Wall. Jeruſalem called by a new name Ælia[polis].

and Fire, Judea was almoſt deſolate. But at length Adrian the Emperor, which otherwiſe was named Ælius, repaired and enlarged the City again of Jeruſalem, which was called after his name Ælia[polis], or Ælia Capitolina, the inhabitance whereof he granted only to the Gentiles, and to the Chriſtians, forbidding the Jews utterly to enter into the City.

After the death of Adrian who died by bleeding at the Noſe, ſucceeded Antoninus Pius, about the year of our Lord, one hundred and forty, and reigned twenty and three years, who for his clemency and modeſt behaviour, had the name of Pius, and is for the ſame in Hiſtories commended. His ſaying was, that he had rather ſave one Citizen, than deſtroy a thouſand of his adverſaries. At the beginning of his Reign, ſuch was the ſtate of the Church, as Adrian his Predeceſſor had left it, as in which, although there was no Edict ſet forth to perſecute the Chriſtians, yet the tumultuous rage of the Heathen multitude for the cauſes above ſpecified, did not ceaſe to diſquiet and afflict the quiet people of God, imputing and aſcribing to the Chriſtians whatſoever miſortune happened contrary unto their deſires: moreover, inventing againſt them all falſe crimes and contumelies whereof to accuſe them. By reaſon whereof, divers there were in ſundry places much moleſted, and ſome put to death: albeit, as it is to be ſuppoſed, not by the conſent of the Emperor, who of nature was ſo mild and gentle, that either he raiſed up no Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, or elſe he ſoon ſtayed the ſame being moved. As well may appear by his Letter ſent down to the Countries of Aſia, the tenor whereof here inſueth.

Antoninus Pius Emperor. { Anno 140.

The Epiſtle of Antoninus Pius, to the Commons of Aſia.

The Letter of Antoninus Pius to the Commons of Aſia.

Emperor and Ceſar, Aurelius Antoninus Auguſtus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribune eleven times, Conſul thrice, unto the Commons of Aſia greeting. I am very certain that the Gods have a care of this, that they which be frich, ſhall be known, and not lie hid. For they do puniſh them that will not worſhip them more than you, which ſo ſore vex and trouble them, confirming thereby the opinion which they have conceived, and do conceive of you, that is, to be wicked men. For this is their joy and deſire, that when they are accuſed, rather they covet to die for their God, than to live. Whereby they are Victors, and do overcome you, giving rather their lives than to be obedient to you, in doing that which you require of them. And here it ſhall not be inconvenient to advertiſe you of the Earthquakes, which have and do happen among us, that when at the ſight of them you tremble and are afraid, then you may confer your caſe with them. For they upon a ſure confidence of their God, are bold and fearleſs, much more than you: who in all the time of your ignorance, both do worſhip other Gods, and neglect the Religion of immortality, and ſuch Chriſtians as worſhip him, them you do drive out, and proſecute them unto death. Of theſe and ſuch like matters many Preſidents of our Provinces did write to our Father of famous memory heretofore. To whom he directed his anſwer again, willing them in no caſe to moleſt the Chriſtians, except they were found in ſome treſpaſs prejudicial againſt the Empire of Rome. And to me alſo many there be, which write ſignifying their mind in like manner. To whom I have anſwered again, to the ſame effect and manner as my Father did. Wherefore if any hereafter ſhall offer any vexation or trouble to ſuch, having no other cauſe, but only for that they are ſuch, let him that is appeached, be releaſed and diſcharged free, yea although he be found to be ſuch (that is a Chriſtian) and let the accuſer ſuſtain the puniſhment, &c.

A notable argument of the Emperor to prove the good Conſcience of Chriſtianem, and the falſe conſcience of the Heathen.

He meaneth Adrian which adopted this Antoninus for his Son in law to be his ſon and heir. Of noble Edict.

This godly Edict of the Emperor was proclaimed at Epheſus, in the publick Aſſembly of all Aſia, whereof Melito alſo Biſhop of Sardis, who flouriſhed in the ſame time, maketh mention in his Apology written in defence of our Doctrine to M. Antoninus Verus, as hereafter (Chriſt willing) ſhall appear. By this means then the Tempeſt or Perſecution in thoſe days began to be appeaſed, through the merciful Providence of God, which would not have his Church utterly to be overthrown, though hardly yet to grow.

The fourth Perſecution.

M. Aure. Antoninus Verus Emperor. { Anno 162

After the deceaſe of the foreſaid quiet and mild Prince Aurelius Antoninus Pius (who among all other Emperors of that time made the moſt quiet end) followed his Son M. Antoninus Verus, with Lucius his brother, about the year of our Lord one hundred threeſcore and two, a man of nature more ſtern and ſevere. And although in ſtudy of Philoſophy and in Civil Government no leſs commendable: yet toward the Chriſtians ſharp and fierce, by whom was moved the fourth Perſecution after Nero. In whoſe time a great number of them which truly profeſſed Chriſt, ſuffered moſt cruel torments and puniſhments both in Aſia and France. In the number of whom was Polycarpus, the worthy Biſhop of Smyrna, who in the great rage of this Perſecution in Aſia, among many other moſt conſtant Saints was alſo martyred. Of whoſe End and Martyrdom I thought it here not unexpedient to commit to Hiſtory, ſo much as Euſebius declareth to be taken out of a certain Letter or Epiſtle, written by them of his own Church to the brethren of Pontus: the tenor of which Epiſtle here followeth.

Polycarpus the bleſſed Martyr, Biſhop of Smyrna.

The Congregation which is at Smyrna, to the Congregation which is at Philomilium, and to all the Congregations throughout Pontus, mercy to you, peace and the love of God our Father, and of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, be multiplied, Amen. We have written unto you brethren of thoſe men which have ſuffered Martyrdom, and of bleſſed Polycarpus which hath ended and appeaſed this Perſecution, as it were, by the ſhedding his own blood. And in the ſame Epiſtle before they enter into further matter of Polycarpus, they diſcourſe of other Martyrs, deſcribing what patience they abode and ſhewed in ſuffering their torments: which was ſo great and admirable (ſaith the Epiſtle) that the lookers on were amazed, feeing and beholding how they were ſo ſcourged and whipped, that the inward Veins and Arteries appeared, yea, even ſo much that the very intrails of their bodies, their bowels and members were ſeen, and after that, were ſet upon ſharp ſhells taken out of the Sea, edged and ſharp, and certain nails and thorns for the Martyrs to go upon, which were ſharpened and pointed, called Obeliſci. Thus ſuffered they all kind of puniſhment and torment that might be deviſed: and laſtly, were thrown unto the wild beaſts to be devoured. But eſpecially in the aforeſaid Epiſtle, mention is made of one Germanicus, how he moſt worthily perſevered and overcame, by the grace of God, that fear of death which is ingraffed in the common nature of all men, whole notable patience and ſufferance was ſo notable, that the whole multitude wondring at this beloved Martyr of God, for his ſo bold conſtancy, and alſo for the ſingular ſtrength and vertue proceeding of the whole multitude of the Chriſtians, began ſuddenly to cry with a loud voice, ſaying, Deſtroy the wicked men, let Polycarpus be ſought for. And whilſt a great uproar and tumult began thus to be raiſed upon thoſe cries, a certain Phrygian named Quintus, lately come out of Phrygia, ſeeing and abhorring the wild beaſts, and the fierce rage of them, of an over-light mind betrayed his own ſafety. For ſo the ſame Letter of him doth report, that he, not reverently, but more maliperly than was requiſite, together with others ruſhed into the Judgment place, and ſo being taken, was made a manifeſt example to all the beholders, that no man ought raſhly and unreverently with ſuch boldneſs to thruſt in himſelf, to intermeddle in matters wherewith he hath not to do.

Ex Euſeb. lib. Eccleſ. hiſt. 4. cap. 15. Niceron. in catalog.

Twelve martyrs in Aſia.

The cruel and beaſtly handling of the Chriſtian martyrs.

The ſingular patience and conſtancy of the Chriſtians.

Germanicus a moſt conſtant Martyr.

Polycarpus refuſeth to do ſacrifice.

Quintus a Phrygian too hardy and bold.

But now we will ſurceaſe to ſpeak more of them, and return to Polycarpus, of whom the foreſaid Letter conſequently declareth as followeth: How that in the beginning, when he heard of theſe things, was nothing at all afraid nor diſquieted in mind, but purpoſed to have tarried ſtill in the City, till being perſwaded by the intreaty of them that were about him (which deſired him inſtantly that he would convey himſelf away) hid himſelf in a Grange or Village not far off from the City, and there abiding with a few more in his company, did nothing elſe (night nor day) but abode in ſupplication, wherein he made his humble petition for the obtaining of peace unto all the Congregations throughout the World, for that was his accuſtomed manner ſo to do. And as he was thus making his prayers three days before he was apprehended, in a Viſion by night he ſaw the bed ſet on Fire under his Head, and ſuddenly to be conſumed. And when he awaked, he told by and by, and expounded unto them that were preſent his Viſion, and told them before what thing ſhould come to paſs, that is, how that in the fire he ſhould loſe his life for Chriſts cauſe. It is further mentioned, that when they were hard at hand, which ſo narrowly ſought for him, that he was inforced for the affection and love of his brethren to fly into another Village, to which place notwithſtanding within a little while after the purſuers came, and when they had taken a couple of children that dwelt thereabouts, they ſo beat one of them with Whips, that by the bewraying or confeſſion of him they were brought unto the Inn where Polycarpus was. And they ſay that the purſuers making no great haſte to enter, found him in the uppermoſt place of the houſe, from whence he might have eſcaped into other houſes, if he would; but that this he would not do, ſaying, The will of God be done. Furthermore, when he knew that they were come, as the ſaid Hiſtory ſheweth, he came down, and ſpake unto them with a chearful and pleaſant countenance, ſo that it was a wonder to ſee thoſe which awhile agone knew not the man, now beholding and viewing his comely age, and his grave and conſtant countenance, lamented that they had ſo much imployed their labour, that ſo aged a man ſhould be apprehended. To conclude, he commanded that ſtraightway without any delay the Table ſhould be laid for them, and perſwaded them that they would eat and dine well, and required of them boldly, that he might have an hours reſpite to make his prayers. Which thing, after it was granted, he aroſe and went to pray, ſo being replenished with the grace of God, that they which were preſent, and hearing the prayers that he made, were aſtonied at it, and now many of them were ſorry that ſo honeſt and godly an aged man ſhould be put to death.

Polycarpus hath a Viſion of his burning.

Polycarpus perſued and taken.

Polycarpus might eſcape and would not.

Polycarpus falleth to prayer.

After this the aforeſaid Epiſtle or Letter, proſecuting the Hiſtory, addeth more, as followeth: After he had made an end of his prayers, and had called to his remembrance all thoſe things which ever happened unto him, and to the univerſal Catholick Church throughout all the world (whether they were ſmall or great, glorious or elſe inglorious) and that the hour was now come, in which they ought to ſet forward, they ſet him upon an Aſs, and brought him to the City upon a Solemn Feaſt day. And there met him Irenarchus Herodes, and his father Nicetes, which cauſing him to come up into the Chariot where they ſate, perſwaded him, and ſaid, What hurt I pray thee, ſhall come thereof to thee, if thou ſay (by the way of ſalvation) My Lord Ceſar, and do Sacrifice, and thus to ſave thy ſelf? But he at the beginning made them none anſwer, till that when they inforced him to ſpeak, he ſaid, I will not do as ye counſel me I ſhould. When as they ſaw he could not be perſwaded, they gave him very rough language, and of purpoſe moleſted him, that in going down the Chariot from them, he might hurt or break his Legs. But he forcing very light of the matter, as though he had felt no hurt, went merrily and diligently forward, making haſte unto the place appointed. And when there was ſuch uproar in the place of execution, that he could not be heard but of very few, there came a voice from Heaven to Polycarpus, as he was going into the Stage appointed place of Judgment, ſaying: Be of good cheer, Polycarpus, and play the man. No man there was which ſaw him that ſpake, but very many of us heard his voice. And when he was brought in, there was a great noiſe made by them which underſtood that Polycarpus was apprehended. The Proconſul asked him when he was come, whether his name was Polycarpus or not? And when he ſaid, yea it was, he gave him counſel to deny his name, and ſaid unto him, Be good unto thy ſelf, and favour thine old age; and many other ſuch like words which they accuſtome to ſpeak; Swear, ſaith he, by the Emperors good fortune, look upon this matter, ſay thou with us: Deſtroy thoſe naughty men. Then Polycarpus beholding with conſtant countenance the whole multitude which was in the place appointed, and giving a great ſigh, looked up to Heaven, ſaying: Thou, thou it is that wilt deſtroy theſe wicked men. And the Proconſul thus being earneſtly inſtant with him, ſaid: Take thine Oath, and I will diſcharge thee, deſie Chriſt. Polycarpus anſwered, Fiorſcore and ſix years have I been his ſervant, yet in all his time hath he not ſo much as once hurt me: how then may I ſpeak evil of my King and ſovereign Lord, which hath thus preſerved me? Then the Proconſul again inforced him and ſaid: Swear thou, I adviſe thee, by Ceſar's Proſperity. Polycarpus replied, If thou require of me this fond word of vain boaſting, ſeigning not to know (as thou ſayeſt) who I am, I do thee to wit that I am a Chriſtian: and if thou deſire to know the Doctrine of Chriſtianity, appoint a day, and thou ſhalt hear. Perſwade the people unto this, ſaid the Proconſul. Truly, ſaith Polycarpus, I have thought it my part thus to ſay unto you, for ſo much as we are commanded to give unto the Governors and Powers ordained of God, the honour meet and due to them, and not hurtful unto us: but as for thoſe, I do judge them unworthy to purge my ſelf unto them. Hereupon the Proconſul ſtood up; I have, ſaith he, Wild-Beaſts to whom I will throw thee, unleſs thou take a better way. Whereunto Polycarpus anſwered, Let them come, we have determined with our ſelves, that we will not by repentance turn us from the better way to the worſe, but rather convenient it is, that a man turn from things that be evil, unto that which is good and juſt. Again, ſaith the Proconſul, I will tame thee with fire, if that thou ſet not by the wild beaſts, nor yet repent. Then ſaid Polycarpus, You threaten me with fire, which ſhall burn for the ſpace of an hour, and ſhall be within a little while after put out and extinguiſhed: but thou knoweſt not the fire of the judgment that is to come, and of everlaſting puniſhment, which is reſerved for the wicked and ungodly. But why make you all theſe delays? Give me what death ſoever ye liſt. Thele, and many other ſuch like things being by him ſpoken, he was replenished with joy and boldneſs, and his countenance appeared ſo full of grace and favour, that not only he was not troubled with thoſe things which the Proconſul ſpake unto him, but contrariwiſe, the Proconſul himſelf began to be amazed, and ſent for the Crier, which in the middle of the ſtage was commanded to cry three times; Polycarpus hath confeſſed himſelf to be a Chriſtian: which words of the Crier were no ſooner ſpoken, but all the whole multitude both of Gentiles and Jews inhabiting at Smyrna, with a vehement rage and loud voice cried; This is that Doctor or Teacher of Aſia, the Father of the Chriſtians, and the deſtroyer of our Gods, which hath inſtructed a great number, that our Gods are not to be worſhipped: and after this they cried unto Philip the Governor of Aſia, and required him that he would let looſe the Lion to Polycarpus. To whom he made anſwer, that he might not ſo do, becauſe he had already his prey. Then they cried again all together with one voice, that he would burn Polycarpus alive. For it was requiſite that the Viſion, which he ſaw as concerning his Pillow or Bolſter, ſhould be fulfilled: which when he had ſeen burnt, as he was in his prayer, he turned himſelf unto the faithful ſort which were with him, ſaying, by the way of Prophecy, it will ſo come, that I ſhall be burned alive. And the Proconſul had no ſooner ſpoken, but it was out of hand performed. For why? the multitude by and by brought out of their Shops, Workhouſes and Barns, wood and other dry matter for that purpoſe, and eſpecially the Jews were moſt ſerviceable for that matter, after their wonted manner.

Polycarpus refuſed to be ſacrificed.

Polycarpus confirmed by a voice from Heaven.

Polycarpus altered to change his name, and would not conſent.

Polycarpus fifteth Perſecution.

Polycarpus prayeth for the Church.

A faithful ſervant of Chriſt his Lord.

Polycarpus ready to give a reaſon of his doctrine.

Polycarpus obedient to higher powers.

Polycarpus threatned with wild beaſts.

An example of brotherly love.

The willing mind of Polycarpus to ſuffer.

And thus the Pile being laid, and when he had now put off his garments and undone his girdle, and was about to pull off his ſhoos, which he had not done before, for that all the faithful ſort among themſelves ſtrived (as it were) who ſhould firſt touch his body at their farewell, because for the good converſation of his life, even from his younger age, he was had in great eſtimation of all men: Therefore ſtraightway thoſe inſtruments which are requiſite to ſuch a Bone-fire, were brought unto him, and when they would have nailed him to the Stake with Iron Hoops, he ſaid, let me alone as I am, for he that hath given me ſtrength to ſuffer and abide the fire, ſhall alſo give power, that without this your proviſion of Nails, I ſhall abide, and not ſtir in the midſt of this fire or pile of Wood. Which thing when they heard, they did not nail him, but bound him. Therefore when his hands were bound behind him, even as the chiefeſt Ram taken out of the Flock, he was ſacrificed as an acceptable burnt offering to God, ſaying, O Father of thy well-beloved and bleſſed Son Jeſus Chriſt; by whom we have attained the knowledge of thee, thu God of Angels and Powers, and of every creature, and of all juſt men which live before before thee, I give thee thanks that thou hast vouchsafed to grant me this day that I may have my part among the number of the Martyrs in the Cup of Christ, unto the resurrection of eternal life, both of body and soul, through the operation of thy Holy Spirit; among whom I shall this day be received into thy sight for an acceptable sacrifice: and as thou hast prepared and revealed the same before this time, so thou hast accomplished the same, O thou most true God, which canst not lie. Wherefore I in like case for all things praise thee, and bless thee, and glorifie thee by our everlasting Bishop, Jesus Christ, to whom be glory evermore, Amen.

The thanksgiving of Polycarpus.

And as soon as he had ended this word Amen, and finished his prayer, the tormentors began to kindle the fire, and as the flame flashed out vehemently, we, to whom it was given to discern the same, saw a marvellous matter, which were also to this purpose preserved, that we might shew the same to others. For the fire being made like unto a roof or vault of a house, and after the manner of a shipmans sail, filled with wind, compassed about the body of the Martyr, as with a certain Wall, and he, in the middle of the same, not as flesh that burned, but as gold and silver when it is tried in the fire. And surely we smelt a savour so sweet, as if myrrh or some other precious balm had given a scent. At the last, when those wicked persons saw that his body could not be consumed by fire, they commanded one of the tormentors to come unto him, and thrust him through with his sword. Which being done, so great a quantity of blood ran out of his body, that the fire was quenched therewith, and the whole multitude marvelled that there was so much diversity between the infidels and the elect, of whom this Polycarpus was one, being a disciple of the Apostles, and a prophetical instructor of our times, and Bishop of the Catholick Church of Smyrna: for what word soever he spake, both it was and shall be accomplished. But the subtil and envious adversary when he saw the worthiness of his Martyrdom, and that his conversation even from his younger years could not be reproved, and that he was adorned with the Crown of Martyrdom, and had now obtained that incomparable benefit, gave in charge that we should not take and divide his body, for fear left the remnants of the dead corps should be taken away, and so worshipped of the people. Whereupon divers whispered Nicetas the father of Herod, and his brother Dalces in the ear, to admonish the Proconsul, that in no case he should deliver his body, lest (saith he) they leave Christ, and begin to worship him. And this spake they, because the Jews had given them secret warning, and provoked them thereunto; who also watched us, that we should not take him out of the fire: not being ignorant how that we meant at no time to forsake Christ, which gave his life for the salvation of the whole world (as many I mean as are elected to salvation by him) neither yet that we could worship any other. For why? him we worship as the Son of God, but the Martyrs do we love as Disciples of the Lord (and that worthily) for their abundant love towards their King and Master, of whom we also desire and wish to be companions, and to be made his Disciples. When therefore the Centurion saw and perceived the labour of the Jews, the corps being laid abroad, they burnt the same, as was their manner to do.

An example of much cruelty.

The Jews enemies always to the Christians.

Mark that he saith, we love them, and worship them not.

Thus good Polycarpus with twelve others that came from Philadelphia suffered Martyrdom at Smyrna: which Polycarpus especially above the rest is had in memory, so that he in all places among the Gentiles is most famous. And this was the end of this worthy Disciple of the Apostles; whose History the brethren of the Congregation of Smyrna have written in this their Epistle, as is above recited.

Twelve Martyrs put to death in Smyrna.

Irenæus in his 3d. Book against Heresies, the 3d. Chap. and Eusebius in his 4th. Book and 14th. Chapter of his Ecclesiastical History, reporteth this worthy saying of Polycarpus: This Polycarpus (saith he) meeting at a certain time Marcion the Heretick, who said to him; Dost thou not know me? made answer, I know that thou art the first begotten of Satan. So little fear what evil might ensue thereof, had the Disciples of the Apostles, that they would not speak to them whom they knew to be the depravers of the verity, even as S. Paul saith, The Heretick after the first and second admonition, shun and avoid, knowing, that he which is such a one, is perverse & froward, and damneth himself. This moth holy Confessor and Martyr of Christ, Polycarpus, suffered death in the fourth Persecution after Nero, when Marcus Antonius, and Lucius Aurelius Commodus reigned, in the year of our Lord 167, as Urspergensis affirmeth, in the year 170, as Eusebius witnesseth in his Chronicles, the seventh before the Kalends of February.

Ex Irenæo lib. 3. cap. 3. Eusebii. lib. cap. 14.

Anno 167.

Of Germanicus mention is made above in the story of Polycarpus, of whom writeth Eusebius lib. 4. cap. 15. noting him to be a young man, and stoutly constantly to persevere in the profession of Christs Doctrine, whom when the Proconsul went to persuade to remember his age, and to favour himself, being in the flower of his age, he would not be allured; but constantly and boldly, and of his own accord incited and provoked the wild beasts to come, upon him, and to devour him, to be delivered more speedily out of this wretched life. Hæc Euseb. an. 170.

Germanicus. Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 15.

Thus have you heard out of the Epistle of the brethren of Smyrna, the whole order and life of Polycarpus: whereby it may appear that he was a very aged man, who had served Christ eighty six years since the first knowledge of him, and served also in the Ministery about the space of 70 years. This Polycarpus was the Scholar and Hearer of John the Evangelist, and was placed by the said John in Smyrna. Of him also Ignatius maketh mention in his Epistle which he wrote in his journey to Rome, going toward his Martyrdom, and commendeth to him the government of his Church at Antioch, whereby it appeareth that Polycarpus was then in the Ministery. Likewise Ireneus writeth of the said Polycarpus after this manner: He always taught (said he) those things which he learned of the Apostles (leaving them to the Church) and are only true. Whereunto also all the Churches that be in Asia, and all they which succeeded after Polycarpus to this day bear witness. And the same Ireneus witnesseth also that the said Polycarpus wrote an Epistle to the Philippians, which whether it be the same that is now extant and read in the name of Polycarpus, it is doubted of some: notwithstanding in the said Epistle divers things are found very wholesome and Apostolick: as where he teacheth of Christ, of Judgment, and of the Resurrection. Also he writeth of faith very worthily, thus declaring, that by Grace we are saved, and not by works, but in the will of God by Jesus Christ.

The elder of Smyrna.

Polycarpus was the Scholar of John.

Irenæus lib. 3. cap. 3.

The Epistle of Polycarpus to the Philippians.

Justification by faith.

In Eusebius we read in like manner a part of an Epistle written by Irenæus to Florinus, wherein is declared, how that the said Ireneus being yet young, was with Polycarpus in Asia; at what time he saw and well remembred what Polycarpus did, and the place where he fate teaching, his whole order of life and proportion of his body, with the sermons and words which he said to the People. And furthermore, he perfectly remembred, how that the said Polycarpus often times reported unto him those things which he learned and heard from the mouth of the Lord his doings, power and doctrine, who heard the word of life with their own ears, all which were more constant and agreeable to the Holy Scripture. This, with much more, hath Ireneus concerning Polycarpus.

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 20. Ireneus an auditor with Polycarpus.

Hieronie also writing of the same Polycarpus, hath, how he was in great estimation throughout all Asia, for that he was Scholar to the Apostles, and to them which did see, and were conversant with Christ himself: whereby it is to be conjectured, his authority to be much, not only with them of his own Church, but with all other Churches about him.

Polycarpus came to Rome.

Polycarpus conferreth with Anicetus.

Over and besides, it is witnessed by the said Ireneus, that Polycarpus came to Rome in the time of Anicetus Bishop of Rome, about the year of our Lord one hundred fifty and seven in the Reign of Antonius Pius, whose cause of coming thither appeareth to be about the controversie of Easter day: wherein the Asians and the Romans something disagreed among themselves. And therefore the said Polycarpus, in the behalf of the brethren and Church of Asia, took his long journey thither, to come and confer with Anicetus. Whereof writeth also Nicephorus lib. 4. declaring, that Polycarpus and Anicetus something varied in opinions and judgment about that matter, and that notwithstanding, yet both friendly communicated either with the other, in so much that Anicetus in his Church gave place to Polycarpus to minister the Communion and Sacrament of the Lords Supper for honour sake. Which may be a notable testimony now to us, that the doctrine concerning the free use and liberty of Ceremonies, was at that time retained in the Church without any offence of stomach, or breach of Christian peace in the Church.

The old use of Easter.

Nicephorus lib. 4. cap. 3.

Difference of ceremonies caused no breach of charity in the primitive Church.

This Polycarpus (as is above mentioned) suffered his Martyrdom even in his own Church at Smyrna, where he had laboured so many years in planting of the Gospel of Christ.

Christ, which was about the year of our Lord, an hundred threescore and ten, as Eusebius reckoneth in his Chronicle, and in the seventh year of Antoninus Verus his Reign, whereby it appeareth that Socrates in Historia tripartita was much deceived, saying, That Poplycarpus suffered in the time of Gordianus.

Socrates deceived in his Tripartite Hist.

Ex Euseb. cap. 17.

In this fourth Persecution, besides Polycarpus and others mentioned before, we read also in Eusebius of divers others, who at the same time likewise did suffer at Smyrna.

Over and besides, in the same Persecution suffered moreover Metrodorus a Minister, who was given to the fire, and so consumed. Another was worthy Pionius, which after much boldness of speech, with his Apologies exhibited, and his Sermons made to the people in the defence of Christian Faith, and after much relieving and comforting of such as were in Prisons, and otherwise discomforted, at last was put to cruel Torments and Afflictions, then given likewise to the fire, and so finished his blessed Martyrdom.

Metrodorus.

Pionius.

After these also suffered Carpus, Papylus, and Agathonica, a woman, who after their most constant and worthy Confessions, were put to death at Pergamopolis in Asia, witnessing Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 7.

Carpus, Papylus, Agathonica, Confessors, Martyrs.

And as these suffered in Asia, so in Rome suffered Felicitas with her seven children, who under this M. Antoninus Verus sustained also the cruelty of this Persecution. The names of whose Children Bergomensis and other Histories do thus recite, Januarius, Felix, Philip, Silvanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis. Of whom her first and eldest Son Januarius, after he was whipped and scourged with Rods, was prest to death with leaden weights. Felix and Philip had their brains beaten out with mawls. Silvanus was cast down headlong, and had his Neck broken. Furthermore, Alexander, Vitalis, and Martialis, were beheaded. Last of all, Felicitas the Mother (otherwise than the accustomed manner was for such as had born Children) was slain with the Sword, Ex Supplem.

Felicitas with her seven children. Januarius, Felix, Philippus, Silvanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis, Martyrs.

In the rage of this fourth Persecution, under the Reign of Antoninus Pius, suffered also good Justinus, a man in Learning and Philosophy excellent, and a great Defender of Christian Religion, who first exhibited unto the Emperor, and to the Senate, a Book or Apology in the defence of the Christians, and afterward himself also died a Martyr. Of whom in the History of Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 16. it is thus recorded, that about what time, or a little before that Polycarpus with divers other Saints suffered Martyrdom in Pergamopolis a City of Asia, this Justinus (as is aforesaid) prefented a Book in defence of our Doctrine to the Emperor, to wit, unto Antoninus, and to the Senate. After which he was also crowned with like Martyrdom unto those, whom he in his Book had defended, through the malicious means and crafty circumvention of Crescens.

Justinus Martyr. Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 16.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 20. Conspires with the Apostles.

This made Pity of Heathens to the Christians of Asia.

Crescens a Philosopher procures the death of Justinus.

This Crescens was a Philosopher, conforming his life and manners to the Cynical Sect, whom because this Justinus had reproved in open audience, and had born away the victory of the truth which he defended; he therefore, as much as in him lay, did work and procure unto him this Crown of Martyrdom. And this did also Justin himself a Philosopher, no less famous by his Profession, foresee and declare in his foresaid Apology, telling almost all those things beforehand which should happen unto him, by these words, saying, And I look after this good turn, that I be slain going by the way, either of some of those whom I have named, and to have my brains beaten out with a Bat, or else of Crescens, whom I cannot call a Philosopher, but rather a vain Boaster. For it is not convenient to call him a Philosopher, which openly professeth things to him unknown, and whereof he hath no skill, saying and reporting of us, that the Christians be ungodly and irreligious, and all to please and flatter them which are seduced by Error.

Crescens a railing Philosopher, and a malicious railer.

For whether he objecteth against us the Doctrine of the Christians which he hath not read, yet is he very malicious, and worse than the unlearned Idiots, who for the most part use not to dispute, or judge of things they know not, and to bear witness of the same. Or put the case that he had read it, yet understandeth he not the majesty of the matters therein contained: or, if peradventure he understandeth them, and doth it for this purpose, that he would not be counted as one of them; then is he so much the more wicked and malicious, and the bondslave of vile and brastly, both fame and fear. For this I tell thie of him, giving you truly to understand, that for a truth, which I declare unto you, how that I have appofed him, and have put unto him many questions, whereby I know and perceive, that he understandeth nothing. But if so be that this our Disputation with him hath not come unto your ears, I am ready to communicate unto you again those questions which I demanded of him, which things shall not be unfit for your Princely honour to hear. But if ye know and understand both what things I have examined him of, as also what answer he hath made, it shall be apparent unto you, that he is altogether ignorant of our Doctrine and Learning; or else if he knoweth the same, he dare not utter it for fear of his Auditors, which thing, as I said before, is a proof that he is no Philosopher, but a slave to vain glory, which maketh none account of that, which his own Master Socrates had in so great estimation. And thus much of Justine, out of Justine himself.

Crescens proved an unlearned Philosopher.

A slave of fame and fear.

Now, to verifie that which Justine here of himself doth Prophesie, That Crescens would and did procure his death: Tacianus (a man brought up of a Child in the Institutions of the Gentiles, and obtained in the same not a little fame, and which also left behind him many good Monuments and Commentaries) writeth in his Book against the Gentiles in this sort, And Justine (saith he) that most excellent learned man, full well spake and uttered his mind, that the afore recited men were like unto Thieves or Liers by the High-way side. And in the said Book speaking afterward of certain Philosophers, the said Tacianus inhereth thus, Crescens therefore (saith he) when he came first into that great City, prefed all others in the vicious love of Children, and was very much given to covetousnes; and where he taught that men ought not to regard death, he himself doth fear death, and he did all his endeavour to oppres Justine with death, as with the most greatest evil that was, and all because that Justine, speaking truth, reproved the Philosophers to be men only for the Belly, and deceivers: and this was the cause of Justines Martyrdom. Hieronie in his Ecclesiastical Catalogue thus writeth, Justine, when in the City of Rome he had his Disputations, and had reproved Crescens the Cynick, for a great Blasphemer of the Christians, for a Bellygod, and a man fearing death, and also a follower of lust and lechery; at last by his endeavour and Conference was accused to be a Christian, and for Christ shed his blood in the year of our Lord one hundred fifty and four, under Marcus Antoninus, as the Chronicles do witness; Abbas Urspergensis, and Eusebius in his Chronicle, in the thirteenth year of the Emperor Antoninus.

Tacianus commended.

The praise of Justine Martyr.

Ex Catalogo Hieron.

The death and martyrdom of Justine Philosopher and Christian Martyr.

Among these above recited, is also to be numbered Praxedis, a blessed Virgin, the Daughter of a Citizen of Rome, who in the time of Anicetus there Bishop, was so brought up in the Doctrine of Christ, and so affected to his Religion, that she, with her sister Potentiana, bestowed all her Patrimony upon the relieving of poor Christians, giving all her time to fasting and prayer, and to the burying of the bodies of the Martyrs. And after she had made free all her Family with her Servants after the death of her sister, she also departed, and was buried in peace.

Praxedis, Potentiana, Christian Virgins.

Under the same Antoninus also suffered Ptolomeus and Lucius for the Confession of Christ, in a City of Egypt, called Alexandrina, whose History, because it is described in the Apology of Justinus Martyr, I thought therefore so to set forth the same, as it is alledged in Eusebius, declaring the manner and occasion thereof, Lib. 4. cap. 17. in words and effect as followeth, &c.

Ptolomeus Lucius, Martyrs. Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 17.

There was (saith he) a certain Woman married unto a Husband, who was given much to lasciviousnes, whereunto she her self in times past was also addicted. But the afterward being instructed in the Christian Religion, became chast her self, and also perswaded her Husband to live chastly; oftentimes telling him, that it was written in the Precepts of the Christians, that they should be punished eternally which lived not chastly and justly in this life. But he still continuing in his filthiness, thereby caused his Wife to estrange her self from his company. For why? the Woman thought it not convenient to continue in her Husbands company, which contemning the law of Nature, fought otherwise to satisfie his filthy appetite. Therefore the was purpofed to be divorced from him. But her Neighbours and Kinsfolk provoked her, by promising his amendment, to keep company again with him, and so she did. But he after this took his Journey into Alexandria, and when it was shewed her, that there he lived more licentiously than at any time before, for that she would not be counted partaker of his incestuous life, by coupling her self any longer with him, she gave him a Letter of Divorce, and so departed from him. Then her Husband, who ought rather to have rejoyced to have so honest and chast a Wife, which not only would not commit any dishonest thing her self, but also could not abide any lewd or misordered behaviour in her Husband, and that by this her separation she went about to reclaim him from his incest and wickednes to better amendment of life: he, in recompence to his Wife again, accused her to be a Christian, which at that time was no less than death. Whereupon she, being in great peril and danger, delivered up unto the Emperor (as Justinus in his Apology writing to the Emperor himself declareth) a supplication, desiring and craving of his Majesty, first, to grant her so much licence as to set her Family in order, and that done, afterward to come again and make answer to all that might or should be laid against her: whereunto the Emperor condescended. Then her Husband seeing that he could have no advantage against her, devised with himself how he might bring Ptolomeus (which was her Instructor in the Faith of Christ) in trouble and accusation: using the means of a certain Centurion, who was his very friend, whom he perswaded to examine Ptolomeus, whether he were a Christian or not. Ptolomeus (as one that loved the truth, and not thinking good to hide his Profession) confessed no less then to the Examiner, openly declaring that he had (as truth was) taught and professed the verity of Christian Doctrine. For who so denieth himself to be that he is, either condemneth in denying the thing that he is, or maketh himself unworthy of that, the Confession whereof he flyeth, which thing is never found in a true and sincere Christian. Thus then he being brought before Urbicius the Judge, and by him condemned to suffer: one Lucius being also a Christian, standing by, and seeing the wrong Judgment, and hasty Sentence of the Judge, said to Urbicius, What reason I pray you or equity is this, that this man who neither is Adulterer, nor Fornicator, nor Homicide, nor Felon; neither hath committed any such Crime, wherewith he may be charged, is thus condemned only for his Name and Confession of a Christian? This Condemnation, and this manner of Judgments (O Urbicius) are neither seemly for the vertuous Emperor, nor to the Philosopher his Son, nor yet for the Estate of his Senate of Rome.

The boldness and Christian constancy of Lucius.

Which words being heard, Urbicius making no further Examination of the matter, said unto Lucius, Me thinketh thou art also a Christian. And when Lucius had given him to understand that he was also a Christian, the Judge without further delay, commanded him to be had away to the place of Execution. To whom he answered, I thank you with all my heart, that you release me from most wicked Governors, and send me unto my good and most loving Father, being also the King of all Gods. And in like manner the third man also, coming unto him, and using the like liberty of Speech, had also the like sentence of Death and Condemnation, and was crowned also with the same Crown of Martyrdom. And thus much out of the Apology of Justinus, by the which story it may appear not to be true that Gratianus attributeth unto Higinus, Bishop of Rome, the ordaining of Causes Matrimonial, seeing that in Justinus time (who was in the same age of Higinus) the divorcement of this Woman in this History above touched, was not decided by any Ecclesiastical Law, or brought before any Bishop, but was brought before an Heathen Prince, and determined by the Law Civil.

Lucius condemned and martyred.

The third man also condemned and martyred.

Henricus de Erfordia recordeth out of the Martyrology of Ysuardus, of one Concordus a Minister of the City of Spolet, who in the Reign of this Antoninus Verus, because he would not Sacrifice unto Jupiter, but did spit in the face of the Idol, after divers and sundry Punishments sustained, at last with the Sword was beheaded. Vincentius in his tenth Book, Chap. 108. reciteth a long story of his Acts and Life, whereof some part perhaps may seem tolerable. But this verily appeareth to be false and fabulous, concerning the water flowing besides his Sepulchre in the forenamed City of Spolet, unto the which water was given (saith Vincentius) by the vertue of him, for whose Name he suffered, to restore light to the blind, to heal the sick, and to cast out Devils, &c. Which kind of vertue to open the eyes of the blind, and to expel Devils, neither doth God give to any Creature of water, neither is it like that Concordus the blessed Martyr did or would require any such thing at the hands of God.

Concordus martyr.

Ysuardus and Bede, Vincentius and Henricus de Erfordia, with other Authors more, make relation of divers other Martyrs that by sundry kinds of Torments were put to death, under the aforesaid Antoninus Verus: the names of whom be Symmetrius, Florellus, Pontianus, Alexander, Caius, Epipodius, Victor, Corona, Marcellus, Valerianus. The cause of whose Martyrdom was the reprehending of Idolatry, and because at the Emperors Commandment they would not sacrifice to Idols. Many forts of Punishments and Miracles are told of them: but at length the end of them all is this, that they were beheaded. Whereby it may be the more suspected, the Histories of these Writers not to be certain or true, as well touching these as also other Martyrs, as may appear in Vincentius, in Petrus de Natalibus, and other Authors of like fort. In which Authors they which list to read more of their Miracles there may find them.

Ex Ysuardo, Vincentio, & Henrico de Erford. Symmetrius, Florellus, Pontianus, Alexander, Caius, Epipod. Victor, Corona, Marcellus, Valerianus. Authors in the writing of Miracles of Martyrs suspected.

A little before, mention was made of Symphorisa, otherwise named Symphorosa, Wife of Getulus, with her seven Sons. This Getulus or Getulius was a Minister or Teacher (as witnesseth Martyrol. Adonis) in the City of Tiber, which Getulus, with Cerealis, Amantius, and Primitivus, by the Commandment of Adrian, were condemned to the fire, wherein they were martyred and put to death. The names moveover of the seven Sons of this Symphorosa, I find to be Crescens, Julianus, Nemesius, Primitivus, Justinus, Statteus, and Eugenius, whom the Chronicle of Ado declareth to be put to death at the Commandment of Adrian, being fastened to seven Stakes, and so racked up with a pully, and at last were thrust thorow, Crescens in the Neck, Julianus in the Breast, Nemesius in the Heart, Primitivus about the Navil, Justinus cut in every joynt of his body, Statteus run thorow with Spears, Eugenius cut asunder from the Breast to the lower parts, and then cast into a deep Pit, having the name by the Idolatrous Priests, entituled, Ad septem Biothanatos. After the Martyrdom of whom also Symphorosa the Mother did likewise suffer, as is before declared.

Under the said Antoninus Verus, and in the same Persecution, which raged not in Rome and Asia only, but in other Countries also, suffered the glorious and most constant Martyrs of Lions and Vienna, two Cities in France, giving to Christ a glorious Testimony, and to all Christian men a Spectacle or Example of singular Constancy and Fortitude in Christ our Saviour. The History of whom, because it is written and set forth by their own Churches, where they did suffer, mentioned in Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 2. I thought here to express the same in the form and effect of their own words, as there is to be seen. The title of which their Epistle written to the Brethren of Asia and Phrygia thus beginneth.

The Servants of Christ inhabiting the Cities of Vienna and Lions, to the Brethren in Asia and Phrygia, having the same Faith and Hope of Redemption with us: Peace, Grace, and Glory from God the Father, and from Jesus Christ our Lord.

THe greatness of this our Tribulation, the furious rage of the Gentiles against us, and the Torments which the blessed Martyrs suffered, neither can we in words, nor yet in writing exactly, as they deserve, set forth. For the Adversary with all his force, gave his endeavour to the working of such Preparatives, as he himself lifted, against his tyrannous coming, and in every place practised he and instructed his Ministers, how in most spiteful manner to set them against the Servants of God: so that not only in our Houses, Shops and Markets, we were restrained, but also were universally commanded, that none (so hardly) should be seen in any place. But God hath always mercy in store, and took out of their hands such as were weak amongst them, and other some did he set up as firm and immoveable Pillars, which by sufferance were able to abide all violent force, and valiantly to withstand the Enemy, enduring all their opprobrious punishment they could devise: to conclude, they fought this battel for that intent to come unto Christ, esteeming their great troubles but as light: thereby shewing that all that may be suffered in this present life, is not able to countervail the great Glory which shall be shewed upon us after this life. And first they patiently suffered whatsoever the multitude of franticke people running upon head did unto them, as Railings, Scourgings, Drawings and Halings, flinging of Stones, Imprisonings, and what other thing soever the rage of the multitude is wont to use and practise against their professed Enemies. Then afterward they being led into the Market-place, and there judged of the Captain and rest of the Potentates of the City, after their confession made openly before the multitude, were commanded again to prison, until the return of their chief Governor. After this they being brought before him, and he using all extremity that possibly he might against them: One Vetius Epagathus, one of the Brethren, replenished with fervent Zeal, both towards God and his Brethren, (whose Conversation, although he were a young man,) was counted as perfect as was the life of Zachary the Priest. For he walked diligently in all the Commandments and Justifications of the Lord, and in all Obedience towards his Brethren, blameless. He having within him the fervent zeal of Love, and Spirit of God, could not suffer that wicked Judgment which was given upon the Christians; but being vehemently displeased, delired that the Judge would hear the excuse which he was minded to make in the behalf of the Christians, in whom (saith he) is no impiety found. But the people cried again to those that were affistants with the chief Justice, that it might not be so (for indeed, he was a Nobleman born) neither did the Justice grant him his lawful requeſt, but only asked him, Whether he himself was a Christian or not? And he immediately with a loud and bold voice answered and said, I am a Christian. And thus was he received into the Fellowship of the Martyrs, and called the Advocate of the Christians. And he having the Spirit of God more plentifully in time, than had Zachary, the abundance thereof he declared, in that he gave his life in the defence of his Brethren, being a true Disciple of Christ, following the Lamb wheresoever he goeth.

Vetius Epagathus Martyr.

The flourishes of a godly young man.

The false-flights of certain weak Christians.

By this mans example, the rest of the Martyrs were the more animated to Martyrdom, and made more joyous with all courage of mind to accomplish the same. Some other there were unready and not so well prepared, and as yet weak, not well able to bear the vehemency of so great a conflict; of whom ten there were in number that fainted, minifring to us much heavinesse and lamentation. Who by their example caused the rest, which were not yet apprehended, to be less willing thereunto. Then were we all for the variableness of confession not a little affonied: not that we feared the punishment intended against us, but rather as having respect to the end, and fearing left any should fall. Every day there were apprehended such as were worthy to fulfil the number of them which were fallen: in so much that of two Churches, such as were chiefest, and which were the principal Governors of our Churches, were apprehended. With these also certain of the Ethnicks, being our Men-servants, were apprehended (for so the Governor commanded, that all of us in general without any respect should be taken) which Servants be overcome by Satan, and fearing the Torments which they saw the Saints to suffer, being also compelled thereunto by the means of the Souldiers, fained against us that we kept the Feastings of Thiestes, and Incest of Oedipus, and many such other Crimes, which are neither to be remembred, nor named of us, nor yet to be thought that ever any man would commit the like.

False slanders against the Christians.

The rage of the Heathen against the Christians.

A Letter of the brethren of France to the brethren of Asia.

These things being now buried abroad, every man began to shew cruelty against us, insomuch that those which before for similarity-sake were more gentle towards us, now vehemently disdained us, and waxed mad against us. And thus was now fulfilled that which was spoken by Christ, saying, The time will come, that whosoever killeth you, shall think that he doth God great good service. Then suffered the Martyrs of God such bitter Persecution as is passing to utter some blasphemy by all means possible. Marvelous therefore was the rage both of the people and Prince, especially against one Sanctus, which was Deacon of the Congregation of Vienna, and against Maturus, being but a little before baptized, but yet a worthy Souldier of Christ, and also against Attalus, being born in Pergama, which was the Foundation and Pillar of that Congregation, and also against Blandina: by whom Christ sheweth those things, which the World esteemed vile and abject, to be glorious in Gods sight, for the very love which in heart and deed they bare unto him, not in outward face only. For when all we were afraid, and specially her Mistress in the flesh, who also was her self one of the number of the aforesaid Martyrs, left haply for the weakness of body she would not stand strongly to her Confession, the foresaid Blandina was so replenished with strength and boldness, that they which had the tormenting of her by course, from morning to night, for very weariness gave over, and felt down, and were themselves overcome, confessing that they could do no more against her, and marveled that yet she lived, having her body so torn and rent: and testified that any one of those torments alone, without any more, had been enough to have pluckt the life from her body. But that blessed Woman, fighting this worthy battel, became stronger and stronger, and as often as she spake these words (I am a Christian, neither have we committed any evil) it was to her a marvelous comfort & bolding to abide the torments.

The cruel handling and great patience of Blandina.

Sanctus also, another of the Martyrs, who in the midst of his torments endured more pains than the nature of a man might away with, at what time the wicked purposed to have heard him utter some blasphemous words, for the greatness and intolerablenes of his torments and pains that he was in, abode notwithstanding in such constancy of mind, that neither he told them his name, nor what Country-man he was, nor in what City brought up, neither whether he was a Free-man or a Servant: but unto every question that was asked him, he answered in the Latin Tongue, I am a Christian, and this was all that he confessed both of his Name, City, Kindred, and all other things in the place of Execution: neither yet could the Gentiles get any more of him: whereupon both the Governor and Tormentors were the more vehemently bent against him. And when they had nothing to vex him withall, they clapped plates of brass red hot to the most tendreft parts of his body, wherewith his body indeed being scorched, yet he never shrunk for the matter, but was bold and constant in his Confession, being strengthened and moistened with the Fountain of lively water, flowing out of Christs side. Truly his body was a sufficient witness what torments he suffered: for it was all drawn together and most pitifully wounded and scorched, so that it had therewith loft the proper shape of a man, in whose suffering Christ obtained unspeakable Glory, for that he overcame his Adversaries, and, to the instruction of others, declared that nothing else is terrible, or ought to be feared where the love of God is, and nothing grievous wherein the Glory of Christ is manifested.

Sanctus a martyr.

The notable constancy of Sanctus.

The cruel torments of Sanctus.

And when those wicked men began after a certain time again to torment the Martyr, and hoped well to bring it to pass, that either they should overcome him in causing him to recant, by reiterating his torments, now when his body was so fore and swollen, that he might not suffer a man to touch him with his hand, or else, that he died under their hands, yet that thereby they should strike such fear into the hearts of the rest, as to cause them to deny Christ: they were not only disappointed herein, but also contrary to the expectation of men, his body was in the later punishment and torments supplied and restored, and took the first shape and use of the members of the same, so that the same his second torment was by the Grace of Christ (instead of punishment) a safe Medicine.

A miraculous working of God.

Also Satan now thinking to have setled himself in the heart of one Bibliades, being one of them which had denied Christ, and thinking to have caused her, being a weak and feeble woman in Faith, to have damned her Soul, in blaspheming the Name of God, brought her to the place of Execution: enforcing to wrest some wicked thing out of the mouth of the Christians. But she in the middle of her torments, returning to her self, and waked as it were out of her dead sleep by that temporal pain, called to her remembrance the pains of Hell fire, and against all means expectations reviled the Tormentors, saying, How should we Christians eat young Infants (as ye reported of us) for whom it is not lawful to eat the blood of any Beast?

Bibliades an holy Martyr.

Upon that, ſo ſoon as ſhe had confeſſed her ſelf to be a Chriſtian,ſhe was martyred with the reſt.Thus when Chriſt had ended thoſe tyrannical Torments, by the patience and ſufferance of our Saints, the Devil yet invented other Engins and Inſtruments. For when the Chriſtians were caft into priſon, they were ſhut up in dark and ugly dungeons, and were drawn by the feet in a Rack or Engine made for that purpoſe,even unto the fifth hole. And many other ſuch punifhments ſuffered they, which the furious Miniſters, ſtirred up with deviliſh fury, are wont to put men unto: ſo that very many of them were ſtrangled and killed in priſons, whom the Lord in this manner would have to enjoy everlaſting life, and ſet forth his Glory. And ſurely theſe good men were ſo pitifully tormented,that if they had had all the helps and medicines in the world,it was thought impoſſible for them to live, and to be reſtored. And thus they remaining in priſon, deſtitute of all humane help, were ſo ſtrengthened of the Lord, and both in body and mind confirmed that they comforted and ſtirred up the minds of the reſt: the younger ſort of them, which were later apprehended, and put in priſon, whoſe bodies had not yet felt the laſh of the Whip, were not able to endure the ſharpneſs of their impriſonment, but died for the ſame.

Photinus a bleſſed Martyr.

The bleſſed Photinus,who was Deacon to the Biſhop of Lions, about fourſcore and nine years old, and a very feeble or weak man, and could ſcarcely draw breath for the imbecillity of his body: yet was he of a lively courage and ſpirit, and for the great deſire he had of Martyrdom, when he was brought unto the Judgment-Seat,although his body was feeble and weak,both becauſe of his old age, and alſo through ſickneſs, yet was his Soul or life preſerved to this purpoſe, that by the ſame Chriſt might triumph and be glorified. He,being by the Souldiers brought to the place of Judgment, many Citizens and men of great ability following him,and the whole multitude crying upon him diverſly, as though he had been Chriſt himſelf, gave a good teſtimony. For being demanded of the chief Ruler, what was the Chriſtian mans God? He anſwered, If thou be worthy to know thou ſhalt know. He, being with theſe words ſomewhat near touched, cauſed him to be very ſore beaten. For thoſe that ſtood next him,did him all the ſpite and diſpleaſure that they could both with hand and foot, having no regard at all to his old age or white hairs. And they which were further off,whatſoever came next to hand,they threw at him, and every man thought that he did very wickedly refrain,that withheld his hand from doing the like. For by this means they thought that they did revenge the quarrel of their gods. Photinus now, even as it were gaſping after life,was thrown into priſon,and within two days after died.

The rage of the people againſt Photinus.

And here is the mighty Providence of God, and the unſpeakable mercy of Jeſus Chriſt declared,which providence, being aſſured amongſt a fraternity, is never deſtitute of the aid of Jeſus Chriſt. For thoſe which in their firſt Perſecution denied Chriſt, they alſo were put in priſon, and made partakers of the others affliction.Neither yet did it any whit at all at that time help them that had denied Chriſt, but they which confeſſed him were impriſoned as Chriſtians, neither was there any other Crime objected againſt them; but the other ſort taken like Homicides and wicked Doers, were laid hand on, and had double more puniſhment than the others had. Theſe men were refreſhed with the joy of Martyrdom, the hope of Gods Promiſes, the love towards Chriſt, and the Spirit of God: the others, their Conſciences accuſed them,and that very ſore,inſomuch that by their gate, their Countenances bewraied unto the reſt their guilty Conſciences. For the Chriſtians went forth having chearful Countenances,very much adorned with Glory and Grace, inſomuch that the very Bonds wherewith they were tied, ſet them out as men in ſeemly Apparel, and like as Brides when they be decked in gorgeous and gay Garments, and therewithal favoured as of the redolent ſmell of Chriſt, ſo that it might be ſuppoſed them to be anointed with ſome ſweet Balm: whereas the others were doubtful and ſad, abject, ill favoured, filled with all ſhame, and furthermore reviled of the Gentiles themſelves,as wretches degenerate having the Crime of Homicide, and deſtitute of the moſt precious, glorious, and lively Calling of the Chriſtian name. And truly by theſe fights the reſt were confirmed, and being apprehended, confeſſed Chriſt without any ſtaggering, not having ſo much as the thought of any ſuch deviliſh mind of denial. And in the ſame Epiſtle of the foreſaid Brethren of France, writing to the Brethren of Aſia, it followeth in this manner: After theſe things done, the Martyrdom of theſe holy Saints was divided diverſly into divers kinds and forms, as the offering to God the Father a Garland decked with divers and ſundry kinds of colours and flowers. For it ſo behoved the worthy Champions of God, after they had ſuffered divers kinds of torments, and ſo won a triumphant Victory, to obtain great reward of Immortality.

The comfort of the godly ſtanding to their Confeſſion.

The deniers of their confeſſion comfortleſs,and notwithſtanding puniſhed.

Then Maturus, Blandina, and Attalus were brought together to the common Scaffold, there in the face of the people to be caſt and devoured of the Beaſts. And Maturus, with Sanctus, being brought the ſecond time to the Scaffold, ſuffered again all kind of torments, as though hitherto they had ſuffered nothing at all: yea rather the Adverſary being oftentimes put to the worſt, they as ſtriving for the Crown, ſuffered again more ſcourgings, the tearing of wild Beaſts, and what thing elſe ſoever the frantick people on every ſide cryed for and willed. And above all the reſt they brought an Iron Chair, in the which their bodies being ſet, were ſo fried and ſcorched, as on a Grid-Iron fried on the coals, and filled with the favour of the frying all the people that ſtood by. And yet for all that the torments ceaſed not, but waxed more fierce and mad againſt them,labouring to overcome the patience of the Saints. Notwithſtanding all this, they could not get out of Sanctus mouth any other thing but the confeſſion which at the beginning he declared. And thus theſe holy men, after they had long continued alive in this their moſt horrible conflict, at the length were ſlain, being made all that whole day a ſpectacle unto the world, in place and in ſtead of the games and fights which were wont to be exhibited to the people. And thus much concerning Maturus and Sanctus.

The ſtedfaſt handling of Gods people.

Maturus and Sanctus martyred.

Now concerning Blandina,ſhe being faſtned upon ſtake, was caſt to the ravening Beaſts to be devoured; which thing was not done without the determinate will of God: to this end,that while ſhe ſeemed to hang as it were upon a Croſs, by the ferventneſs of her prayer ſhe might comfort the reſt of the Saints, as beholding their Chriſt with their bodily eyes,which in that Agony ſuffered for them all; and that all which believe in him, and ſuffer for the Glory of Chriſt, might be aſſured to live with him for ever. And when they ſaw that no Beaſt would come near her thus hanging, they took her down from the Tree, and caſt her again into priſon till another time,that ſhe,having the victory of many battels, might triumph over that ugly Serpent the Devil, and that ſhe being a weak and ſilly woman, and not regarded, armed with Chriſt the invincible Conqueror, might incourage her Brethren, and by the enduring of this battel might win a Crown of Incorruptible Glory.

Blandina brought forth again.

Now to Attalus; who, being alſo required and called for of the people to puniſhment already prepared (for his Conſcience ſake) cometh forth to the fight. For he being worthily exerciſed in the Chriſtian Profeſſion, was always a witneſs and a maintainer of our Doctrine. Therefore when the preſs of people was about the Scaffold,and the table carried before him, wherein was written in the Roman Tongue, This is Attalus the Chriſtian: then the people were in a marvellous rage againſt him. But the Governor, underſtanding that he was a Roman,commanded him again to priſon, with the reſt of his Priſon-Fellows: whereof he wrote to the Emperor, and waited for anſwer what his pleaſure herein was. The Priſoners were not idle in the mean ſeaſon, nor unprofitable to their Brethren, but by their patience the unſpeakable mercy of Chriſt ſhined out. For thoſe which were dead before were now revived by them that lived, and they which were Martyrs reſtored them which were none, and the Church did much rejoyce, as receiving them again alive, whom ſhe had loſt before as dead. For many of them, which before had denied, now by their denial were reſtored and ſtirred up, and learned to be Confeſſors. And now being revived and ſtrengthened, and taſting the ſweetneſs of him which deſireth not the death of a Sinner, but is merciful to the Penitent, came of their own accord to the Judgment-Seat again, that they might be examined of the Judge. And for that the Emperor had written back again to him, that all the Confeſſors ſhould be puniſhed, and the others let go, and that Seſſions or Sizes were now begun, which, for the multitude that had repair thither out of every quarter, was marvelous great: he cauſed all the the holy Martyrs to be brought brought thither,that the multitude might behold them,and once again examined them; and as many of them as he thought had the Roman freedom he beheaded, the reſidue he gave to the Beaſts to be devoured. And truly Chriſt was much glorified by thoſe which a little before had denied him,which again,contrary to the expectation of the Infidels, confeſſed him even unto the death. For they were examined apart from the reſt,becauſe of their delivery; which being found confeſſors, were joyned to the company of the Martyrs,and had with them their part. But there were then ſome abroad which had no Faith at all, neither yet ſo much as the feeling of the Wedding Garment,nor any cogitation at all of the fear of God, but blaſphemed his ways by the lewd converſation of their life, even ſuch as were the Children of damnation. All the reſidue joyned themſelves to the Congregation: which when they were examined, one Alexander a Phrygian born, and a Phyſitian which had dwelt long in France, and known almoſt of all,for the love he had to God, and boldneſs of ſpeaking (neither was he void of the Apoſtolical love) one Alexander, I ſay, ſtanding ſomewhat near to the Bar, by ſigns and becks perſwaded ſuch as were examined, to confeſs Chriſt: ſo that by his countenance ſometime rejoycing, ſome other while ſorrowing, he was deſcried of the ſtanders by. The people not taking in good part to ſee thoſe which now recanted by and by again to ſtick to their firſt Confeſſion,they cried out againſt Alexander as one that was the cauſe of all this matter. And when he was inforced by the Judge,and demanded what Religion he was of? he anſwered, I am a Chriſtian. He had no ſooner ſpoken the word, but he was judged to the Beaſts of them to be devoured.

Alexander the Phryg. a martyred.

The next day following,Attalus,of whom I made mention a little before,and Alexander,were brought forth together. For the Governor granting Attalus unto the people, he was baited again of the Beaſts. When theſe men were brought to the Scaffold, and had taken a taſte of all the Inſtruments that there were prepared for their Execution, and had ſuffered the greateſt Agony they could put them to,they were alſo at the length ſlain: of whom Alexander never gave ſo much as a ſigh, nor held his peace, but from the bottom of his heart praiſed and prayed to the Lord. But Attalus,when he was ſet in the Iron Chair,and began to fry, and the frying favour of his burning body began to ſmell, he ſpake to the multitude in the Roman Language; Behold (ſaith he) this which you do is to eat mans fleſh; for we neither eat men, nor yet commit any other wickedneſs. And being demanded what was the name of their God? Our God (ſaith he) hath no ſuch name as men have. Then ſaid they, Now let us ſee whether your God can help you, and take you out of our hands or not.

The worthy patience and conſtancy of Attalus.

Blandina, and Ponticus are again brought forth.

After this being the laſt day of the Spectacle, Blandina again, and one Ponticus, a Child of fifteen years old was brought forth, and this was every day, to the intent that they ſeeing the puniſhment of their Fellows might be compelled thereby to ſwear by their Idols. But becauſe they conſtantly abode in their purpoſe,and defied their Idols,the whole multitude was in a rage with them, neither ſparing the age of the Child, nor favouring the Sex of the woman, but put them to all the puniſhment and pain they could deviſe, and often times inforced them to ſwear, and yet were not able to compel them thereunto. For Ponticus,being ſo animated of his ſiſter,as the Ethnicks ſtanding by did ſee, after that he had ſuffered all torments and pains gave up the ghoſt. This bleſſed Blandina therefore being the laſt that ſuffered, after ſhe had like a worthy Mother given exhortations unto her Children, and had ſent them before as Conquerors to their heavenly King,and had called to her remembrance all their battels and conflicts, ſo much rejoyced of her Children death, and ſo haſtned her own, as though ſhe had been bidden to a Bridal, and not in caſe to be thrown to the wild Beaſts. After this her pitiful whipping, her delivery to the Beaſts,and her torments upon the Grid-Iron, at the length ſhe was put in a Net, and thrown to the wild Bull; and when ſhe had been ſufficiently gored and wounded with the horns of the ſame Beaſt,and felt nothing of all that chanced to her, for the great hope and conſolation ſhe had in Chriſt and heavenly things, was thus ſlain,inſomuch that the very Heathen men themſelves confeſſed that there was never woman put to death of them that ſuffered ſo much as this woman did. Neither yet was their furious cruelty thus aſſwaged againſt the Chriſtians For the cruel barbarous people, like wild Beaſts, when they be moved, knew not when the time was to make an end, but invented new and ſundry torments every day againſt our bodies. Neither yet did it content them when they had put the Chriſtians to death, for that they wanted the ſenſe of men: for which cauſe both the Magiſtrate and people were vexed at the very hearts, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which ſaith, He that is wicked,let him be wicked ſtill:and he that is juſt,let him be more juſt.For thoſe which in their Priſons they ſtrangled,they threw after to the dogs, ſetting keepers both day and night to watch them, that they ſhould not be buried, and bringing forth the remnant of their bones and bodies,ſome half burned,ſome left of the wild Beaſts, and ſome all to be mangled,alſo bringing forth heads of others which were cut off, and in like manner committed by them to the charge of the keepers to ſee them remain unburied.

Apoc.22.

The Geniles grinded and gnaſhed at the Chriſtians with their teeth, ſeeking which way they might amplifie their puniſhment:ſome other flouted and mocked them,extolling their Idols, attributing unto them the cauſe of this cruelty and vengeance ſhewed to us.Such as were of the meeker ſort, and ſeemed to be moved with ſome pity, did hit us in the teeth,ſaying,Where is your God that you ſo much boaſt of? and what helpeth this your Religion for which you grave your lives? Theſe were the ſundry paſſions and affects of the Gentiles, but the Chriſtians in the mean while were in great heavineſs,that they might not bury the bodies and relicks of the holy Martyrs. Neither could the dark night ſerve them to that purpoſe, nor any intreaty nor waging them with money,which were appointed for watch-men: but they ſo narrowly looked unto the matter, as though they ſhould have gotten great benefit and profit thereby.

Thus were the bodies of the Martyrs made a wondring ſtock, and lay ſix days in the open ſtreets; at length they burned them, and threw their aſhes into the river of Rodes; ſo that there might appear no remnant of them upon the earth. And this did they as though they had been able to have pulled God out of his Seat,and to have let the regeneration of the Saints, and taken from them the hope of the Reſurrection, whereof they being perſwaded (ſaid they) bring in this new and ſtrange Religion, and ſet thus light by death and puniſhment. Atque hæc ex Epiſtola Viennenſium, &c.

Among others that ſuffered under Antoninus, mention was made alſo of Juſtinus,who(as it is ſaid before) exhibited two Apologies, concerning the defence of Chriſtian Doctrine, the one to the Senate of Rome,and the other to Antoninus Pius the Emperor, concerning whoſe ſuffering, and the cauſes thereof is partly before declared: this Juſtine was born in Neapoli, in the Country of Paleſtine, whoſe Father was Priſcus Bacchius, as he himſelf doth teſtifie, by whom in his youth he was ſet to School to learn, where in proceſs of time, he became a famous and worthy Philoſopher, of whoſe excellency many learned and notable men do record.For firſt he being altogether inflamed and raviſhed with deſire of knowledge, would in no wiſe be ſatisfied in his mind,before he had gotten Inſtructors ſingularly ſeen in all kind of Philoſophy,whereupon he writeth of himſelf in the beginning of his Dialogue Cum Triphone thus, declaring that in the beginning he being delirous of that Sect and Society, applied himſelf to be the Scholar to a certain Stoick, and remaining with him a time, when he nothing profited in Divine knowledge (whereof the Stoick had no skill, and affirmed the knowledge thereof not to be neceſſary) he forſook him, and went to another of the Sect of the Peripateticks, a ſharp-witted man, as he thought; with whom after he had been a while, he demanded of him a ſtipend for his teaching, for the better confirmation of their familiarity. Whereupon Juſtine,accounting him as no Philoſopher, left him, and departed. And yet not ſatisfied in mind,but deſirous to hear of further learning in Philoſophy, adjoyned himſelf to one that profeſſed the Pythagorean Sect, a man of great fame,and one who made no ſmall account of himſelf. Whom after he had followed a time, his Maſter demanded of him whether he had any ſight in Muſick, Aſtronomy, and Geometry, without the ſight of which Science, he ſaid he could not be apt to receive the Knowledge of Vertue and Felicity, unleſs before he had uſed to apply his Mind from ſenſible matters to the Contemplation of things intelligible. And speaking much in the commendation of these Sciences, how profitable and necessary they were: after that Justine had declared himself not to be seen therein, the Philosopher gave him over, which grieved Justine not a little, and so much the more, because he thought his Master to have some knowledge in those Sciences. After this Justine considering with himself what time was requisite to the learning of these Sciences, and thinking not to defer any longer, thought best to resort to the Sect of the Platonists: for the great fame that ran of them: wherefore he chose unto him a singular learned man of that Sect, which lately was come to those parts, and so remaining with him seemed to profit not a little in contemplation of supernal things, and invisible forms, insomuch that he thought shortly to aspire to such sharpeness of wit and wisdom, that out of hand he might atchieve to the comprehension and contemplation of God, which is the end of Plato his Philosophy. And in this manner he bestowed his youth: but afterward he growing to a riper age, how and by what means the said Justine came to the knowledge and profession of Christianity, it followeth likewise in his said first Apology: where he affirmeth of himself (as witnesseth Eusebius in his fourth Book) that when he did behold the Christians in their Torments and Sufferings to be so constant in their Profession, was therewith marvelously moved: after this manner reasoning with himself, that it was impossible for that kind of people to be subject to any Vice or Carnality, which Vices of their own nature are not able to sustain any sharp Adversity, much less the bitterness of death. The fight whereof helped him not a little (being of his own nature inclined to the searching of true Knowledge and Vertue) to begin thereby to love and imbrace Christian Religion, for so he doth witness of himself in the end of the first Apology: signifying there how it was his seeking and endeavour to attain to Christianity: understanding how the Christians by malice of wicked Persons were compelled to suffer wrong and torments, and to be evil spoken of. By fight whereof, as he saith himself, he became a Christian, through this occasion. For being thus afflicted in his mind, as aforesaid, it came in his head for his more quietness to go aside to some Desart and solitary place void of Concourse of People, unto a Village or Grange near to the Sea side: whither as he approached, thinking there to be all alone, there meeteth with him an old ancient Father of a comely Visage and gentle Behaviour, who following him a little off, began to reason with him: where after long Disputation, when the old man had declared unto him, that there was no knowledge of truth amongst the Philosophers, which neither knew God, neither were aided by the Holy Ghost: and further had reasoned with him of the immortality of the Soul, of the reward of the Godly and punishment of the Wicked: then Justine being confirmed with his Reasons and Arguments, yielded to him of his own accord; and demanded of him by what means he might attain to that true knowledge of God, whereof he had spoken: who then counselled him to read and search the Prophets, adjoyning therewith prayer. But what Master (quoth Justine) should I use for the instruction thereof, and who shall be able to help us if these Philosophers (as you say) lack the truth, and are void of the same? To whom the old Father answered, There have been (said he) many years before these Philosophers, other more ancient than all these, which being accounted for Philosophers were just and beloved of God: who spake by the Spirit of God, foreseeing and prophesying these things which we see now come to pass, and therefore they are called Prophets. These only have known the truth, and revealed it to men, neither fearing nor pasting for any; who were seduced with no Opinions of mans Invention, but only spake and taught those things which they themselves both heard and saw, being inspired with the holy Spirit of God: whose Writings and Works yet to this day remain, out of which the Reader may receive great profit and knowledge of things as concerning the first Creation of the World, and end of the same, with all other things necessary to be known of every true Philosopher which will give credit unto them. Neither in their teaching do they use any demonstration, as being more certain of themselves, than that they need any such Demonstration to be made, forasmuch as the accomplishing and the end of things both past and now present, constraineth us of necessity to believe the words and Doctrine which they taught: which men not only therefore are to be believed, but also for their Miracles and Wonders done, are worthy of Credit; for that they both preached of God the Maker and Creator of all things, and also did Prophesie before of Christ his Son to be sent of Him; the which, the false Prophets being seduced with false and wicked Spirits, neither have done, nor do, but only take upon them to work certain prodigious Wonders for men to gaze at, setting out thereby to the World false and unclean Spirits. But then afore all things, make thy prayer that the Gate of Light may be opened unto thee, for otherwise these things cannot be attained unto of every man, but only of such to whom God and his Christ giveth understanding.

Prophets to be credited for two causes.

These things, with much more (which now leisure forveth not to prosecute) after the foresaid old Father had declared unto him, he departed, exhorting him well to follow the things which he had spoken: and after that Justine (as he himself witnesseth) saw him no more. Immediately after this, Justine being all inflamed as with fire kindled in his Breast, began to conceive a Love and Zeal towards the Prophets and all such as were favoured of Christ: And thus he, revolving in his mind more and more these words, found only this Philosophy among all other Professions both sure and profitable, and so became he a Philosopher, and in time by these means afterwards he was made a Christian and baptized. But where he received this holy Sacrament of Baptism it is not read of, nor yet by what occasion he left his Country and came to Rome. This only we read in Jerome, that he was in Rome, and there used certain Exercises which he called Diatribae, disputing there with Crescens a Cynical Philosopher, as is before touched. But this is certain, how that Justine after he had received the Profession of Christian Religion, became an earnest Defender of the same, travelling and disputing against all the Adversaries thereof, fearing neither peril of life nor danger of death, whereby he might maintain the Doctrine of Christ against the malicious Blasphemers, and also augment the number of Christian Believers, as may appear by his vehement Disputations against the Heathen Philosophers: also moreover it well appeareth in that long disputation which he had with one Tripho at Ephesus, as also in his Confutations of Heresies. Furthermore, his Conflicts and Apologies which with great courage and security he exhibited against the Persecutors of the Christians, both to the Emperor and the Magistrates, yea and the whole Senate of Rome, do testifie the same.

Justinus an earnest defender of Christ.

Two apologies of Justinus.

Of the which Apologies, the first he wrote to the Senate of Rome, and after to Antoninus Pius the Emperor, as is before mentioned; where in the first writing with great liberty to the Senate, he declared that of necessity he was compelled to write and utter his mind and Conscience to them. For that in persecuting of the Christians they did neglect their duty, and highly offended God, and therefore need they had to be admonished. And further writing to Urbicius Lieutenant of the City, said, That he put men to death and torments for no Offence committed, but for the Confession only of the Name of Christ: which proceedings and judgments neither became the Emperor, nor his Son, nor the Senate: defending moreover in the said Apology, and purging the Christians of such Crimes as falsly were laid and objected against them by the Ethnicks.

The fame of his apologies.

And likewise in his second Apology writing to Antoninus the Emperor, and his Successors, with like gravity and free liberty declareth unto them how they had the Name, commonly being reputed and taken as vertuous Philosophers, Maintainers of Justice, Lovers of Learning; but whether they were so, their Acts declared. As for him, neither for flattery, nor favour at their hands, he was constrained thus to write unto them; but only to sue unto them, and desire a serious and righteous kind of dealing in their Judgments and Sentences (for it becometh Princes to follow Uprightness and Piety in their Judgments, not Tyranny and Violence,) and also in plain words chargeth as well the Emperor as the Senate with manifest wrong, for that they did not grant the Christians that which is not denied to all other Malefactors, judging men to death not convicted, but only for the hatred of the Name. Other men which be appeached (said he) in Judgment, ment, are not condemned before they are convicted: but on Us you take our Name only for the Crime, when as indeed you ought to see Justice done upon our Accusers. And again (saith he) If a Christian being accused only deny that Name, him you Release, being not able to Charge him with any other Offence: but if he stand to his Name, only for his Confession you cast him; where indeed it were your duty rather to examine their manner of life, what thing they confess or deny, and according to their Demerits to see Justice done.

The Lord take away this spirit of fury, condemning innocents before they be convicted.

And in the same further he saith, You examine not the Causes, but incensed with rash Affections, as with the fear of Fury, ye slay and murther them not convicted, without any respect of Justice. And further he addeth, Some peradventure will say, certain of them have been apprehended and taken in evil Doings: as though (saith he) you used to enquire upon them being brought afore you, and not commonly to condemn them before due examination of their Offence for the Cause above mentioned. Where also in the end of the said Apology after this manner he reprehendeth them, You do degenerate (quoth he) from the goodness of your Predecessors, whose Example you follow not, for your Father Adrian of famous Memory caused to be proclaimed, That Christians accused before the Judge should not be condemned, unless they were found guilty of some Notorious Crime. I find that all his vehement and grave Apology standeth upon most strong and firm probations, denying, that the Christians ought by Conscience at the Will and Commandment of the Emperor and Senate to do sacrifice to the Idols: for the which they being condemned, affirm, that they suffer open wrong; affirming moreover, that the true and only Religion is the Religion of the Christians, whose Doctrine and Conversation hath no fault. Justinus, although with these and such like Persuasions, he did not so prevail with the Emperor, to cause him to love his Religion, and become a Christian (for that is not written) yet thus much he obtained, that Antoninus writing to his Officers in Asia in the behalf of the Christians, required and commanded them, that those Christians only which were found guilty of any Trespass should suffer, and such as were not convicted, should not therefore only for the Name be punished, because they were called Christians. By these it is apparent with what Zeal and Faith this Justinus did strive against the Persecutors, which (as he said) could kill only, but could not hurt.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 16. A place of Rhythmius found fault by.

This Justinus by the means and malice of Crescens the Philosopher (as is before declared) suffered Martyrdom under Marcus Antoninus Verus, a little after that Polycarpus was martyred in Asia, as witnesseth Eusebius, lib. 4. Here is to be gathered how Epiphanius was deceived in the time of his death, saying, That he suffered under Rusticus the President, and Adrian the Emperor, being of thirty years of age; which indeed agreeth neither with Eusebius, nor Hieronie, nor Suide, nor others more, which manifestly declare and testifie how he exhibited his Apology unto Antoninus Pius which came after Adrian. Thus hath thou (good Reader) the life of this learned and blessed Martyr, although partly touched before, yet now more fully and amply discoursed for the better commendation of his excellent and notable Vertues, of whose final end thus writeth Photius, saying, That he suffering for Christ, died chearfully and with honour.

Cum dignatione & laude pro Christi Religione.

The singular modesty of the foresaid Martyrs declared. Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 2.

Thus have ye heard the whole Discourse of Justinus and of the blessed Saints of France, Vettius, Zacharias, Sanctus, Maturus, Attalus, Blandina, Alexander, Alciades, with others, recorded and set forth by the writing of certain Christian Brethren of the same Church and place of France. In the which foresaid writing of theirs, moreover appeareth the great meekness and modest constancy of the said Martyrs described in these words; Such Followers were they of Christ (who when he was in the Form of God, thought it no robbery to be equal with God, being in the same Glory with him,) that they not once nor twice, but oft times suffered Martyrdom; and taken again from the Beasts, and bearing Wounds, Tearings and Scars in their Bodies, yet neither would count themselves Martyrs, neither would they suffer us so to call them: but if any of us either by word or Letter would call them Martyrs, they did vehemently rebuke them, saying, That the name of Martyrdom was to be given to Christ the faithful and true Martyr, the first born of the Dead, and the Captain of Life; testifying moreover, That Martyrdom belongeth to such, who by their Martyrdom were already passed out of this life: and whom Christ by their worthy Confession hath received unto Himself, and hath sealed up their Martyrdom by their end finished: as for them which were not yet confirmatured, they (said they) were not worthy the names of Martyrs, but only were humble and worthy Confessors, desiring also their Brethren with Tears to pray without ceasing for their Confirmation. Thus they performing indeed that which belongeth to true Martyrs, in resisting the Heathen with much liberty and great patience, without all fear of man, being replenished with the fear of God, refused to be named of their Brethren for Martyrs. And after in the said writing it followeth more, They humbled themselves under the mighty hand of God, by which they were greatly exalted; then they rendred to all men a reason of their Faith, they accused no man, they loosed all, they bound none, and for them which so evil did entreat them they prayed, following the example of Stephen the perfect Martyr, which said, O Lord, impute not their sin to them. And after again, Neither did they proudly disdain against them which fell, but of such as they had imparted to them they lacked, bearing toward them a motherly affection, shedding their plentiful tears for them to God the Father, and prayed for their life and salvation; and as God gave it them, they also did communicate to their Neighbours, and thus they as Conquerors of all things departed to God. They loved peace, and leaving the same to us, they went to God, neither leaving any molestation to their Mother, nor Sedition or trouble to their Brethren, but joy, peace, concord, and love to all.

The holy Martyrs refuse to be called Martyrs.

Out of the same writing moreover concerning these Martyrs of France afore mentioned, is recorded also another History not unworthy to be noted, taken out of the same Book of Eusebius cap. 3. which History is this:

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 3. of Alciades. The strict fasting of Alciades corrected by the Holy Ghost.

There was among these constant and blessed Martyrs, one Alcibiades, as is above specified: which Alcibiades ever used a very strict diet, receiving for his food and sustenance nothing else but only Bread and Water. When this Alcibiades now being cast into Prison, went about to accustom the same strictness of diet, after his usual manner; it was before revealed by God to Attalus afore mentioned, one of the said Company, being also the same time imprisoned after his first conflict upon the Scaffold, that Alcibiades did not well in that he refused to use and take the Creatures of God, and also thereby ministred to others a pernicious occasion of offensive example. Whereupon Alcibiades being advertised, and reformed, began to take all things boldly, and with giving thanks. Whereby may appear to all scrupulous Consciences, not only a wholsome Instruction of the Holy Ghost, but also here is to be noted how in those days they were not destitute of the Grace of God, but had the Holy Spirit of God to be their Instructor. Hæc Euseb.

A Lesson for scrupulous Consciences.

Irenæus newly made Minister, and commended to Eleutherius.

The foresaid Martyrs of France at the same time commended Irenæus, newly then made Minister, with their Letters unto Eleutherius Bishop of Rome, as witnesseth Eusseb. in the tenth Chapter of the said Book, which Irenæus first was the hearer of Polycarpus, then made Minister (as is said) under these Martyrs: and after their death made Bishop afterward of Lions in France, and succeeded after Photinus. Besides this Justinus, there was also the same time in Asia, Claudius Apollinaris, or Apollinarius Bishop of Hierapolis, and also Melito Bishop of Sardis, an eloquent and learned man, much commended of Tertullian, who succeeding after the time of the Apostles, in the Reign of this Antoninus Verus, exhibited unto him learned and eloquent Apologies in defence of Christs Religion, like us Quadratus and Aristides above mentioned did unto the Emperor Adrian, whereby they moved him somewhat to stay the rage of his Persecution. In like manner did this Apollinaris and Melito (stirred up by God) adventure to defend in writing the cause of the Christians unto this Antoninus. Of this Melito Eusebius in his fourth Book making mention, excepteth certain places of his Apology in these words, as followeth, Now, faith he, which was never seen before, the godly suffer Persecution by occasion of certain Proclamations and Edicts proclaimed throughout Asia, for villanious Sycophants, Robbers

Apollinaris and Melito exhibited Apologies to the Emperor for the Christians.

Robbers and Spoilers of other mens Goods, grounding themſelves upon thoſe Proclamations, and taking occaſion of them, rob openly nights and day, and ſpoil thoſe which do no harm. And it followeth after, Which if it be done by your Commandment, be it ſo, well done; for a good Prince will never command but good things, and ſo we will be contented to ſuſtain the honour of this death. This only we moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, that calling before you and examining the Authors of this tumult and contention, then your Grace would juſtly judge whether we are worthy of cruel death, or quiet life. And then if it be not your pleaſure, and that it proceedeth not by your occaſion (which indeed againſt your barbarous Enemies were too bad) the more a great deal we are Petitioners to your Highneſs, that hereafter you will vouchſafe to hear Us thus ſo vexed and oppreſſed with theſe kind of Villainous Robberies. And verily our Philoſophy and Doctrine did firſt among the barbarous take place, which Doctrine firſt in the days of Auguſtus your Predeceſſor, when it did Reign and Flouriſh, thereby your Empire became moſt famous and fortunate: and from that time more and more the State of the Roman Empire increaſed in Honour, whereof you moſt happily were made Succeſſor, and ſo ſhall your Son too. Honour therefore this Philoſophy which with your Empire ſprang up, and came in with Auguſtus, which your Progenitors above all other honoured and moſt eſteemed. And verily this is no ſmall Argument of a good beginning, that ſince our Doctrine flouriſhed in the Empire, no miſfortune or loſs happened from Auguſtus's time: but contrary, always Victory, good and honourable years, as ever any man would wiſh: only among all, and of all, Nero and Domitian, being kindled by divers naughty and ſpiteful perſons, cavillingly objected againſt our Doctrine; of whom this ſycophantical ſlandering of Us by naughty cuſtom firſt came and ſprang up. But your godly Fathers, eſſaying the ignorance of theſe, oftentimes by their writing corrected their temerarious Attempts in that behalf: among whom your Grandfather Adrian with many others is read of, to have written to Fundane the Proconſul and Lieutenant of Aſia: and your Father, your own Father, I ſay, with whom you ruled in all things, wrote to the Cities under his Signet, as the Larriſens, Theſſalonicenſes, Athenienſes, and Grecians, raſhly to innovate or alter nothing. Of your Highneſs therefore, who in this caſe is of that Sect as your Predeceſſors were, yea and of a more benigne and Philoſophical Mind, we are in good hope to obtain our Petition and Requeſt.

The Books of the Old Teſtament authentick and received.

Thus much out of the Apology of Melito, who writing to Oneſimus, giveth to us this benefit, to know the true Catalogue and the names of all the authentick Books of the Old Teſtament, received in the ancient time of the Primitive Church. Concerning the number and names whereof, the ſaid Melito in his Letter to Oneſimus declareth; how that he returning into the parts where theſe things were done and preached, there he diligently inquired out the Books approved of the Old Teſtament, the names whereof in order he ſubſcribeth, and ſendeth unto him as followeth, The five Books of Moſes, Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. Joſus Nave, The Judges, Ruth, Four Books of Kings, Two Books Paraliſpomenon, The Pſalms, Proverbs of Solomon, The Book of Wiſdom, The Preacher, The Song of Songs, Job, The Prophets, Eſay, Hieremy, Twelve Prophets in one Book, Daniel, Ezekiel, Eſdras. And thus much of this matter which I thought here to record, for it is not unprofitable for theſe later times to underſtand, what in the firſt times was received and admitted as authentick, and what otherwiſe.

But from this little digreſſion, to return to our matter omitted; that is, to the Apologies of Apolinarius and Melito, in the ſtory ſo it followeth; that whether it was by the occaſion of theſe two Apologies, or whether it was through the writing of Athenagoras a Philoſopher, and a Legat of the Chriſtians, it is uncertain: but this is certain, that the Perſecution the ſame time was ſtayed. Some do think, which moſt probably ſeems to touch the truth, that the cauſe of ſtaying this Perſecution did ariſe upon a wonderful Miracle of God ſhewed in the Emperors Camp by the Chriſtians, the ſtory whereof is this; At what time the two Brethren Marcus Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius Commodus Emperors, joyning together, warred againſt the Quades, Vandales, Sarmates, and Germans, in the Expedition againſt them; their Army by reaſon of the imminent aſſault of their Enemies, was cooped and ſhut in within the ſtraits and hot dry places, where their Souldiers, beſides other difficulties of battel, being deſtitute of water five days, were like to have periſhed, which dread not a little diſcomfited them, and abated their courage; where, in this ſo great diſtreſs and jeopardy, ſuddenly withdrew from the Army a Legion of the Chriſtian Souldiers for their ſuccor, who falling proſtrate upon the earth, by ardent prayer, by and by obtained of God double relief: by means of whom, God gave certain pleaſant Showers from the Element, whereby as their Souldiers quenched their thirſt, ſo were a great number of their Enemies diſcomfited and put to flight by continual Lightnings which ſhooted out of the Air. This Miracle ſo pleaſed and won the Emperor, that ever after he waxed gentler and gentler to the Chriſtians, and directed his Letters to divers of his Rulers (as Tertullian in his Apology witneſſeth) commanding them therein to give thanks to the Chriſtians, no leſs for his Victory, than for the Preſervation of Him and all his men. The Copy of which Letter inſueth.

The Chriſtians Religion began with the Empire of Rome.

Chriſtian Religion maketh common weals to flouriſh.

Fu Euſebius ibidem.

A miraculous rain obtained by the Chriſtians.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, Emperor, to the Senate and people of Rome.

I Give you hereby to underſtand what I intend to do, as alſo what ſucceſs I have had in my Wars in Germany, and with how much difficulty, I have vittailed my Camp, being compaſſed about with ſeventy and four fierce Dragons, whom my Scouts deſcried to be within nine miles of us, and Pompeianus our Lieutenant hath viewed, as he ſignified unto Us, by his Letters. Wherefore I thought no leſs but to be overrun and all my bands of ſo great multitude, as well my Vo-ward, Main-ward, as Rere-ward, with all my Souldiers of Ephrata; in whoſe Hoſt there were numbred of fighting-men, nine hundred ſeventy and five thouſand. But when I ſaw my ſelf not able to Encounter with the Enemy, I craved Aid of our Country gods: at whoſe hands I finding no comfort, and being driven of the Enemy unto an Exigent, I cauſed to be ſent for thoſe men which we call Chriſtians, who being miſtered were found a good indifferent number, with whom I was in further rage than I had good cauſe, as afterwards I had experience by their marvellous Power's who forthwith did their endeavour, but without either Weapon, Munition, Armor, or Trumpets, as men abhorring ſuch Preparation and Furniture, but only ſatisfied in truſt of their God, whom they carry about with them in their Conſciences. It is therefore to be credited, although we call them wicked men, that they worſhip God in their hearts. For they falling proſtrate upon the Ground, prayed not only for me, but for the Hoſt alſo which was with me, beſeeching their God for help in that our extremity of Victuals and freſh water: for we had been now five days without water, and were in our Enemies Land, even in the midſt of Germany; who thus falling upon their Faces, made their prayers to a God unknown of me. And there fell amongſt us from Heaven a moſt pleaſant and cold ſhower, but amongſt our Enemies a great ſtorm of Hail mixt with Lightening, ſo that immediately we perceived the Invincible aid of the moſt mighty God to be with us: Therefore we give thoſe men leave to profeſs Chriſtianity, leſt, perhaps, by their prayers we be puniſhed with the like, and thereby I make my ſelf the Author of ſuch hurt as ſhall be received by the Chriſtian profeſſion. And if any ſhall apprehend one that is a Chriſtian, only for this cauſe, I will that he being apprehended, without Puniſhment may have leave to confeſs the ſame, ſo that there be none other cauſe Objected againſt him, more than that, he is a Chriſtian; but let this accuſer be burned alive. Neither will I that he confeſſing and being found a Chriſtian, ſhall be inforced to alter the ſame his opinion by the Governor of any of our Provinces, but left to his own choice. And this Decree of mine I will to be ratified in the Senate-houſe, and command the ſame publickly to be proclaimed and read in the Court of Trajanus: and that further from thence it may be ſent into all our Provinces by the diligence of Veratius Governour of our City Polione. And further, we give leavie to all men to uſe and write out this our Decree, taking the ſame out of our Copy publickly in the Common Hall ſet forth.

Thus

Thus the Tempeſtuous rage of perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, began for a time to aſſwage, partly by the occaſion hereof, partly alſo upon other cauſes incident, compelling the Enemies to furceaſe their perſecution, as great Plagues and Peſtilence lying upon the country of Italy like wiſe great Wars, as well in the Eaſt parts, as alſo in Italy and France, terrible Earthquakes, great floods, noiſome Swarms of flies and Vermin devouring their Corne Fields, &c. And thus much of things done under Antoninus Verus, which Antoninus in the beginning of his Reign, joyned with him in the Government of the Empire his brother Marcus Aurelius Commodus, who alſo was with him at the miraculous victory gotten by the Chriſtians, as Euſebius cap. 5. lib. 5. recordeth. Contrary, Platina in vita Soteris, and the book intituled Flores Hiſtoriarum, refer the ſame to the time of Antoninus Verus, and his ſon Lucius Antoninus Commodus, and not of Marcus Aurelius Commodus his brother. But howſoever the truth of years doth ſtand, certain it is, that after the death of Antoninus Verus, and of Aurelius Commodus, ſucceeded Lucius Antoninus Commodus, the ſon of Verus, who Reigned thirty Years.

Antoninus Verus, M. Aurelius Commodus Emperors.

The difference between Euſebius and Platina.

{ Anno 175 }

Quietneſs given to the Church.

In the time of this Commodus, although he was an incommodious Prince to the Senators of Rome, yet notwithſtanding there was ſome quietneſs univerſally through the whole Church of Chriſt from perſecution, by what occaſion it is not certain. Some think, of whom is Xiphilinus, that it came through Marcia the Emperors Concubine, which favoured the Chriſtians: But howſoever it came (ſaith Euſebius) the fury of the raging Enemies was then ſomewhat mitigated, and peace was given by the grace of Chriſt unto the Church throughout the whole world: At what time, the wholeſome Doctrine of the Goſpel allured and reduced the hearts of all ſorts of people unto the true Religion of God, in ſo much that many, both rich and to noble Perſonages of Rome, with their whole families and houſeholds, to their ſalvation, adjoyned themſelves the Church of Chriſt.

Apollonius martyr.

Among whom there was one Apollonius, a noble man, and a Senator of Rome, mentioned in Euſebius, lib. 5. cap. 21. who being Maliciouſly accuſed unto the Senate, by one whom Hierome writeth to be the ſervant of the ſaid Apollonius, and nameth him Severus: But whoſe ſervant ſoever he was, the wretched man came ſoon enough before the Judge, being condignly rewarded for that his Malicious diligence: For by a law which the Emperor made, that no man upon pain of Death, ſhould falſly accuſe the Chriſtians, he was put to Execution, and had his Legs broken forthwith by the ſentence of Perennius the Judge, which being an heathen man, he Pronounced againſt him: But the beloved Martyr of God, when the Judge, with much ado had obtained of him to render an account, before the honourable Senate, of his Faith, under whoſe defence and warrant of life he did the ſame, delivered unto them an eloquent apologie of the Chriſtian belief: But the former warrant notwithſtanding, he by the decree of the Senate was beheaded, and ſo ended his life; for that there was an antient law among them decreed, that none that profeſſed Chriſt, and therefore arraigned, ſhould be releaſed without recantation, or altering his opinion.

Apollonius accuſed by his own ſervants.

Apollonius exhibiteth an apologie of his faith to the Senate.

An old wicked law of the Romans.

The ſtiffnecked pride of the Emperor.

This Commodus is ſaid in ſtories to be ſo fure and fieddy handed in calling the dart, that in the open Theater before the people, he would encounter with the Wild beaſts, and be ſure to hit them in the place where appointed. Among divers other his vitious and Wild parts, he was ſo far ſurpriſed in pride and arrogancy, that he would be called Hercules, and many times would ſhew himſelf to the people in the ſkin of a Lion, to be counted thereby the King of men, like as the Lion is of the Beaſts.

Upon a certain time, being his birth-day, this Commodus calling the people of Rome together, in a great Royalty, having his Lions ſkin upon him, made ſacrifice to Hercules and Jupiter, cauſing it to be cryed through the City, that Hercules was the Patron and defender of the City. There was the ſame time at Rome, Vincentius, Euſebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus, learned men, and inſtructors of the people, who, following the ſtepſot the Apoſtles, went about from place to place where the Goſpel was not yet preached, converting the Gemiles to the faith of Chriſt. Theſe, hearing the madneſs of the Emperor, and of the people, began to reprove their Idolatrous blindneſs, teaching in Villages and Towns, all that heard them to believe upon the true and only God, and to come away from ſuch Worſhipping of Devils, and to give honour to God alone, which only is to be Worſhipped, willing them to repent and to be Baptized, leſt they periſhed with Commodus. With this their preaching they converted one Julius, a Senator, and others, to the Religion of Chriſt. The Emperor hearing thereof, cauſed them to be apprehended of Vitellius his Captain, and to be compelled to ſacrifice unto Hercules, which when they ſtoutly refuſed, after divers grievous torments and great miracles by them done, at laſt they were preſſed with leaden weights to death. Vincentius, lib. 10. cap. 119. & Chron. Henr. de Erfordia.

Vincentius, Euſebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus, Martyrs.

Julius a Senator converted to Chriſt.

Ex Vincent lib. 10. cap. 119. Henr. de Erfor. Peregrinus, and martyr. ed at Rome. Ex Platina in vita Soteris.

This Peregrinus above mentioned had been ſent before by Xiſtus, Biſhop of Rome, into the parts of France, to ſupply there the room of a Biſhop and teacher, by reaſon that for the continual and horrible perſecutions thereabout touched, thoſe places were left deſolate and deſtitute of Miniſters and inſtructors, where after he had occupied himſelf with much fruit among the ſtock of Chriſt, and had ſtabliſhed the Congregation there, returning home again to Rome, there he finiſhed at laſt (as it is ſaid) his Martyrdom.

Xiſtus Biſhop of Rome.

Now remaineth likewiſe to ſpeak of Julius: which Julius being (as is afore deſcribed) a Senator of Rome, and now won by the Preaching of theſe bleſſed men to the faith of Chriſt, did eſtſoones invite them and brought them home to his houſe, where being by them more fully inſtructed in Chriſtian Religion, he believed the Goſpel. And ſending for one Ruffinus a Prieſt, was with all his family by him Baptized, who not (as the common ſort was wont to do) kept cloſe and ſecret his faith, but incenſed with a marvellous and ſincere zeal, openly profeſſed the ſame, altogether wiſhing and praying to be given to him by God, not only to believe in Chriſt, but alſo to hazard his life for him. Which thing the Emperor hearing how that Julius had forſaken his old Religion, and become a Chriſtian, forthwith ſent for him to come before him, unto whom he ſpake on this wiſe: O July, what madneſs hath poſſeſſed thee, that thus thou doſt fall from the old and common Religion of thy Forefathers, who acknowledged and worſhipped Jupiter and Hercules their Gods, and now doſt imbrace a new and fond kind of Religion of the Chriſtians? At which time Julius, having good occaſion to ſhew and open his faith, gave ſtraightway account thereof to him, and affirmed that Hercules and Jupiter were falſe Gods, and how the Worſhippers of them ſhould Periſh with Eternal damnation and Puniſhments. Which the Emperor hearing how that he condemned and deſpiſed his Gods, being then inflamed with a great wrath (as he was by nature very choleriek) committed him forthwith to Vitellius, the Maſter of the Souldiers, a very cruel and fierce man, to ſee Julius either to ſacrifice to mighty Hercules, or refuſing the ſame, to ſlay him. Vitellius (as he commanded) exhorted Julius to obey the Emperors commandment, and to worſhip his Gods, alledging how that the whole Empire of Rome was not only conſtituted, but alſo preſerved and maintained by them: which Julius denied utterly to do, admoniſhing ſharply in like manner Vitellius to acknowledge the true God, and obey his Commandments, leſt he with his Maſter, ſhould die ſome grievous Death: whereat Vitellius being moved, cauſed Julius with cudgels to be beaten unto Death.

Julius Biſhop of Rome.

Theſe things being thus briefly recited, touching ſuch holy Martyrs as hitherto have ſuffered, now remaineth that we return again to the order of the Roman Biſhops, ſuch as followed next after Alexander, or whom we left, whoſe ſucceeder next was Xiſtus or Sixtus, the ſixth Biſhop count-ed after Peter, who governed the Miniſtery the ſpace of ten years, as Damaſcus and others do write. Ufpergenſis maketh mention but of nine years. Platina recordeth that he died a Martyr, and was buried at Vaticane. But Euſebius ſpeaking of his deceaſe, maketh no word or mention of any Martyrdom. In the ſecond tome of the Councels certain Epiſtles be attributed to him, whereof Euſebius, Damaſcus, Hierome, and other old authors, as they make no relation, ſo ſeem they to have no intelligence nor knowledge of any ſuch matter. In theſe counterfeit Epiſtles, and in Platina it appeareth that Xiſtus was the firſt author of theſe ordinances. Firſt, that the holy myſteries and holy Veſſels, ſhould be touched but only of perſons holy and conſecrated, eſpecially of no Woman. Item, that the Corporas cloth ſt could be made of no other cloth but of fine linnen. Item, that ſuch Biſhops as were called up to the Apoſtolick See, returning home again, ſhould not be received at their return, unleſs they brought with them letters from the Biſhop of Rome, ſaluting the People. Item, at the celebration he ordained to be ſung this verſe, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, Dominus Deus Sabboth. Where moreover it is to be noted, that the ſaid Platina, in the life of this Xyſtus, doth teſtifie that Peter miniſtred the celebration of the Communion only with the Lords Prayer. Theſe trifling ordinances of Xyſtus, who is ſo rude that ſeeth not, or may not eaſily conjecture to be falſly fathered of Xyſtus, or of any father of that time? Firſt by the uniform rudenſs and ſtile of all thoſe decretal letters, nothing favoring of that age, but rather of the later dunſtical times that followed; alſo by the matter and argument in thoſe letters contained nothing agreeing with the ſtate of thoſe troubleſome days. Neither again is it to be ſuppoſed, that any ſuch recourſe of Biſhops was then to the Apoſtolical See of Rome, that it was not lawful to return without their letters: when as the Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians was then ſo hot, in the days of Adrian, that the Biſhops of Rome themſelves were more glad to fly out of the City, than other Biſhops were to come to them unto Rome. And if Xyſtus added the Sanctus unto the maſs canon, what place then of the canon went before it, when they which put to the other patches came after Xyſtus? And if they came after Xyſtus that added the reſt why did they ſet their pieces before his, ſeeing they that began the firſt piece of the canon, came after him?

Peter celebrated the Lords Supper only with the Lords Prayer. Platina in vita Sixti.

The ordinance of Xyſtus ſuſpected.

Teleſphorus Biſhop of Rome and martyr.

The ſame likewiſe is to be judged of the Epiſtles and ordinances of Teleſphorus, who ſucceeded next unto Xyſtus, and being Biſhop of that Congregation the term of eleven years, the firſt year of the Raign of Antonius Pius, died Martyr about the year of our Lord, one hundred thirty and eight. His Epiſtle, like unto the reſt, containing in it no great matter of Doctrine, hath theſe ordinances. Firſt, he commandeth all that were of the Clergy to faſt and abſtain from fleſh-eating ſeven week before Eaſter. That three Maſſes ſhould be ſaid upon the nativity day of the Lord. That no man ſhould accuſe either Biſhop or Prieſt. He ordained moreover, Gloria in excelſis, to be added to the Maſs, &c. But theſe things falſly to be feined upon him may eaſily be conjectured. For as touching the ſeven weeks faſt, neither doth it agree with the old Roman term commonly received, calling it Quadrageſima, that is, the forty days faſt: neither with the example of our Saviour, who faſted not ſeven weeks, but only forty days. Moreover, as concerning this forty days faſt, we read of the ſame in the Epiſtle of Ignatius, which was long before Teleſphorus: whereby it may appear that this Teleſphorus was not the firſt inventor thereof. And if it be true that is lately come out in the name of Abdias (but untruly as by many conjectures may be proved) there it is read, that in the days of S. Matthew, this Lent faſt of forty days was obſerved long before Teleſphorus, by theſe words that follow: In the days (ſaid he) either of Lent, or in the time of other lawful faſtings, he that abſtaineth not as well from eating meat as alſo from the mixture of Bodies, doth incure in ſo doing, not only pollution, but alſo committeth offence, which muſt be waſhed away with the teares of Repentance. Again, Apollonius affirmeth, that Montanus the Heretick was the firſt deviſer and bringer in of theſe laws of faſting into the Church, which before was uſed to be free, Euſeb. lib. 5. cap. 18. But eſpecially by Socrates, Writer of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtory, who lived after the days of Theodoſius, it may be argued, that this ſeven weeks faſt is falſly imputed to Teleſphorus. For Socrates in his firſt Book, ſpeaking of this time, hath theſe words: Romani namque tres ante paſcha ſeptimanas præter Sabbatum & Dominicam continuas jejunant, that is, The Romans (ſaith he) do faſt three weeks continually before Eaſter, beſide the Sabbath and Sunday. And moreover, ſpeaking of divers and ſundry faſtings of Lent in ſundry and divers Churches, he addeth theſe words: And becauſe that no man can bring forth any Commandment written of this matter, it is therefore apparent, that the Apoſtles left this kind of faſt free to every mans will and judgment, leſt any ſhould be conſtrained by fear and neceſſity to do that which is good, &c. With this of Socrates agree alſo the words of Sozomenus, living much about the ſame in his ſeventh Book, where he thus writeth: The whole faſt of Lent (ſaith he) ſome comprehend in ſix weeks, as do the Illirians, and weſt Churches, with all Libia, Egypt and Paleſtina: Some in ſeven weeks, as at Conſtantinople, and the parts bordering to Pontica: Other ſome in three weeks next before the day of Eaſter, and come again in two weeks, &c. By the which it may be collected, that Teleſphorus never ordained any ſuch faſt of ſeven weeks: Which otherwiſe never would have been neglected in Rome, and in the weſt Churches: Neither again would have been unremembred of theſe ancient Eccleſiaſtical Writers, if any ſuch thing had been. The like is to be thought alſo of the reſt, not only of his conſtitutions, but alſo of the other ancient Biſhops and Martyrs which followed after him, as of Higinus in the year of our Lord one hundred forty and two, who ſucceeding him and dying alſo a Martyr, as Volaterranus, lib. 22. declareth, is ſaid, or rather ſained to bring in the Cream, one Godfather and Godmother in Baptiſm, to ordain the dedication of Churches: When as in his time ſo far it was off, that any ſolemn Churches were ſtanding in Rome, that unneth the Chriſtians could ſafely convent in their own Houſes. Likewiſe the diſtinguiſhing the orders of Metropolitans, Biſhops and other degrees, favor nothing leſs than of that time.

The teſt. nance of Teleſphorus falſly taken aſcribed.

Higinus Biſhop of Rome and Martyr.

After Higinus followed Pius, who, as Platina reporteth, was ſo preciſely devout about the holy Myſteries of the Lords Table, that if any one crum thereof did fall down to the ground, he ordained that the Prieſt ſhould do penance forty days: If any fell upon the ſuper-altar, he ſhould do penance three days: If upon the linnen corporas cloath, four days: if upon any other linnen cloth, nine days. And if any drop of the Blood (ſaith he) ſhould chance to be ſpilled, whereſoever it fell, it ſhould be licked up, if it were poſſible: If not, the place ſhould be waſhed or pared, and ſo being waſhed or pared, ſhould be burned and laid in the Veſtry. All which toyes may ſeem to a wiſe man more vain and trifling, than to favor of thoſe pure and ſtrict times of thoſe holy Martyrs. This Pius (as is reported) was much converſant with Hermes, called otherwiſe Paſtor. Damaſus, ſaith he, was his brother. But how is that like, that Hermes being the diſciple of Paul, or one of the three-core diſciples, could be the brother of this Pius? Of this Hermes and of the revelations, the aforeſaid Pius in his Epiſtle decretal (if it be not forged) maketh mention, declaring that unto him appeared the Angel of God in the habit of a ſhepherd, commanding him that Eaſter day ſhould be celebrated of all men upon no other day, but on Sunday: Whereupon, ſaith the Epiſtle, Pius the Biſhop, by his authority Apoſtolical decreed and commanded the ſame to be obſerved of all men.

Then ſucceeded Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutherius, about the year of our Lord one hundred and fourſcore. This Eleutherius, at the requeſt of Lucius, King of Britain, ſent to him Damianus and Fugatius, by whom the King was converted to Chriſts faith, and Baptized about the year of our Lord one hundred threeſcore and nineteen. Nauclerus, lib. Cron. Gen. 6. ſaith, it was in the year ours hundred fifty and ſix. Henr. de Erfordia, ſaith, it was in the year one hundred threeſcore and nine, in the nintteenth year of Verus the Emperor. Some ſay it was in the ſixth year of Commodus, which ſhould be about the year of our Lord one hundred fourſcore and five. Timotheus in his ſtory thinketh, that Eleutherius came himſelf: But that is not like. And as there is a variance among the Writers for the count of years, ſo doth there riſe a queſtion among ſome, whether Eleutherius was the firſt that brought the faith from Rome into this Land or not. Nicephorus, lib. 4. cap. 4. ſaith that Simon Zeletes came into Britain. Some other allege out of Gildas de Victoria, Aurel. Ambroſio. that Joſeph of Arimathy, after the diſperſion of the Jews, was ſent by Philip the Apoſtle from France to Britain, about the year of our Lord threeſcore and three, and here remaineth in this Land all his time, and ſo with his fellows, laid the firſt foundation of Chriſtian faith among the Britain people. Whereupon other Preachers and Teachers coming afterward, confirmed the ſame, and increaſed it more. And therefore doth Petrus Clunacenſis call the Scotiſhmen, and ſo doth count them as more ancient Chriſtians. For the confirmation hereof might be alledged the Teſtimony of Origen, of Tertullian, and the words alſo of the letter of Eleutherius, which import no leſs but that the Chriſt was here in England among the Britain people, before Eleutherius time, and before the King was converted:

Antonius Biſhop of Rome and martyr. Soter Biſhop. Eleutherius Biſhop. Lucius converted to the faith of Chriſt.

But

But hereof more ſhall be ſpoken hereafter (Chriſt willing) when after the tractation of theſe Ten Perſecutions, we ſhall enter into the matter of our Engliſh ſtories.

About this time of Commodus afore mentioned, among divers other learned men and famous Teachers whom God ſtirred up at that time (as he doth at all other times raiſe up ſome) in his Church, to confound the Perſecutors by Learning and Writing, as the Martyrs to confirm the truth with their blood, was Seraphion Biſhop of Antioch, Egeſippus a Writer of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory from Chriſts Paſſion to his time, as witneſſeth Hierome and Euſebius, lib. 4. cap. 8. & 22. which Books of his be now remaining: and thoſe that be remaining (which be five De excidio Hieroſol.) be not mentioned, neither of Hierome, Euſebius, nor of Miltiades, which alſo wrote his Apology in defence of Chriſtian Religion, as did Melito, Quadratus, and Ariſtides before mentioned. About the ſame time alſo wrote Heraclitus, who firſt began to write Annotations and Enarrations upon the New Teſtament, and Epiſtles of the Apoſtles. Alſo Theophilus Biſhop of Ceſarea, Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth, a man famoully learned, which wrote divers Epiſtles to divers Churches, and among others written, exhorting Penitire, a certain Biſhop, Ne grave ferrumdat cattitatis onus neceſſario ſtatribus imponat, ſed multorum ſoſe imbecillitati attemperet; that is, That he would lay no yoke of Chaſtity of any neceſſity upon his Brethren; but that he would conſider the infirmity of others, and bear with it. Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 23. Moreover, the ſaid Dionyſius in his Epiſtles writing of Dionyſius Areopagita, declareth of him how that he was firſt converted to the Chriſtian Faith by Saint Paul, according as in the Acts is recorded, and afterward was made the firſt Biſhop of Athens, but maketh there no mention of his Book De Hierarchia. Whereby it may eaſily appear, what is to be judged of that Book. Furthermore, by the Epiſtles of the ſaid Dionyſius of Corinth, this we have to underſtand, to be the uſe at that time in Churches, to read the Letters and Epiſtles, ſuch as were ſent by learned Biſhops and Teachers unto the Congregations, as may appear by theſe words of Dionyſius, who writing to the Church of the Romans, and to Soter, ſaith, This day we celebrate the holy Dominical-day, in which we have read your Epiſtle, which always we will read for our Exhortation's like as we do read alſo the Epiſtle of Clement ſent to us before, &c. Euſebius ibid. Where alſo mention is made of keeping of Sunday holy, whereof we find no mention made in ancient Authors, before his time, except only in Juſtinus Martyr, who in his Deſcription declareth two times moſt eſpecially uſed for Chriſtian men to congregate together: firſt, when any Convert was to be baptized, the ſecond was upon the Sunday, which was wont for two cauſes then to be hallowed: firſt, becauſe (ſaith he) upon that day God made the World: ſecondly, becauſe that Chriſt upon that day firſt ſhewed himſelf, after his Reſurrection, to his Diſciples, &c.

Clemens Alexandrinus.

'Over and beſide theſe above named, about the days of Commodus, wrote alſo Clemens Alexandrinus, a man of notable and ſingular Learning, whoſe Books, although for a great part be loſt, yet certain of them yet remain, wherein is declared among other things, the order and number of the Books and Goſpels of the New Teſtament, &c.

The Goſpel of S. Matthew kept in Hebrew.

The time time moreover lived Pantenus, which was the firſt in Alexandria, that profeſſed an open School to read, of whom is thought firſt to proceed the order and manner among the Chriſtians to read and profeſs in Univerſities. This Pantenus for his excellency of Learning, was ſent by Demetrius, Biſhop of Alexandria, to Preach to the Indians, where he found the Goſpel of S. Matthew written in Hebrew, left there by S. Bartholomew, which Book afterward he brought with him from thence to the Library of Alexandria.

Difference about the Ceremony of Eaſter.

During all the Reign of Commodus, God granted reſt and tranquility, although not without ſome bloodſhed of certain holy Martyrs, as is above declared unto his Church. In the which time of tranquility, the Chriſtians having now ſome leiſure from the foreign Enemy, began to have a little contention among themſelves about the Ceremony of Eaſter: which contention albeit of long time before had been ſtirring in the Church, as is before mentioned of Polycarpus and Anicetus: yet the variance and difference of that Ceremony brought no breath of Chriſtian concord and ſociety among them: neither as yet did the matter exceed ſo far, but that the bond of Love, and Communion of brotherly life continued, although they differed in the Ceremony of the day. For they of the Weſt Church pretending the tradition of Paul and Peter, but indeed being the tradition of Hermes and of Pius, kept one day, which was upon the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the firſt month. The Church of Aſia, following the Ordinance of John the Diſciple, obſerved another, as more ſhall be declared (the Lord willing) when we come to the time of Victor Biſhop of Rome. In the mean time, as concerning the fourth Perſcution, let this hitherto ſuffice.

The fifth Perſecution.

Severus Emperor. Anno 195. The fifth Perſecution

After the death of Commodus reigned Pertinax but few months, after whom ſucceeded Severus, under whom was raiſed the fifth Perſecution againſt the Chriſtian Saints: who reigning the term of eighteen years, the firſt ten years of the ſame was very favourable and courteous to the Chriſtians: afterward through ſiniſter Suggeſtions and malicious Accuſations of the malignant, was ſo incenſed againſt them, that by Proclamations he commanded no Chriſtians any more to be ſuffered. Thus the rage of the Emperor being inflamed againſt them, great Perſecution was ſtirred up on every ſide, whereby an infinite number of Martyrs were ſlain, as Euſebius in his ſixth Book recordeth, which was about the year of our Lord two hundred and five. The Crimes and falſe Accuſations objected againſt the Chriſtians, are partly touched before; as Sedition and Rebellion againſt the Emperor, Sacrilledge, murthering of Infants, inceſtuous Pollution, eating raw Fleſh, Libidinous Commixture, whereof certain indeed, called then Gnoſtici, were infamed. Item, it was objected againſt them for worſhipping the head of an Aſs: which whereof it ſhould riſe, I find no certain cauſe, except it were, perhaps, by the Jews. Alſo they were charged for worſhipping the Sun, for that peradventure before the Sun did riſe, they convented together, ſinging their morning Hymns unto the Lord, or elſe becauſe they prayed toward the Eaſt; but eſpecially for that they would not with them worſhip their Idolatrous gods, and were counted as enemies to all men, &c.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 2. Anno 205. The falſe Accuſations againſt the Chriſtians.

The Captains and Miniſters of this Perſecution. Ex Tertul. ad capulam.

The Captains and Preſidents of this Perſecution under the Emperor were Hilerianus, Vigellius, Claudius, Hermianus Ruler of Cappadocia, Cecilius, Capella, Veſpronius, alſo Demetrius mentioned of Cyprian, and Aquila Judge of Alexandria, of whom Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 5. maketh relation.

Leonides Father of Origen that was Martyred.

The place where the force of this Perſecution moſt raged, were Africa, Alexandria, Cappadocia and Carthage. The number of them that ſuffered in this Perſecution, by the report of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtory, was innumerable. Of whom the firſt was Leonides the Father of Origen, who was beheaded: with whom alſo Origen his Son, being of the age then of Seventeen years, ſhould have ſuffered (ſuch a fervent deſire he had to be martyred for Chriſt) had not his Mother privily in the night ſeaſon conveyed away his Clothes and his ſhirt. Whereupon more for ſhame to be ſeen, than for fear to die, he was conſtrained to remain at home: and when he could do nothing elſe, yet he writeth to his Father a Letter with theſe words, Cave tibi, ne quid propter nos aliter quam Marcyris conſentiatur faciendi propoſitum cogites; that is, Take heed to your ſelf, that you turn not your thought and purpoſe for our ſake, &c. Such a fervency had this Origen, being yet young, to the Doctrine of Chriſts Faith, by the operation of Gods heavenly Providence, and partly alſo by the diligent Education of his Father, who brought him up from his Youth moſt ſtudiouſly in all good Literature, but eſpecially in the reading and exerciſe of holy Scripture, wherein he had ſuch inward and myſtical Speculation, that many times he would move queſtions to his Father of the meaning of this place or that place in the Scripture. Inſomuch that his Father divers times would uncover his breaſt being aſleep, and kiſs it, giving thanks to God which had made him ſo happy a Father of ſuch a happy Child. After the death of his Father, and all his Goods confiſcated to the Emperor, he with his poor Mother, and ſix Brethren were brought to ſuch extream Poverty, that he did ſuſtain both himſelf and them by teaching a School:

all

till at length, being weary of the Profession, he transferred his study only to the knowledge and seeking of Divine Scripture, and such other learning conducible to the same. So much he profited both in the Hebrew and other Tongues, that he conferred the Hebrew Text with the translation of the threescore: and moreover did confer and find out the other translations which we call the common translation of Aquila, of Symmachus, and Theodotion. Also he adjoyned to these aforesaid other four translations, whereof more is in the story of Eusebius expressed.

They that write of the life of Origen, testifie of him that he was of wit quick and sharp, much patient of labour, a great traveller in the Tongues, of a spare diet, of a strict life, a great lover of his teaching and his living were both one: his going was much barefoot: a strict observer of that saying of the Lord, Bidding to have but one Coat, &c. He is said to have written so much as seven Notaries, and so many Maids every day could pen. The number of his Books, by the account of Hierome, came to seven thousand Volumns, the Copies whereof he used to sell for three pence, or a little more, for the sustentation of his living. But of him more shall be touched hereafter. So zealous he was in the cause of Christ, and of Christs Martyrs, that he nothing fearing his own peril, would assist and exhort them going to their death, and less them, insomuch that he was oft in jeopardy to be stoned of the multitude; and sometimes by the provition of Christian men had his house guarded about with Souldiers, for the safety of them which daily reforted to hear his Readings. And many times he was compelled to shift places and houses, for such as laid wait for him in all places: but great was the Providence of God to preserve him in the midst of all this tempest of Severus. Among others which reforted unto him, and were his Hearers, Plutarchus was one, and died a Martyr; and with him Serenus his Brother, who was burned. The third after these was Heraclides, and fourth Heron, who were both beheaded. The fifth was another Serenus, also beheaded, Rhais and Potamiena who was tormented with Pitch poured upon her, and martyred with her Mother Marcella, who died also in the fire. This Potamiena was of a fresh and flourishing beauty, who because she could not be removed from her Profession, was committed to Basilides one of the Captains there in the Army, to see the execution done. Basilides receiving her at the Judges hand, and leading her to the place, shewed her some Compassion in repressing the rebukes and railings of the wicked Adversaries: for the which Potamiena the Virgin, to requite again his kindness, had him be of good comfort, saying, That she would pray the Lord to shew mercy upon him, and so were the to her Martyrdom, which she both strongly and quietly did sustain.

Basilides of a Perfecutor made a Martyr.

Not long after it happened that Basilides was required to give an Oath in a matter concerning his fellow Souldiers, which thing he denied to do, plainly affirming that he was a Christian: for their Oath then was wont to be by the Idols and the Emperor. At the first he was thought diffemblingly to jeft, but after, when he was heard constantly and in earnest, to confirm the fame, he was had before the Judge, and so by him committed to Ward. The Christians marveling thereat, as they came to him in the Prison, inquired of him the cause of that his sudden Convertion. To whom he answered again; and said, That Potamiena had prayed for him to the Lord, and so he Saw a Crown put upon his head; adding moreover, That it should not be long but he should be received. Which things thus done, the next day following he was had to the place of Execution, and there beheaded, Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 5. Albeit the said Eusebius giveth this story of no credit, but only of hear-fay, as he there expresseth.

Eu. Eusb. lib. 6. cap. 5.

Alexander Confessor and Bishop of Jerusalem. The notable age of Narcissus, Bishop of Jerusalem.

As divers and many there were that suffered in the days of this Severus, so some there were again, which through the Protection of God his Providence being put to great torments, yet escaped with life: Of whom was one Alexander, who, for his constant confession and torments suffered, was made Bishop afterward of Hierusalem, together with Narcissus: who being then an old man of an hundred and threescore years and three, as saith Eusebius, was unwekly for his age to govern that Function alone.

Of this Narcissus it is reported in the Ecclesiastical History, that certain Miracles by him were wrought, very notable, if they be true. First, of Water by him turned into Oil, at the solemn Vigil of Easter, what time the Congregation wanted Oil for their Lamps. Another Miracle is allo told of him, which is this, There were three evil disposed persons, who seeing the soundness and grave constancy of his vertuous life, and fearing their own punishment, as a Conscience that is guilty is always fearful, thought to prevent his Accusations, in accusing him first, and laying an hainous Crime unto his Charge. And to make their Accusation more probable before the people, they bound their Accusation with a great Oath, one wishing to be destroyed with fire, if he said not true; the other to be consumed with a grievous sickness; the third to lose both his eyes if they did lie. Narcissus, although having his Conscience clear, yet not able, being but one man, to withstand their Accusation, bound with such Oaths, gave place, and removed himself from the multitude into a solitary Desart by himself, where he continued the space of many years. In the mean time, to them which so willingly and wickedly forsware themselves, this happened: The first, by calnality of one little small sparkle of fire, was burnt with his Goods and all his Family. The second was taken with a great sickness from the top to the toe, and devoured with the same. The third, hearing and seeing the punishment of the other, confessed his fault, but through great repentance poured out such tears, that he lost both his eyes; and thus was their false Perjury punished. Narcissus, after long absence returning home again, was by this means both cleared of the Fact, and received into his Bishoprick again: to whom as is said, for impotency of his age, Alexander was joyned in execution of the Function. Eusebius, Histor. Eccles. lib. 6. cap. 10. Of this Alexander is recorded in the said Ecclesiastical History, that after his Agonies and constancy of his Confession shewed in the perfecution of Severus, he was admonished by a Vision in the night season to make his journey up to Jerusalem and Palestina (for that place remained free from this Persecution) to see there the Congregation, and to pray. Thus he taking his Journey, and drawing near to the City, a Vision with plain words was given to certain chief Heads of Jerusalem, to go out of the Gate of the City, there to receive the Bishop appointed to them of God. And so was Alexander met and received, and joyned Partner with aged Narcissus, as is before expressed, in the City of Jerusalem, where he continued Bishop above forty years, until the Persecution of Decius, and there erected a famous Library, where Eusebius had his chiefest help in writing his Ecclesiastical History. He wrote also divers Epistles to divers Churches, and licensed Origen openly to teach his Church. At length, being very aged, he was brought from Jerusalem to Cesarea before the Judge under Decius, where after his constant Confession the second time, he was committed to Prison, and there died.

Besides these that suffered in this Persecution of Severus, recited of Eusebius, Vincentius also, Lib. 11. cap. 6. ex Martyrologio, speaketh of one Andoclus, whom Polycarpus before had sent into France: which Andoclus, because he had spread there the Doctrine of Christ, was apprehended of Severus, and first beaten with Staves and Bats, and after was beheaded.

To these above named, may also be added Asclepiades, who, although he was not put to death in this Persecution of Severus, yet constantly he did abide the Trial of his Confession, and suffered much for the same, as Alexander before mentioned did. Wherefore, afterward he was ordained Bishop of Antioch, where he continued the space of seven years, of whom Alexander writes unto the Church of Antioch out of Prison, much rejoycing and giving thanks to God, to hear that he was their Bishop.

Asclepiades Bishop of Antioch and Confeſſor.

About the same time, during the Reign of Severus, died Ireneus, Henr. de Erfordia, Ado, and other Martyr-Writers do hold, that he was martyred with a great multitude of others more, for the Confession and Doctrine of Christ, about the fourth or fifth year of Severus. This Irenæus, as he was a greater Writer, so was he greatly commended of Tertullian for his Learning, whom he calleth Omnium Doctrinarum curiosissimum exploratorem. A great Searcher of all kind of Learning. He was first Scholar and Hearer of Polycarpus, from thence either was sent, or came to France, and there by Plotinus, and and the rest of the Martyrs, was instituted into the Ministry, and commended by their Letter to Eleutherius as is before premonished. At length, after the Martyrdom of Photinus, he was appointed Bishop of Lions, where he continued about the space of three and twenty years. In the time of this Ireneus the state of the Church was much troubled, not only for the outward Persecution of the foreign enemy, but also for divers Sects and Errors then stirring, against which he diligently laboured, and wrote much, although but few Books be now remaining. The nature of this man, well agreeing with his name, was such, that he ever loved peace, and sought to set agreement when any controversie rose in the Church. And therefore, when the question of keeping the Easter day was renewed in the Church between Victor Bishop of Rome, and the Churches of Asia, and when Victor would have excommunicated them as Schismaticks, for disagreeing from him therein: Ireneus, with other brethren of the French Church, sorry to see such a contention among brethren for such a trifle, convented themselves together in a common Council, and directing their Letter with their common consent subscribed, sent unto Victor, intreating him to stay his purpose, and not to proceed in excommunicating his brethren for that matter. Although they themselves agreed with him in observing the Sunday Easter as he did: yet with great reasons and arguments they exhorted him not to deal so rigorously with his other brethren, following the ancient Custom of their Country manner in that behalf. And besides this, he wrote divers other Letters abroad concerning the same contention, declaring the excommunication of Victor to be of no force.

Tertullian Ecclesiaſtical Writer.

Not long after Ireneus followed also Tertullian about the time of this Severus and Antoninus Caracalla his Son, a Man both in Greek and Latine well expert, having great gifts in disputing, and in writing eloquent, as his Books declare, and as the commendation of all learned men doth testify no less. To whom Vincentius Lirinensis giveth such praise, that he calleth him the flower of all Latine Writers: and of the eloquence of his stile he thus writeth, that with the force of his reasons, he saith, whom he could not perswade, them he compelled to consent unto him. How many words, so many sentences, and how many sentences, so many victories he had, &c.

Such men of doing and writing God raised up from time to time, as pillars and staies for his poor Church, as he did this Tertullian in these dangerous days of Persecution. For when the Christians were vexed with wrongs, and fally accused of the Gentiles, Tertullian taking their cause in hand, defendeth them against the Persecutors, and against their slanderous accusations. First, that they never minded any stir or rebellion, either against the Empire or Emperors of Rome: for so much as the use of Christians was to pray for the state of their Emperors and Governors. And whereas they were accused fally to be enemies of all Mankind, how could that be (saith Tertullian to Scapula) seeing the proper office of the Christians is by their profession to pray for all men, to love their enemies, never requiting evil for evil, when as all other do love but only their friends, and scarcely them? As touching the horrible slander of murthering Infants, how can that be true in the Christians (saith he) whose order is to abstain from all blood and strangled; insomuch that it is not lawful for them to touch the blood of any beast at their Tables when they feed? from filthy copulation no sort more free than they, which are, and ever have been, the greatest observers of chastity, of whom, such as may, live in perpetual virginity all their lives such as cannot contract Matrimony, for avoiding all whoredom and fornication. Neither can it be proved that the Christians do worship the Sun: which false surmise Tertullian declareth to rise hereof, for that the manner of the Christians was to pray toward the East. Much less was there any of them so mad as to worship an Asses head; whereof the occasion being taken only of the Jews, the slander thereof therefore he proveth to be fally and wrongfully laid to the charge of the Christians.

Tertullians Apologeticus.

The occaſion hereof, beſides came of the Jews worſhipping the law of Moſes in the ſtory of Joſephus.

And likewise against all other lies and slanders objected of the Heathen against the Christians, the said Tertullian purgeth the Christians, declaring them fally to be belied, and wrongfully persecuted, not for any defect of theirs, but only for the hatred of their name. And yet notwithstanding, by the same Persecutions, he proveth in the same Apology, the Religion of the Christians nothing to be impaired, but rather increased. The more (saith he) we are mown down of you, the more rise up. The blood of Christians is Seed. For what man (saith he) in beholding the painful torments, and the perfect patience of them, will not search and inquire what is apologetics. the cause? And when hath found it out, who will not agree unto it? And when he agreeth to it, who will not desire to suffer for it? Thus (saith he) this Sect will never die, which the more it is cut down, the more it groweth. For every man seeing and wondring at the sufferance of the Saints, is moved the more thereby to search the cause; in searching, he findeth it, and finding he followeth it. Tertullian in eodem Apolog.

Thus Tertullian, in this dangerous time of Persecution, being stirred up of God, defended the innocency of the Christians against the blasphemy of the adversaries; and moreover, for the instruction of the Church he compiled many fruitful works, whereof some are extant, some are not to be found. Notwithstanding the great learning and famous vertues of this worthy man, certain errors and blemishes are noted in his Doctrine, as were before both of Origen and Irenæus, and likewise of them, were they never so excellent that followed them. Which errors all here in order to note and comprehend, were a long matter for this story to prosecute. This by the way shall be sufficient to admonish the Reader, never to look for any such perfection of any man in this world, how singular soever he be (Christ only excepted) but some blemish or other joyneth it self withal, whereof more, perchance, shall be said when we come to Cyprian.

The errors and imperfections in learned men noted.

Victor Bishop of Rome reported of some to die a Martyr.

And now, to return again to the order of Bishops of Rome intermitted: After Eleutherius afore mentioned, next in the Bishoprick of Rome succeed Victor, who, as Platina saith, died quietly in the days of Severus. But Damasus supplem. lib. 8. and such as do follow the common Chronicles, affirm that he died a Martyr, after he had fitten ten (or as some say twelve) years. This Victor was a great stirrer (as partly before is lignified) in the controverse and contention of Easter day, for the which he would have proceeded in Excommunication against the Churches of Asia, had not Ireneus, then Bishop of Lions, with the counsel of other his brethren there assembled, repressed his intended violence. As touching that controverse of Easter in those days of the Primitive Church, the original thereof was this, as Eusebius, Socrates, Platina, and others record. First, certain it is, that the Apostles, being only intentive and attendant to the Doctrine of Salvation, gave no heed nor regard to the observation of days and times, neither bound the Church to any Ceremonies and Rites, except those things necessary mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, as strangled and blood, which was ordained then of the Holy Ghost, not without a most urgent and necessary cause, touched partly in the History before. For when the murthering and blood of infants was commonly objected by the Heathen Persecutors against the Christians, they had no other argument to help themselves, nor to resel the adversary, but only their own law, by the which they were commanded to abstain, not only from all mens blood, but also from the blood of all common beasts. And therefore that law seemeth by the Holy Ghost to be given, and also to the same end continued in the Church, so long as the cause, that is, the Persecutions of the Heathen Gentiles continued. Besides these, we read of no other Ceremonies or Rites, which the Apostles greatly regarded, but left such things free to the liberty of Christians, every man to use therein his own discretion, for the using or not using thereof. Whereupon, as concerning all the ceremonial observations of days, times, places, meats, drinks, vestures, and such others: of all these things neither was the diverlity among men greatly noted, nor any uniformity greatly required. In so much that Ireneus writing to Victor of the tradition of days, and of fastings, and of the diverlity of these things then used among the Primitive fathers, saith: Nihilo tamen minus omnes illi pacem inter se retinuerunt & retinemus etiamnum, & festivis dissonantia fides concordiam commendat, &c. that is, Notwithstanding all this variety, all that kept peace among themselves, and yet we keep it still, and this difference of fasting among us commendeth more the con- cord of faith. And so long did the Doctrine of Christian Liberty remain whole and sound in the Church till the time of Victor, which was about the year of our Lord two hundred; although the diversity of these usages began before also in the days of Pius and Anicetus, about the year of Christ one hundred sixty and three, to be mistliked; yet restraint hereof was not so much urged before, as in the time of Victor. And yet neither did the violence of Victor take such place, but that the Doctrine of Christian Liberty was defended and maintained by means of Irenæus and others, and so continued in the Church till after the Council of Nice. And thus much concerning the Doctrine of Christian liberty, and of the differences of Rites and Ceremonies.

Now to return to Victor again, to shew what diversity there was in observing the day of Easter, and how it came, thus is the story. First, in the time of Pius and Anicetus in the year of Christ one hundred sixty and three, the question of Easter day began first to be moved, at what time Pius, by the revelation of Hermes, decreed the observation of that day to be changed from the wonted manner of the fourteenth day of the Moon in the first Moneth unto the next Sunday after. After him came Anicetus, Soter and Eleutherius Bishops of Rome, which also determined the same. Against these stood Melito Bishop of Sardis, Polycarpus, and as some think, Egesippus, with other learned men of Asia. Which Polycarpus, being sent by the brethren of Asia, came to Rome as is aforesaid, to confer with Anicetus in that matter: wherein when they could not agree after long debating, yet notwithstanding, they did both communicate together with reverence, and departed in peace. And so the celebration of Easter day remained adiaphoron, as a thing indifferent in the Church, till the time of Victor; who following after Anicetus and his fellows, and chiefly stirring in this matter, endeavoured by all means and might to draw, or rather subdue the Churches of Asia unto his opinion; thinking moreover to excommunicate all those Bishops and Churches of Asia, as Hereticks and Schismaticks, which disagreed from the Roman order: had not Irenæus otherwise restrained him from that doing, as is aforesaid, which was about the year of our Lord one hundred fourscore and eleven, in the Reign of Commodus. Thus then began the uniformity of keeping that holy day to be first required as a thing necessary, and all they accounted as Hereticks and Schismaticks, which dissented from the Bishop and tradition of Rome.

Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 26.

Polycarpus and Anicetus disagree for in controversie, yet agreed in charity.

Uniformity in ceremonies not to be required as a thing necessary.

With Victor stood Theophilus Bishop of Cesarea, Narcissus of Jerusalem, Irenæus of Lions, Palmas of Pontus, Bacchillus of Corinth, the Bishop of Ostroena, and others more. All which condescended to have the celebration of Easter upon the Sunday, because they would differ from the Jews in all things as near as they might, and partly, because the resurrection of the Lord fell on the same day.

Polycrates Bishop of Ephesus.

On the contrary side, divers Bishops were in Asia, of whom the principal was Polycrates Bishop of Ephesus, who being assembled with a great multitude of Bishops and brethren of those parts, by the common assent of the rest, wrote again to Victor, and to the Church of Rome, declaring, that they had ever from the beginning observed that day, according to the rule of Scripture unchanged, neither adding nor altering any thing from the same: alledging moreover for them the examples of the Apostles and holy Fathers their Predecessors, as Philip the Apostle, with his three daughters at Hierapolis; Also John the Apostle and Evangelist at Ephesus, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Thrasæas at Eumenia Bishop and Martyr; likewise of Sagaris at Laodicea Bishop and Martyr; holy Papirius and Melito at Sardis. Beside these, Bishops also of his own kindred, and his own ancestors, to the number of seven which all were Bishops before him, and he the eighth now after them. All which observed (saith he) the solemnity of the same day, after the same wise and sort as we do now.

Bishops in those days married.

Victor excommunicating the Churches of Asia.

Victor, being not a little moved herewith, by letters again denounceth against them (more bold upon authority, than wise in his commission) violent excommunication, albeit by the wise handling of Irenæus, and other learned men, that matter was staid, and Victor otherwise persuaded. What the perswasions of Irenæus were, partly may appear in Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 26. the sum whereof tendeth to this effect: That the variance and difference of Ceremonies is no strange matter in the Church of Irenæus to Victor.

Christ, when as this variety is not only in the day of Easter, but also in the manner of fasting, and in divers other usages among the Christians. For some fast one day, some two days, some others fast more. Others there be, which counting forty hours, both day and night, take that for a full days fast. And this so divers fashion of fasting in the Church of Christ began not only in this our time, but was before among our fore-elders. And yet notwithstanding, they with all this diversity were in unity among themselves, and so be we; neither doth this difference of Ceremonies any thing hinder, but rather commendeth the concord of faith. And he bringeth forth the examples of the Fathers, of Telesphorus, Pius, Anicetus, Soter, Eleutherius, and such others, who neither observed the same usage themselves, nor prescribed it to others, and yet notwithstanding kept Christian Charity with such as came to communicate with them, not observing the same form of things which they observed, as well appeared by Polycarpus and Aniceetus, which although they agreed not in one uniform custom of Rites, yet refused not to communicate together, the one giving reverence unto the other. Thus the controversie being taken up between Irenæus and Victor, remained free to the time of the Nicene Council. Hæc ex Irenæo Eusebius. And thus much concerning the controversie of that matter, and concerning the doings of Victor.

Diversity of Ceremonies in the primitive Church commended.

After Victor succeeded in the See of Rome, Zephirinus, in the days of the foresaid Severus, about the year of our Lord two hundred and three. To this Zephirinus be ascribed two Epistles, in the first Tome of the Councils. But as I have said before of the Decretal Epistles of other Roman Bishops, so I say and verily suppose of this; that neither the countenance of the stile, nor the matter therein contained, nor the condition of the time doth otherwise give to think of these Letters, but that they be verily bastard Letters, not written by these fathers, nor in these times, but craftily and wickedly packt in by some, which, to set up the Primacy of Rome, have most pestilently abused the authority of these holy and ancient Fathers, to deceive the simple Church. For who is so rude, but that in considering only the state of those terrible times he may easily understand (except affection blind him) beside a number of other probable conjectures to lead him, that the poor persecuted Bishops in that time would have been glad to have any safe convert to put their heads in: so far was it off, that they had any luft or leisure then to seek for any Primacy or Patriarkship, or to drive all other Churches to appeal to the See of Rome, or to exempt all Priests from the accusation of any Lay-man; as in the first Epistle of Zephirinus is to be seen, written to the Bishops of Sicilia: and likewise the second Epistle of his to the Bishops of the Province of Egypt, containing no manner of doctrine, nor consolation necessary for that time, but only certain ritual decrees to no purpose, argueth no less, but the said Epistles neither to favour of that man, nor to taste of that time.

A prodigious belly-God.

Of like credit also seemeth the constitution of the patins of glass, which Damasus saith that the same Zephirinus ordained to be carried before the Priest at the celebration of the Mass. Again Platina writeth that he ordained the administration of the Sacrament to be no more used in vessels of Wood, or of Glass, or of any other Metal, except only Silver, Gold and Tin, &c. But how these two testimonies of Damasus and Platina joyn together, let the Reader judge: especially, seeing the same Decree is referred to Urbanus that came after him. Again, what needed this Decree of Golden Chalices to be established afterward in the Council of Tiber and Rome, if it had been enacted before by Zephirinus? How long this Zephirinus late, our Writers do vary. Eusebius saith, he died in the Reign of Caracalla, and late fourteen years. Platina writeth that he died under Severus, and fat eight years, and so saith also Nauclerus. Damasus affirmeth that he sat sixteen years and two moneths.

This

Severus warreth in Britain.

A wall 80 miles long made by Severus and builded one hundred thirty and two miles in length, betwixt the Picts and the Scots.

{Anno 205.} Severus the Persecutor fain at York.

{Anno 219.}

This Severus the Persecutor reigned, as the most part of Writers accord, the term of eighteen years, who about the later time of his Reign came with his Army hither into Britain, where after many conflicts had with the Britains, in the borders of the North, he cast up a Ditch with a mighty Wall made of earth and turfs, and strong stakes, to the length of one hundred thirty and two miles from the one side of the Sea to the other, beginning at Time, and reaching to the Scotish Sea: which done, he removed to York, and there by the breaking in of the Northern men and Scots, was besieged and slain, about the year of our Lord two hundred and fourteen, leaving behind him two sons, Bassianus and Geta. Which Bassianus, surnamed Caracalla, after he had slain his brother Geta here in Britain, governed the Empire alone, the space of six years. After whose death, he being slain also of his servants (as he had slain his Brother before) succeeded Macrinus with his Son Diadumenus, to be Emperor, who, after they had reigned one year, were both slain of their own people.

The monstrous life of Heliogabalus Emperor.

After them followed Varius Heliogabalus in the Empire, rather to be called a Monster than a Man, so prodigious was his life in all gluttony, filthiness, and ribaudry. Such was his pomp, that in his Lamps he used Balm, and filled his Fish-ponds with Rose water. To let pass his sumptuous Vestures which he would not wear but only of Gold, and most costly silks; his shooes glittering with precious Stones finely ingraved, he was never two days served with one kind of meat; he never wore one garment twice. And likewise for his fleshly wickedness, some days his company was served at Meal with the Brains of Ostriches, and a strange Fowl called Phenocoptery, another day with the tongues of Popingays, and other sweet singing Birds. Being nigh to the Sea, he never used Fish: in places far distant from the Sea, all his house was served with most delicate Fishes: at one Supper he was served with seven thousand Fishes, and five thousand Fowls. At his removing in his progress, often there followed him six hundred Chariots laden only with Bawds, common Harlots and Ribauds. He sacrificed young children, and preferred to the best advancements in the common Weal most light Personages, as Bawds, Minstrels, Carters, and such like: in one word, he was an enemy to all honesty and good order. And when he was foretold by his Sorcerers and Astronomers, that he should die a violent death, he provided Ropes of Silk to hang himself, Swords of Gold to kill himself, and strong Poyson in Jacinths and Emrods to poyson himself, if needs he must thereto be forced; moreover, he made an high Tower, having the Floor of Boards covered with Gold Plate, bordered with precious Stones, from the which Tower he would throw himself down, if he should be pursued of his enemies. But notwithstanding all his provision, he was slain of the Soldiers, drawn through the City, and cast into Tiber, after he had reigned two years and eight months, as witnesseth Eutropius, others say four years.

Heliogabalus slain of his Soldiers. Ex Eutrop.

Alexander Severus Emperor. {Anno 224.}

This Heliogabalus, having no issue, adopted to his Son and Heir Aurelius Alexander Severus, the Son of Mammea, who entring his Reign the year of our Lord one hundred twenty and four, continued thirteen years, well commended for vertuous, wise, gentle, liberal, and to no man hurtful. And as he was not unlearned himself, through the diligent education of Mammea his Mother, so he was a great favourer of men wise and learned. Neither did he any thing in the Commonweal, without the affiance of learned and sage Counsellors. It is reported of him to bear such stomach against corrupt Judges, that when he chanced to meet with any of them, by the commotion of his mind he would cast up choler, being so moved with them that he could not speak, and was ready with his two fingers to put out their eyes. From his Court he dismissed all superfluous and unneedful servants, saying, that he was no good Pupil, which fed idle servants with the bowels of his Commonweal.

Against corrupt Judges. The saying of Alexander to be noted and followed. His revenues cast up the bounds of the Commonweal.

Among his other good vertues, it appeareth also that he was friendly and favourable unto the Christians, as by this act may be gathered: for when the Christians had occupied a certain publick place in some good use, belike for the assembling and conventing together of the Congregation; the company of the Cooks or Tiplers made challenge of that place to belong unto them. The matter being brought before the Emperor, he judged it more honest, the place to be continued to the worship of God, howsoever it were, than the dirty flubbering of Cooks and Scullions.

It was not worthy to be married.

By this it may be understood, that in Rome no Christian Churches were erected unto this time, when as yet (notwithstanding this favour of the Emperor,) no publick house could quietly be obtained for the Christians. So that by the reason hereof may appear the Decretal Epistle and Ordinance of Pope Higinus concerning the Dedication of Churches above mentioned to be falsified. And likewise the Ordinance of Pius his successor, concerning the Altar, or Superaltare to be also false. For what Superaltare was it like they had in the time of Higinus and Pius, when at this time, which was long after, no publick place almost could be granted them for the Christians to assemble together.

Platina in vita Pontificum.

Of this Alexander Platina writeth, that as he was a great hater of all boasters and flatterers, so he was of such prudence, that no deceit could escape him, and bringeth in a story of one Turinus, who had gotten craftily many great bribes and gifts, in making the people believe that he was of great authority with the Emperor, and that he could help them to have whatsoever they sued for. Whereof the Emperor being certified, caused him in the open Market to be fathned to a Stake, and there killed with smoke, where with the Crier stood thus crying to the People, Smoke be sold, and with smoke he is punished.

Punished with smoke that sold smoke.

Mammea the Mother of this Alexander above mentioned (whom Hierome calleth a devout and religious woman) hearing of the fame and the excellent learning of Origen, being then at Alexandria, sent for him to Antioch, desirous to hear and see him: unto whom the foresaid Origen according to her request resorted, and after that he had there remained a space with the Emperor and his Mother, returned again to Alexandria.

Mammea the Mother of the Emperor.

And thus continued this good Emperor his Reign the space of 13 years: at length at a commotion in Germany, with his Mother Mammea he was slain. After whom succeeded Maximinus, contrary to the mind of the Senate, only appointed by the Souldiers to be Emperor. During all this time between Severus and this Maximinus, the Church of Christ, although it had not perfect peace, yet it had some mean tranquility from Persecution. Albeit some Martyrs there were of this time that suffered, whereof Nauclerus giveth this reason: For although (saith he) Alexander being perswaded through the intreating of his Mother Mammea, did favour the Christians: yet notwithstanding, there was no publick Edict or Proclamation provided for their safeguard. By reason whereof, divers there were which suffered Martyrdom under Almachius and other Judges. In the number of whom, after some Stories, was Calixtus Bishop of Rome, who succeeded next unto Zephirinus above mentioned; and after him Urbanus also, which both being Bishops of Rome, did both suffer, by the opinion of some Writers, under Alexander Severus.

Ex Nauclero.

Calixtus Bishop of Rome and Martyr.

This Calixtus in his two Decretal Epistles, written to Benedictus and to the Bishops of France, giveth these ordinances, that no actions or accusations against the Prelats or Teachers of the Church should be received, that no secret conspiracies should be made against Bishops: Item, no man to communicate with perfons excommunicate: also no Bishop to excommunicate or to deal in anothers Diocess. And here he expoundeth the Diocess, or the Parish of any Bishop or Minister to be his Wife. The wife (saith the Apostle) is bound to the law, as long as the husband liveth; when he is dead, she is free from the law: So (saith Calixtus) the wife of a Bishop (which is his Church) so long as he liveth, is bound only to him, neither ought to be judged or disposed by any other man, without his will and judgment: after his death she is free from the law, so marry to whom she will, so it be in the Lord, that is regulariter, regularly. In the end of the said his Epistle Decretal, he confuteth the error of them which hold, that they which are fallen are not to be received again. Which Heresie, after the time of Calixtus or Calistus, came in first by Novatus, in the days of Cornelius. Moreover, in his said first Epistle Decretal is contained the fast of the four times, commonly called the Ember fast, whereof also Marianus Scotus maketh mention. But Damasus speaking of the same fast, saith, he ordained the fast but of three times, which was for the increase of Corn, Wine and Oyl.

institutions to those holy Fathers. For first, what leisure had the Christians to lay in their accusations against their Bishops, when we never read or find in any story any kind of variance in those days among them, but all love, mutual compassion, and hearty communion among the Saints? And as we read of no variance among the people in those days, nor of any fault or backsliding among the Bishops, who for the most part then died all constant Martyrs: so neither do we read of any Tribunal Seat or Consistory used or frequented then about any such matters. Again, if a man examine well the dangers of those bulie days, he shall see the poor flock of the Christians so occupied and pitiously oppressed by the cruel accusations of the Heathen Infidels, that though the cause did, yet the time would not serve them to commence any Law against their Bishops. Secondly, as touching their conspiracy against Bishops, What conspiracy either would they then practice against them, which always gave their lives for their defence? Or how could they then conspire in any companies together, when never a true Christian man durst once put his head out of his doors? neither was there in the Church any Christian man in those perilous days, except he were a true man indeed, such as was far from all false conspirares. And when as all the World almost in all places conspired against them: what time, what cause, or what heart, trow ye, could they have to conspire against their instructors? Thirdly, concerning the confutation of that Heresie, how standeth the confutation with the time of Calixtus, when Novatus the Author of that Heresie was after him in the time of Cornelius? Fourthly, if by the law of Calixtus, every Diocese be the proper Wife of every Bishop or Minister, then how many Bishops Wives, and Parsons Wives, had the adulterous Pope of Rome defloured in these later days of the Church, which so proudly and impudently hath intermedled and taken his pleasure, and his own profit, in every Diocese and Parish almost through all Christendom, without all leave and licence of the good man, who hath been in the mean time, and yet is compelled still, whereso ever the Popes holiness cometh, Vigilante stertere naso, and to give him leave unasked to do what he list? Whereforе if this Canon Decretal be truly his, why is it not observed, so as it doth stand without exception? If it be not, why is it then falsly forged upon him, and the Church of Christ deceived? and certes, lamentable it is, that this falsifying of such trifling traditions, under the false pretence of antiquity, either was begun in the Church to deceive the people, or that it hath remained so long undetected. For, as I think, the Church of Christ will never be perfectly reformed, before these Decretal Constitutions and Epistles, which have so long put on the Visor of Antiquity, shall be fully detected, and appear in their own colour, wherein they were first painted.

And yet neither do I say this, or think contrary, but that it may be, that Bishops of Rome and of the same name have been the true authors of these traditions. But here cometh in the error (as I credibly suppose) that when other later Bishops of the like name have devised these ceremonial inventions, the vulgar opinion of men hath transferred them to the first primitive fathers, although being of another time, yet bearing the same name with the true inventors thereof. But of Calixtus enough: who, as Damasus saith, in the days of this Alexander Severus died a Martyr. Vincentius affirmeth, that he was tied to a great stone, and so out of a Window was thrown into a ditch. Eusebius, speaking of his death, maketh no mention of his Martyrdom, and saith he fate five years, Platina saith six years, Sabellicus giveth him seven years, and so doth Damasus.

Calixtus a Martyr. Ex Vincen. in spec. hist. Ex Anton. tit. 7. cap. 6.

Urbanus Bishop of Rome. {Anno 227.}

After Calixtus followed Urbanus, about the year of our Lord two hundred twenty seven, who in his Epistle Decretal (coming out of the same forge) which he wrote in common to all Bishops, making no mention of the heavy Persecutions of the Church, nor minifiring any exhortation of comfort or constancy to the brethren, only giveth many strict precepts, for not transporting or alienating the goods of the Church, and to pay truly their offerings which they vow: also to have all common among the Clergy. Moreover, about the end of his Epistle he instituteth the confirmation of Children after Baptism (which the Papists be wont to take into the number of their seven Sacraments;) affirming and denouncing more than Scripture will bear, that the imposition of the Bishops hand bringeth the Holy Ghost, and that thereby men be made full Christians, &c. But of these Decretal Epistles enough is faid before, more may be considered of the discreet Reader. Marianus Scotus, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, and other late story Writers do hold, as is aforesaid, that he died a Martyr in the days of Alexander Severus, after he had governed that seat four years, as Damasus and Platina do witness, as Marianus saith, eight years.

Confirmation of Children instituted.

Urbanus Martyr.

The fame Damasus and Platina do testifie of him, that he by his preaching and holiness of life, converted divers Ethniks to the faith. Among whom were Tiburtius, and Valerianus the Husband of Cecilia, which both, being Noblemen of Rome, remained constant in the faith unto the end and Martyrdom. Of this Cecilia thus it is written in the Martyrology by Ado, that Cecilia the Virgin, after she had brought Valerian her Husband espoused, and Tiburtius his brother to the knowledge and faith of Christ, and with her exhortations had made them constant unto Martyrdom; after the suffering of them she was also apprehended by Almachius the Ruler, and brought to the Idols to do sacrifice: which thing when she abhorred to do, she should be presented before the Judge to have the condemnation of death. In the mean time, the Serjeants and Officers which were about her, beholding her comely beauty, and the prudent behaviour in her conversation, began with many perswasions of words to sollicite her mind to favour her self, and that so excellent beauty, and not to cast her self away, &c. But she again so replied to them with reasons and godly exhortations, that by the grace of Almighty God their hearts began to kindle, and at length to yield to that Religion, which before they did persecute. Which thing she perceiving desired of the Judge Almachius a little respite: which being granted, she fendeth for Urbanus the Bishop home to her house, to stablish and ground them in the faith of Christ: and so were they with divers others at the same time baptised, both men and women, to the number (as the story saith) of 400 persons, among whom was one Gordianus a Nobleman. This done, this blessed Martyr was brought before the Judge, where she was condemned; then after was brought to the house of the Judge, where she was inclosed in a hot bath; but she remaining there a whole day and night without any hurt, as in a cold place, was brought out again, and commandment given that in the Bath she should be beheaded. The Executer is said to have four strokes at her neck; and yet her head being cut off, she (as the story giveth) lived three days after, and so died this holy Virgin Martyr, whose body in the night season Urbanus the Bishop took and buried among the other Bishops. Ado the compiler of this Martyrology addeth that this was done in the time of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. But that cannot be, for so much as Urbanus by all Histories was long after these Emperors, and lived in the days of this Alexander, as is above declared. Antoninus Bergomensis, Equilinus, with such other Writers set forth this History with many strange Miracles wrought by the said Cecilia, in converting her Husband Valerianus and his brother, in shewing them the Angel which was the keeper of her Virginity, and of the Angel putting on Crowns upon their heads. But as touching these Miracles, as I do not dispute whether they be true or fabulous, so because they have no ground upon any ancient or grave Authors, but are taken out of certain new Legends, I do therefore refer them thither from whence they came.

The Martyrdom of Cecilia.

Under the fame Alexander divers other there be, whom Bergomensis mentioned to have suffered Martyrdom, as one Agapetus of the age of fifteen years, who being apprehended and condemned at Prenestе in Italy, because he would not sacrifice to idols, was affailed with sundry torments: first with Whips scourged, then hanged up by the feet, after having hot water poured upon him, at the last cast to the wild beasts: with all which torments when he could not be hurt, finally, with sword was beheaded. The Executer of these punishments (as by Henricus Erford may be gathered) was one Antiochus; who in the executing of the foresaid torments suddenly fell down from his Judicial Seat, crying out, that all his inward bowels burned within him, and so gave up the breath. Henr. de Erfordia, lib. 6. cap. 29.

Also with the same Agapetus is numbred Calepodius a Minister of Rome, whose body first was drawn through the City of Rome, and after cast into Tiber. Bergo. ibidem.

Then followeth Pammachius a Senator of Rome, with his wife and children, and others both men and women, to the number of forty and two.

Item, another noble Senator of Rome named Simplicius, all which together in one day had their heads smitten off, and their heads after hanged up in divers gates of the City for a terrour of others, that none should profess the name of Christ.

Quirinius martyr.

Besides these suffered also Quirinius a noble man of Rome, who, with his mother Julia and a great number more, were put likewise to death.

Julia his mother, martyrs.

Also Tiburtius and Valerianus Citizens of Rome, and brethren, suffered (as Bergomensis saith) the same time, who, first being bruised and broken with bats, after were beheaded.

Tiburtius, Valerianus, brethren and martyrs.

Also Vincentius, Bergomensis, and Erfordiensis make mention of Martina a Christian Virgin, which, after divers bitter Punishments being constant in her faith, suffered in like manner by the sword.

Martina a virgin and martyr.

Albeit as touching the time of these forenamed Martyrs, as I find them not in older writers: So do I suppose them to suffer under Maximinus or Decius, rather than under Alexander.

The sixth Persecution.

Maximinus Emperor and persecutor. The sixth persecution. {Anno 237.}

After the death of Alexander the Emperor, who with his mother Mammea (as is said) was murdered in Germany, followed Maximinus, chosen by the will of the Souldiers, rather than by the authority of the Senate, about the year of our Lord, two hundred thirty and seven; who for the hatred he had to the house of Alexander (as Eusebius recordeth) raised up the sixth Persecution against the Christians, especially against the teachers and leaders of the Church, thinking thereby the sooner to vanquish the rest, if the Captains of them were removed out of the way. Whereby I suppose the Martyrdom of Urbanus the Bishop, and of the rest above specified, to have happened rather under the Tyranny of this Maximinus than under Alexander.

Origenes de martyrio.

In the time of this Persecution Origen, wrote his Book. De Martyrio: which book if it were extant would give us some knowledge, I doubt not, of such as in this Persecution did suffer, which now lie in silence unknown, and no doubt but a great number they were, and more should have been, had not the provident mercy of God, shortned his days and bridled his Tyranny, for he Reigned but three years. After whom succeeded Gordianus in the year of our Lord two hundred and forty, a man no less studious for the utility of the Common-wealth, than mild and gentle to the Christians. This Gordianus, after he had governed with much peace and tranquility the Monarchy of Rome the space of six years, was slain of Philip Emperor after him.

Gordianus Emperor. {Anno 240.}

In the days of these Emperors above recited was Pontianus Bishop of Rome, who succeeded next after Urbanus above rehearsed, about the year of our Lord two hundred thirty and six, in the twelfth year of Alexander, as Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 28. noteth, declaring him to sit six years. Contrary Damasus and Platina write, that he was Bishop nine years and a half, and that in the time of Alexander he with Philippus his Priest was banished into Sardinia, and there died. But it seemeth more credible that he was banished rather under Maximinus, and died in the beginning of the Reign of Gordianus. In his Epistles decretal (which seem likewise to be fained) he appeareth very devout, after the common example of other Bishops, to uphold the dignity of Priests, and of Clergy men, saying; that God hath them so familiar with him, that by them he accepteth the offerings and oblations of others, he forgiveth their sins, and reconcileth them unto him: Also, that they do make the body of the Lord with their own mouth, and give it to others, &c. which doctrine how it standeth with the testament of God and glory of Christ, let the Reader use his own Judgment.

This doctrine fetcheth deogratory to Christ and blasphemous.

A notable example of Gods just judgment upon a perfecutor. Euseb. lib.

Other notable Fathers also in the same time were raised up in the Church, as Philetus Bishop of Antioch, which succeeded after Asclepiades afore mentioned, in the year of our Lord two hundred and twenty, and after him Zebenus Bishop of the same place, in the year of our Lord two hundred thirty and one.

To these also may be added Ammonius the schoolmaster of Origen, as Suidas supposeth, also the kinsmen of Porphyrie the great Enemy of Christ: Notwithstanding this Ammonius indued with better grace as he left divers Books in defence of Christs Religion, so did he constantly persevere (as Eusebius reporteth) in the doctrine of Christ, which he had in the beginning received, who was about the days of Alexander, Ammonius a Christian writer.

Julius Africanus also, about the time of Gordianus aforesaid, is numbred among the old and ancient writers, of whom Nicephorus writeth that he was the scholar of Origen, and a great writer of histories of that time.

Julius Africanus writer.

Unto these Doctors and confessors may be adjoyned the story of Natalius mentioned in the first Book of Eusebius. This Natalius, had suffered Persecution before like a constant confessor, and was seduced and perswaded by Asclepiodotus and Theodorus (which were the disciples of Theodocus) to take upon him to be Bishop of their sect, promising to give him every month an hundred and fifty pieces of silver: So joyning himself to them, was admonished by visions and revelation from the Lord; for such was the great mercy of God, and of our Lord Christ Jesus, that he would not have his Martyr, which had suffered so much for his name before, now to perish out of his Church: For the which cause (saith Eusebius) God by certain visions did admonish him; but he not taking great heed thereunto, being blinded partly with lucre, partly with honour, was at length all the night long scourged of the Angels, in so much that he being made thereby very sore, and early on the morrow putting on sack-cloth, with much weeping and lamentation went to Zephirinus the Bishop above mentioned, where he falling down before him and all the Christian Congregation, shewed them the stripes of his body, and prayed them for the mercies of Christ, that he might be received into their communion again, from which he had sequestred himself before, and so was admitted according as he desired.

Natalius confessor. Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 28.

The Lord will not lose them which have done or suffered any thing for him.

After the decease of Pontianus Bishop of Rome aforementioned, succeeded next in that place Anterius, of whom Isuardus writeth, that Pontianus departing away did substitute him in his room: But Eusebius writeth that he succeeded immediately after him. Damasus saith, that because he caused the acts and deaths of the Martyrs to be written, therefore he was put to Martyrdom himself by Maximinus the Judge. Concerning the time of this Bishop our writers do greatly jarr. Eusebius and Marianus Scotus affirm that he was Bishop but one month; Sabellicus saith that not to be so. Damasus assigneth to him twelve years and one month. Volaterranus, Bergomensis, and Henricus Erford give to him three years and one month. Nauclerus writeth that he sat one year and one month. All which are so far discrepant one from another, that which of them most agreeth with truth, it lieth in doubt. Next to this Bishop was Fabianus, of whom more is to be said hereafter.

Anterius Bishop of Rome martyr.

Authors disagree.

Of Hippolytus also both Eusebius and Hieronymus maketh mention that he was a Bishop; but where, they make no relation. And so likewise doth Theodoretus witness him to be a Bishop, and also a Martyr, but naming no place. Gelasius contra Eutichen saith, he died a Martyr, and that he was Bishop of an head City in Arabia. Nicephorus writeth, that he was Bishop of Ostia, a port town near to Rome. Certain it is, he was a great writer, and left many works in the Church, which Eusebius and Hierome do recite: By the supputation of Eusebius, he was about the year of our Lord, two hundred and thirty.

Hippolytus Bishop and martyr.

Prudentius in his Peristephanon, making mention of great heaps of Martyrs buried by threescore together, speaketh also of Hippolytus, and saith that he was drawn with wild Horses through fields, dales and bushes, and described thereof a pitiful story.

After the Emperor Gordianus, the Empire fell to Philippus, who with Philip his son governed the space of seven years, in the year of our Lord, two hundred forty and six. This Philippus with his son and all his family was Christened and converted by Fabianus and Origen, by who by letters exhorted him and Severa his wife to be Baptised, being the first of all the Emperors that brought in Christianity into the Imperial seat. Decius Emperor. { Anno } 250.

THus Philippus being ſlain, after him Decius invaded the Crown about the year of our Lord two hundred and fifty, by whom was moved a terrible Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, which Oroſius noteth to be the ſeventh Perſecution. The firſt occaſion of this hatred and Perſecution of this Tyrant, conceived againſt the Chriſtians, was chiefly (as is before touched) becauſe of the treaſures of the Emperor which were committed to Fabian the Biſhop.

The firſt occaſion of the Perſecution.

Fabianus Biſhop of Rome. Euſeb. lib. 6.

This Fabian firſt being a married man (as Platina writeth) was made Biſhop of Rome after Anterius above mentioned, by the miraculous appointment of God, which Euſebius doth thus deſcribe in his ſixth Book. When the brethren (ſaith he) were together in the Congregation about the election of their Biſhop, and had purpoſed among themſelves upon the nomination of ſome noble and worthy perſonage of Rome, it chanced that Fabianus among others was there preſent, who of late before was newly come out of the Country to inhabite in the City. This Fabian (as is ſaid) thinking nothing leſs than of any ſuch matter, there ſuddenly cometh a Dove flying from above, and ſitteth upon his head, whereupon all the Congregation being moved, with one mind and one voice to chooſe him for their Biſhop, in the which Function he remained the ſpace of thirteen years, as Euſebius writeth; Damaſus, Marianus and Sabellicus ſay fourteen years unto the time of Decius: who, whether for that Philippus had committed to him his treaſures, or whether for the hatred he bare to Philippus, in the beginning of his Reign cauſed him to be put to death, ſending out moreover his Proclamation into all quarters, that all which profeſſed the name of Chriſt ſhould be ſlain.

The miraculous election of Fabianus.

Fabianus Martyr.

To this Fabian he aſcribed certain Ordinances, as of conſecrating new Oyl once every year, and burning the old, of accuſations againſt Biſhops, of appealing to the Sea Apoſtolick, of not marrying within the fifth degree, of communicating thrice a year, of offering every Sunday, with ſuch other things more in his three Epiſtles Decretal; the which Epiſtles, as by divers other evidences may be ſuppoſed to be untruly named upon him, giving no ſignification of any matter agreeing to that time: ſo do I find the moſt part of the third Epiſtle word for word ſtanding in the Epiſtle of Sixtus the third, which followed almoſt two hundred years after him, beſide the unſeemly Doctrine alſo in the end of the ſaid Epiſtles contained, where he contrary to the tenor of the Goſpel appointeth remiſſion of ſins (only due to the blood of Chriſt) unto the Offerings of Bread and Wine by men and women every Sunday in the Church.

To this Fabianus wrote Origen de Orthodoxia ſuæ fidei, that is, Of the righteouſneſs of his faith: whereby is to be underſtood, that he continued to the time of Decius: ſome ſay alſo to the time of Gallus. Of this Origen partly mention is touched before, declaring how bold and fervent he was in the days of Severus, in aſſiſting, comforting, exhorting and kiſſing the Martyrs that were impriſoned and ſuffered for the Name of Chriſt, with ſuch danger of his own life, that had not been the ſingular protection of God, he had been ſtoned to death many times of the heathen multitude. Such great concourſe of men and women was daily at his houſe to be catechiſed and inſtructed in the Chriſtian faith by him, that Soulders were hired of purpoſe to defend the place where he taught them. Again, ſuch ſearch ſometime was ſet for him, that fearce any ſhifting of place or Country could cover him. In whoſe laborious travels and affairs of the Church, in teaching, writing, confuting, exhorting and expounding, he continued about the ſpace of fifty two years, unto the time of Decius and Gallus. Divers and great Perſecutions he ſuſtained, but eſpecially under Decius, as teſtifieth Euſebius in his ſixth Book, declaring that for the Doctrine of Chriſt, he ſuſtained bands and torments in his body, rackings with bars of iron, Dungeons, beſides terrible threats of death and burning. All this he ſuffered in the Perſecution of Decius, as Euſebius recordeth of him, and maketh no relation of any further matter. But Suidas and Nicephorus following the ſame, ſaith further concerning him, that the ſaid Origen, after divers and ſundry other torments which he manfully and conſtantly ſuffered for Chriſt, at length was brought to an Altar, where a foul filthy Ethiop was appointed to be, and there this option or choice was offered unto him, whether he would ſacrifice to the Idols, or have his body polluted with that foul and ugly Ethiop. Then Origen (ſaith he) who with a Philoſophical mind ever kept his Chaſtity undefiled, much abhorring that filthy villany to be done to his body, condeſcended to their requeſt: whereupon the Judge, putting incenſe in his hand, cauſed him to fet it to the fire upon the Altar; for the which impiety he afterward was excommunicated of the Church. Epiphanius writeth, that he being urged to ſacrifice to idols, and taking the Boughs in his hand, wherewith the Heathen were wont to honour their Gods, called upon the Chriſtians to carry them in the honour of Chriſt. The which fact the Church of Alexandria miſliking, removed him from their Communion: whereupon Origen, driven away with ſhame and ſorrow out of Alexandria, went into Jury, where being in Jeruſalem among the Congregation, and there requeſted of the Prieſts and Miniſters (he being alſo a Prieſt) to make ſome exhortation in the Church, he refuſed a great while to do. At length by importunate petition being conſtrained thereunto, he roſe up, and turning the Book, as though he would have expounded ſome place of the Scripture, he only read the Verſe of the forty ninth Pſalm: But God ſaid to the ſinner, why doſt thou preach my juſtifications, and why doſt thou take my teſtament in thy mouth? &c. Which Verſe being read, he ſhut the Book, and fate down weeping and wailing, the whole Congregation alſo weeping and lamenting with him: Suid. Niceph. More what became of Origen it is not found in Hiſtory, but only that Suidas addeth, he died and was buried at Tyrus, Euſebius affirmeth, that he departed under the Emperor Gallus, about the year of our Lord 255; and the 70th. year of his age, in great miſery (as appeareth) and poverty.

In this Origen divers blemiſhes of Doctrine be noted, whereupon Hieronne ſometimes doth inveigh againſt him; albeit in ſome places again he doth extoll and commend him for his excellent learning, as in his Apology againſt Ruffi. And in his Epiſtle to Pammachius and Ocean, where he praiſeth Origen, although not for the perfection of his Faith and Doctrine, nor for an Apoſtle, yet for an excellent Interpreter, for his wit, and for a Philoſopher: and yet in his Prologue upon the Homilies of Origen on Ezekiel, he calleth him another Maſter of the Churches after the Apoſtles. And in another Preface upon his queſtions upon Geneſis, he wiſheth to himſelf the knowledge of the Scriptures, which Origen had, alſo with the envy of his name. Athanaſius moreover calleth him ſingular and laborious, and placeth alſo his teſtimonies againſt the Arrians. Socrates lib. 6. cap. 13.

After Origen, the congrue order of Hiſtory requireth next to ſpeak of Heraclas his Uſher; a man ſingularly commended for his knowledge, not only in Philoſophy, but alſo in ſuch faculties as to a chriſtian divine do appertain. This great towardneſs of wit and learning when Origen perceived in him, he appointed him above all others to be his Uſher or Under-teacher, to help in his School or Univerſity of Alexandria in the Reign of Antoninus Caracalla Son of Severus. And after in the tenth year of Alexander, Origen departing unto Ceſarea, he ſucceeded in his room to govern the School in Alexandria. Further alſo in the time of Gordianus, after the deceaſe of Demetrius Biſhop of Alexandria, this Heraclas ſucceeded to be Biſhop of the ſaid City: Euſebius lib. 6. cap. 29. In the which function he miniſtred the term of ſixteen years. Euſebius lib. 6. cap. 35. Of this Heraclas writeth Origen himſelf, that he, although being Prieſt, yet ceaſed not to read over and peruſe the Books of the Gentiles, to the intent he might the better out of their own Books confute their error, &c.

which died three years before Decius, about the year of our Lord, two hundred and fifty. After whom ſucceeded next in the ſame ſeat of Alexandria, Dionyſius Alexandrinus, who alſo ſuffered much under the Tyranny of Decius, as hereafter ſhall be ſhewed (Chriſt willing) when we come to the time of Valerian.

Ex Niceph. lib. 4. cap. 29.

Nicephorus in his firſt Book, and others which write of this Perſecution under Decius declare the horribleneſs thereof to be ſo great, and ſo innumerable Martyrs to ſuffer in the ſame, that he ſaith, it is as eaſie to number the ſands of the Sea, as to recite the particular names of them whom this Perſecution did devour. In the which Perſecution the chiefeſt doers and tormentors under the Emperor appear in the hiſtory of Vincentius to be theſe: Optimus the under-conſul, Secundianus, Verianus, and Marcellianus, &c. Although therefore it be hard here to inſer all and ſingular Perſons in order that died in this Perſecution, yet ſuch as remain moſt notable in ſtories, I will briefly touch by the grace of him for whoſe cauſe they ſuffered.

In the former tractation of the firſt Perſecution, mention was made before of Alexander, Biſhop of Hieruſalem, and of his troubles ſuffered under Severus, and how afterward by the mirracle of God, he was appointed Biſhop of Hieruſalem, where he continued a very aged man, above the term of forty years Governor of that Church, till the time of the firſt year of Decius, at what time he being brought from Hieruſalem to Ceſarea into the Judgment place, after a conſtant and evident confeſſion of his faith made before the Judge, was committed unto priſon, and there finiſhed his life, as teſtified Dionyſius Alexandrinus in the ſixth Book of Euſebius. After whom ſucceeded in that ſeat Mezabanes the thirty and ſixth Biſhop of that City, after James the Apoſtle.

Alexander Biſhop of Hieruſalem martyr. Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 41.

Aſclepiades Biſhop of Antioch martyr. Ex Euſeb. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 52. A place of Vincentius repaired.

Mention was made alſo before of Aſclepiades Biſhop of Antioch, who ſucceeded after Serapion, and in the Perſecution of Severus did likewiſe perſevere a conſtant confeſſor, and, as Vincentius teſtifieth in his eleventh Book, ſuffered Martyrdom at laſt under this Decius. But this computation of Vincentius can in no wiſe agree with the truth of time; for ſo much as by probable writers, as Zonaras, Nicephorus, and others, the ſaid Aſclepiades after Serapion entred the Biſhops ſeat of Antioch, in the year of our Lord, two hundred and fourteen, and ſate ſeven years before the time of Gordianus, after whom ſucceeded Philetus, in the year of our Lord, two hundred twenty and one, governing the function twelve years. And after him Zebinus followed in the year of our Lord, two hundred thirty and two, and ſo after him Babylas; which Babylas, if he died in this Perſecution of Decius, then could not Aſclepiades alſo ſuffer in the ſame time, who died ſo long before him, as is declared

Of this Babylas, Biſhop of Antioch, Euſebius and Zonaras record, that under Decius he died in priſon, as did Alexander, Biſhop of Hieruſalem above rehearſed.

Babylas Biſhop of Antioch, martyr. Ex Chryſoſt. lib. 1. cont. Gentiles. The ſtory of Babylas.

We read in a certain treatiſe of Chryſoſtome, intituled Contra Gentiles, a noble and long Hiſtory of one Babylas a Martyr, who about theſe times was put to death for refuſing a certain Emperor, not ſuffering him to enter into the Temple of the Chriſtians after a cruel murther committed, the ſtory of which murther is this: There was a certain Emperor, who upon concluſion of peace made with a certain nation, had received for hoſtage or ſurety of peace the ſon of the King, being of young and tender age, with conditions upon the ſame, that neither he ſhould be moleſted of them, nor that they ſhould ever be vexed of him. Upon this the Kings ſon was delivered, not without great care and fear of the father, unto the Emperor, whom the cruel Emperor, contrary to promiſe, cauſed in ſhort time without all juſt cauſe to be ſlain. This fact ſo horrible being committed, the tyrant with all haſt would enter into the Temple of the Chriſtians, where Babylas being Biſhop or Miniſter withſtood him that he ſhould not into that place approach. The Emperor therewith not a little incenſed, in great rage had him forthwith to be laid in priſon with as many Irons as he could bear, and from thence ſhortly after to be brought forth to death and Execution. Babylas, going conſtantly and boldly to his Martyrdom, delired after his death to be buried with his Irons and bands, and ſo he was. The ſtory procedeth moreover, and ſaith; that in the continuance of time in the raign of Conſtantinus, Gallus, then made the overſeer of the Eaſt parts, cauſed his body to be tranſlated into the Suburbs of Antioch, called Daphnes, where was a Temple of Apollo, famous with deviliſh oracles and anſwers given by that Idol, or by the Devil rather in that place. In the which Temple, after the bringing of the body of Babylas, the Idol ceaſed to give any more oracles, ſaying, that for the body of Babylas he could give no more anſwers, and complaining that that place was wont to be conſecrated unto him, but now it was full of dead mens Bodies. And thus the oracles there ceaſed for that time till the coming of Julianus; who inquiring out the cauſe why the oracles ceaſed, cauſed the bones of the holy Martyr to be removed again from thence by the Chriſtians, whom he then called Galileans. They coming in a great multitude, both men, maidens and children, to the tomb of Babylas, tranſported his bones according to the commandment of the Emperor, ſinging by the way as they went, the verſe of the Pſalm in words, as followeth: Confounded be all that worſhip Images, and all that glory in Idols, &c. Which coming to the Emperors ear, ſet him in great rage againſt the Chriſtians, ſtirring up Perſecution againſt them. Albeit Zonaras declareth the cauſe ſomething otherwiſe, ſaying, that ſo ſoon as the body of him and other Martyrs were removed away, incontinent the Temple of the Idol, with the image, in the night was conſumed with fire: For the which cauſe (ſaith Zonaras) Julian ſtirred up with anger, perſecuted the Chriſtians, as ſhall be ſhewed (Chriſt willing) in his order and place hereafter.

The body of Babylas ſtopped the oracles of Idols.

Ex Zozom. lib. 5.

And thus much of Babylas, which whether it was the ſame Babylas Biſhop then of Antioch, or another of the ſame name, it appeareth not by Chryſoſtome, which neither maketh mention of the Emperors name, nor of the place where this Babylas was Biſhop. Again, the ſtopping of the Emperor out of the Church importeth as much, as that Emperor to have been a Chriſtian: For otherwiſe, if he had come in as an heathen, and as a Perſecutor, it was not then the manner of Chriſtian Biſhops violently to withſtand the Emperors, or to ſtop them out. Over and beſide the teſtimony of Euſebius, Zonaras doth witneſs contrary in his ſixth Book, that this Babylas, which was then Biſhop of Antioch after Zebinus, was not put to death by the tormentors, but died in priſon: Wherefore it is not unpoſſible, but this Babylas, and this Emperor which Chryſoſtom ſpeaketh of, may be another Babylas than that which ſuffered under Decius. Nicephorus in his fifth Book maketh mention of another Babylas beſide this that ſuffered under Decius, which was Biſhop of Nicomedia.

Euſebius moreover in his ſixth Book reciteth out of the Epiſtles of Dionyſius Alexandrinus, divers that ſuffered diverſly at Alexandria; the which places of Dionyſius, as they be cited in Euſebius, I thought here good for the antientneſs of the author, to inſert and notifie in his own words, and in our language, as he wrote them to Fabius Biſhop of Antioch, as followeth.

Ex Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 40. 41. 42.

This

The Epistle of Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria to Fabius.

This persecution (saith he) began not with the proclamation set forth by the Emperor, but began a whole year before, by the occasion and means of a wicked person, a South-sayer, and a follower of wicked arts: Who, coming to our City here, stirred up the multitude of the heathen against us, and incited them to maintain their own old superstition and gentility of their country; whereby they being set agog, and obtaining full power to prosecute their wicked purpose, so thought, and no less declared, all their piety and Religion to consist only in Idolatrous worship of Devils, and in our destruction. And first flying upon a certain Priest of ours, named Metras, they apprehended him, and brought him forth to make him speak after their wicked Blasphemy; which, when he would not do, they laid upon him with staves and clubs, and with sharp reeds pricked his face and eyes, and afterward bringing him out into the Suburbs, there they stoned him to death. Then they took a faithful woman, called Quinta, and brought her to the Temple of their Idols, to compel her to worship with them: Which when she refused to do, and abhorred their Idols, they bound her feet, and drew her through the whole street of the City upon the hard stones, and so dashing her against Millstones, and scourging her with whips, brought her to the same place of the Suburbs, as they did the other before, where she likewise ended her life. This done, in a great outrage, and with a multitude running together, they burst into houses of the Religious and Godly Christians, spoiling, sacking and carrying away all that they could find of any price. The rest of things, such as were of less value and of wood, they brought into the open Market, and set them on fire. In the mean time the brethren voided aside, and withdrew themselves, taking patiently and no less joyfully the spoiling of their goods, than did they of whom Saint Paul doth testifie: Neither do I know any of them all (only excepted) apprehended of them, which revolting from his profession denied the Lord yet to this present day.

A common-tion of the people of Alexandria against the Christians.

Metras, martyr.

Quinta a faithful woman and martyr.

Patience and joy in affliction. The constancy of the martyrs of Alexandria.

Amongst the rest that there were taken, there was a certain virgin well stricken in years, named Apollinia, whom they brought forth, and dashing all her teeth out of her jaws, made a great fire before the City, threatning to cast her into the same, unless she would Blaspheme with them and deny Christ: whereat she staying a little with her self, as one that would take a pause, suddenly leaped into the midst of the fire, and there was burned.

Apollinia a blessed virgin and martyr.

Serapion martyr.

There was also one Serapion, whom they took in his own house, and after they had offayled him with sundry kinds of Torments, and had broken almoft all the joynts of his body, they cast him down from an upper loft, and so did he complete his Martyrdom. Thus was there no way neither privy nor publick, nor corner, nor alley left for us, neither by day nor by night to escape, all the People making an outcry against us, that unless we uttered words of Blasphemy, we should be drawn to the fire and burned. And this outragious tumult indured a certain space, but at length, as the Lord would, the miserable wretches fell at dessention among themselves, which turned the cruelty they exercised against us, upon their own heads. And so had we a little breathing time for a season, while the fury of the heathen people by this occasion aswaged.

The just punishment of God turning the cruelty of adversaries upon themselves.

Shortly then after this, word was brought unto us that the state of the Empire, which before was something favourable to us, was altered and changed against us, putting us in great fear. And consequently upon the same followed, the edict of the Emperor so terrible and cruel, that according to the forewarning of the Lord, the elect (if it had been possible) might have been thereby subverted. Upon that edict such fear came over us all, that many there were, especially of the richer sort, of whom some for fear came running, some were led by the occasion of time, some were drawn by their neighbours being cited by name, to those unpure and Idolatrous sacrifices. Others some came trembling and shaking, as men not which should do sacrifice, but which should be sacrificed themselves, the multitude laughing them to scorn. Some again came boldly to the altars, declaring themselves never to have been of that profession, of whom it is said, that hardly they shall be saved. Of the residue, some followed one part, some another, some ran away, some were taken; of whom certain continued to bands and torments constant; others again after long Imprisonments, before they should come before the Judge, renounced their faith. Some also, after they suffered torments, yet after revolted. But others being as strong as blessed, and valiant pillars of the Lords, fortified with constancy agreeing to their faith, were made faithful Martyrs of the Kingdom of God.

Of whom the first was Julianus, a man diseased with the Gout, and not able to go, being carried of two men, of whom the one quickly denied the other, Cronion, surnamed Eunus, with the forefaid Julianus the old man, confessing the Lord with a perfect faith, were laid upon Camels, and there scourged, at length caft into the fire, and with great constancy were so consumed.

Julianus martyr.

A certain Souldier martyr.

As these aforesaid were going to their Martyrdom, there was a certain Souldier, who in their defence, took part against them that railed upon them. For the which cause the People crying out against him, he also was apprehended, and being constant in his Profession, was forthwith beheaded.

Macar a blessed martyr.

Likewise one Macar, a man born in Libia, being admonished and exhorted of the Judge to deny his faith, and not agreeing to his perswasions, was burned alive.

Epimachus, Alexander with four women, martyrs.

After these suffered Epimachus, and one Alexander, who being long detained in prison and in bands, after innumerable pains and torments with Razors and scourges, were also cast into the burning fire with four other women with them, which all there ended their Martyrdom.

Ammonarion an holy virgin martyr.

Also Ammonarion, an holy virgin, whom the cruel Judge, had long and bitterly tormented, for that the promising the Judge before, that for no punishment she would yield to his requeit, and constantly performing the same, suffered likewise Martyrdom with two other women, of whom there was an aged Matron, named Mercuria, the other was called Dionysia, being a Mother of many fair Children, whom yet notwithstanding she loved not above the Lord. These, after they could not be overcome by any torments of the cruel Judge, but he rather athamed and confounded to be overcome of silly women, at length being past feeling of all torments, were slain with the sword; first Ammonarion, like a valiant Captain, suffering before them.

Mercuria, Dionysia, martyrs.

Herom, Ater and Isidorus, Egyptians, and with them Dioscorus also a Child of fifteen years, were Crowned with the same Crown of Martyrdom. And first the Judge began with the Child, thinking him more easie to be won with words to intice him, than with torments to constrain him. But he perfisted immoveable, giving neither place to perswasions nor punishment. The rest, after he had grievously tormented them, being constant in their profession, he committed to the fire. The Judge, greatly marvelling at Dioscorus for his wise answers and grave constancy, dismissed him, sparing (as he said) his age to a longer respite: Which Dioscorus is yet also with us at this present, waiting for a long Tryal.

Herom, Ater, Isidorus, Dioscorus martyrs.

Nemesion, martyr. Thieves in the old time punished amongst the Romans burned.

Nemesion, being also an Egyptian, first was accused for a Companion of Thieves, but being purged thereof before the Centurion, was then accused of Christianity, and for that cause being in bands, was brought to the President; who most Unrighteously tormenting and scourging him double, to all other Thieves and Felons, at length among the Thieves burned him to Death, making him a blessed Martyr.

Ammon, Zenon, Ptolomeus, Ingenuus, Theophilus confessors.

There were standing before the Tribunal seat certain of the Warriors or Knights, whose names were Ammon, Zenon, Ptolomeus, Ingenuus, and with them a certain aged man called Theophilus; who standing by, at what time a certain Christian man was before the Judge examined, and there seeing him for fear ready to decline and fall away, did burst almoft for sorrow within themselves, making signs to him with their hands, and all gestures of their body, to be constant. This being noted of all the standers by, they were ready to lay hold upon them; but they preventing this matter, prested up of their own accord before to the bench of the Judge, professing themselves to be Christians. Insomuch that both the President with the benchers, were all astonied, the Christians, which were judged, more imbolded to suffer, and the Judges thereby terrified. This done, they departed away from the place, glad glad and rejoycing for the testimony that they had given of their Faith. Many other besides, were in other Cities and Towns rent and torn asunder by the Heathen, among whom one I will speak of for cause worthy of memory.

Ischirion, martyr.

Ischirion, one that was in service with a certain Noble man, was commanded of his Master to make Sacrifice, who for not obeying, was therefore rebuked: after perfisting in the same, was grievously threatned with sharp and menacing words. At last his Master, when he could not prevail against him, taking a stake or pike in his hands, ran him thorow in the body and slew him.

What shall I speak of the multitude of them, which wandring in Desarts and Mountains, were consumed with Hunger, Thirst, Cold, Sickness, Thieves or wild Beasts, of whose blessed Victory they which be alive are yet Witnesses? In the number of whom, one I will speak of, among divers others, named Cheremon, Bishop of the City called Nilus, an aged man: he with his wife, flying to the Mountain of Arabia, never returned again, nor ever could be seen after. And though they were sought for diligently by their Brethren, yet neither they nor their bodies were found: many others there were, which flying to those Mountains of Arabia were taken of the barbarous Arabians, of whom some with much money could scarce be ransomed, some were never heard of yet to this present day. Thus much out of the Epistles, of Dionysius in Eusseb. lib. 6. cap. 41, 42, &c.

Cheremon, Martyr. Cheremon, a Bishop had a wife.

Eu. Eusseb. lib. 6. cap. 40, 41, 42. The Epistle of Dionysius Alexandrinus to Germanus. This Germanus was a Bishop in that time, which charged Dionysius for his flying persecution, against whom he purgeth himself. God willed Dionysius to fly in Persecution.

Moreover, the forefaid Dionysius in another place writing to Germanus, of his own dangers and of others, sustained in this Persecution, and before this persecution of Decius, thus inferreth as followeth, I (saith he) behold before the sight of God, I lye not, and He knoweth, I lye not, how that I having no regard of mine own life, and not without the motion of God, did fly and avoid the danger of this Persecution. Yea, and also before that this Persecution of Decius did rage against us, Sabinus the same hour (as a Farmer to seek me, at what time I remaining at home waited three days for his coming. But he searching narrowly for me by all Ways, Fields, Floods, and Corners, where he thought I might best have hid my self, or have passed by, was stricken with such blindness, that he could not find my house, thinking with himself nothing less than that I would abide at home in such and so dangerous Persecution. Thus these three days being past, upon the fourth day, the Lord God so willing and commanding me to fly, and also marvellously opening to me the way, I with my * Children and many other Brethren went out together. And this not to come of my self, but to be the work of Gods Providence, the sequel of those things declared, wherein afterward I was not unprofitable peradventure to some, &c.

* Eye, St. those then had views and children.

Again, in another place shortly after, the forefaid Dionysius proceeding in the Narration of himself, thus inferreth, Then I coming to Jerusalem with them which were with me, was brought by Souldiers unto Tapolixis, where as Timotheus (by the Providence of God) neither was present, nor yet taken. Who then returning home, found his House desert, and Officers watching about the same, and us within taken, &c. And again shortly after it followeth, And to see (saith he) the admirable disposing of God his Works; as Timotheus was thus flying with much hast and great fear, a certain man, as happed, a dweller near by met him by the way, and asked whither he went so hastily? to whom Timotheus answering, declared all the matter simply as it was. Which done, the man proceeded on his journey, whither he was purposed to go, which was to a Marriage, the manner of which Marriages then was to sit up all the night long feasting and drinking. Thus, as he was come, sitting with them at the Feast, he telleth his Companions what was done, and what he heard by the way. This was no sooner told, but all they forthwith upon a head, as stricken with a sudden fury, rushing out together, made toward Us as fast as they could, with such crying and noise as might seem very terrible. As the first hearing whereof, the Souldiers that had us in keeping being afraid, ran away, by reason whereof we were left alone, and found as we were lying upon Formes and Benches. Then (the Lord knoweth) thinking with my self that they had been Thieves, which came to spoil and rob, being in my Couch, lay still in my shirt only as I was, the rest of my Garments lying by me I offered to them: they then willed me in all haste to rise and get away; whereby I then, perceiving the cause of their coming, cried unto them, desiring that they would suffer us so to do: and if they would do any benefit for me, for so much as I could not escape the hands of them which would pursue me and carry me away, I prayed them that they would prevent them, and cut off my head before. And as I was crying thus unto them, casting my self grovelling upon the pavement; as my Companions can testifie, who were partakers of all these things, they burst forth violently, taking me by the hands and feet, and carried me out of the doors, and led me away. There followed me Caius, Faulus, Petrus, Paulus (who were Witnesses of all the same) which brought me also out of the City, and so setting me upon a hare Also, conveyed me away. Thus much writeth Dionysius of himself, the example of whole Epistle is cited in the Eccleseastical story of Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 40. also lib. 7. cap. 11:

Dionysius, Faulus, Petrus, Paulus, Caius, Forms, Pastes discovered from the Centurion and the Souldiers.

Nicephorus in his first Book; cap. 27. maketh mention of one named Christophorus, which also suffered in this Persecution of Decius. Of which Christophorus, whether the Fable riseth of that mighty Giant set up in Churches, wading through the Seas with Christ on his shoulder, and a Tree in his hand for a walking-Staff, &c. it is uncertain. Georgius Wicelius alledgeth out of Ruggerus Fuldens. and mentioneth of one Christophorus, born of the Nation of Canaanites, which suffered under Decius, being, as he saith, of twelve cubits high. But the reft of the History painted in Churches, the said Wicelius derideth as Fables of Centaurs, or other Poetical Fictions.

Ex Niceph. lib. 2. cap. 27. Christophorus. The Fable of great S. Christopher.

Bergomensis in his eighth Book maketh relation of divers martyred under Decius, as Meniatus which suffered at Florence, of Agatha an holy Virgin of Sicily, who is said to suffer divers and bitter torments under Quintilianus the Proconful, with Prisonment, with Beatings, with Famine, with Racking, rolled alfo upon sharp shells and hot coals, having moreover her Breasts cut from her Body, as Bergomensis and the Martyrology of Ado record. In the which Authors as I deny not but that the reft of the story may be true, so again, concerning the Miracles of the aged man appearing to her, and of the young man clothed in a silken Veiture, with an hundred young men after him, and of the Marble Table with the Inscription, Mentem sanctam, &c. I doubt.

Meniatus, Agatha, Martyrs. Ex Bergomens. lib. 8. Ex Martyrol. Ingin Adonis.

Hard it is to recite all that suffered in this Persecution, when as whole multitudes went into Wilderneffes and Mountains, wandring without succour or comfort, some starved with Hunger and Cold, some with Sickness consumed, some devoured of Beasts, some with barbarous Thieves taken and carried away. Vincentius in his eleventh Book, speaking of Asclepiades, writeth also of forty Virgins and Martyrs, which by sundry kinds of torments were put to death about the same time, in the Persecution of this Tyrant.

Martyrs wandring in Mountains.

Likewise in the faid Vincentius menton is made of Tripbon, a man of great holineis, and constant in his suffering, who being brought to the City of Nice, before the President Aquilus for his constant Confession of Christs Name, was afflicted with divers and grievous torments, and at length with the Sword put to death.

Forty Virgins Martyrs. Tripbon Martyr.

At what time Decius had erected a Temple in the midst of the City of Ephesus, compelling all that were in the City there to sacrifice to the Idols: Seven Christians, were found, whose names were Maximianus, Malchus, Martianus, Dionysius, Joannes, Serapion and Constantinus, who, refusing the Idolatrous Worship, were accused for the same unto the Emperor to be Christians. Which they constantly professed and did not deny; notwithstanding, because they were Souldiers, retaining to the Emperors Service, respite was given them for a certain space, to deliberate with themselves, till the return again of the Emperor, which then was going to War. In the mean space, the Emperor being departed, they taking counsel together, went and hid themselves in secret Caves of the Mount Celius. The Emperor returning again, after great inquisition made for them, hearing where they were, caused the mouth of the place where they were to be closed up with heaps of stones, that they, not able to get out, should be famished within. And thus were those good men martyred. The story (if it be true) goeth further, that they, between fear and sorrow, fell asleep, in which sleep they they continued the space of certain Ages after, till the time of Theodosius the Emperor, before they did awake, as reporteth Vincentius, Nicephorus, lib. 5. cap. 27. and partly also Henricus Erfordiens. But of their awaking, that I refer to them that list to believe it. Certain it is, that at the last day they shall awake indeed without any Fable.

A Souldier Martyr. Ex Hieron. in vita Paull Eremite.

Hieronymus in the life of Paulus the Heremite reciteth a story of a certain Souldier, whom when the Pretor could not otherwise with torments remove from his Christianity; he devised another way, which was this; He commanded the Souldier to be laid upon a soft bed in a pleasant Garden among the flourishing Lillies and red Roses; which done, all others being removed away, and himself there left alone, a beautiful Harlot came to him, who imbraced him and with all other Incitements of an Harlot laboured to provoke him to her naughtiness. But the godly Souldier fearing God more than obeying flesh, bit off his own Tongue with his teeth, and spit it in the face of the Harlot, as she was kissing him, and so got he the Victory, by the constant Grace of the Lord assisting him.

A notable example of a chast Souldier biting off his tongue, and spiting it in the face of an Harlot.

A like example of Chastity between two Christians. Ex Ambr. lib. 2. de virgin.

Another like Example of singular Chastity is written of the Virgin Theodora, and another Souldier, by Ambrose. lib. 2. de Virginibus. At Antioch, this Theodora refusing to do sacrifice to the Idols was condemned by the Judge to the Stews, and notwithstanding by the singular Providence of God was well delivered. For as there was a great Company of wanton young men ready at the door to presse into the house where she was, one of the Brethren named Didymus (as Ado saith) moved with faith and motion of God, putting on a Souldiers habit, made himself one of the first that came in, who rounding her in the ear told her the cause and purpose of his coming, being a Christian as the was: his counsel was that she should put on the Souldiers habit, and so flip away; and he putting on her Garments would there remain to abide their force, and so did, whereby the Virgin escaped unknown. Didymus left unto the rage and wondering of the people, being a man in stead of a woman, was presented unto the President, unto whom without delay he uttered all the whole matter as it was done, professing him, so as he was, to be a Christian, and thereupon was condemned to suffer. Theodora understanding thereof, and thinking to excuse him by accusing her self, offered her self as the party guilty unto the Judge, claiming and requiring the condemnation to light upon her, the other as innocent to be discharged. But the cruel Judge (crueller than Dionysius, which spared Damon and Pithias) neither considering the vertue of the persons, nor the innocency of the cause, unjustly and inhumanely proceeded in execution against them both, who, first having their heads cut off, after were cast into the fire: Ambros. Ado. Although what time, or in what Persecution these did suffer, in the Authors of this Narration it doth not appear.

Theodora, Didymus, Martyrs.

Agathon, Martyr.

Agathon, a man of Arms in the City of Alexandria, for rebuking certain lewd persons formally deriding the dead bodies of the Christians, was cried out of and railed on of the people, and afterward accused to the Judge, was condemned to lose his head. Erfordiensis.

Paulus, Andreas, Martyrs.

The said Erfordiensis also maketh mention of Paulus, Andreas, whom the Proconsul of Troada gave to the people; who being scourged, and after drawn out of the City, were troden to death with the feet of the people. Henr. de Erford.

Iustinus, Nicephorus, Perseus, Martyrs.

Among others that suffered under this wicked Decius, Bergomensis also maketh mention of one Iustinus a Priest of Rome, and of another Nicostratus a Deacon. To these Vincentius also addeth Portius a Priest of Rome, whom he reporteth to be the Converter of Philip the Emperor aforementioned.

Abdon, Semmes, Martyrs.

Of Abdon and Semmas we read also in the foresaid Bergomensis and Vincentius, two Noble men, who because they had buried the Christians, whom Decius had brought from Babylon to Corduba, and there put them to death, were therefore accused to Decius, and brought to Rome; where they, being commanded to sacrifice to dead Idols, would not obey; and for the same were given to the wild Beasts to be devoured: but when the wild Beasts, more gentle than the Men, would not touch them, they were at length with the Sword beheaded. Bergom. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 4. Albeit to me it seemeth not impossible nor unlike, this Abdon and Semmas to be the same, whom in other stories we find, and before have mentioned to be Ammon and Zenon.

Secundianus, Martyr.

One Secundianus was accused to Valerian a Captain of Decius, to be a Christian, which Profession when he stoutly did maintain, he was commanded to prison. By the way as the Souldiers were leading him to the Gaol, Verianus and Marcellianus seeing the matter, cried to the Souldiers, asking them whither they drew the Innocent? At the which word, when they also confessed themselves to be Christians, they were likewise apprehended, and brought to a City named Centumcellas: where being willed to sacrifice, they did spit upon the Idols, and so after Sentence and Judgment given, first they were beaten with Wasters or Trunchions, after that were hanged and tormented upon the Gibbet, having fire set to their sides. Vincentius addeth moreover that some of the Tormentors falling suddenly dead, other some being taken with wicked Spirits, the Martyrs with the Sword at length were beheaded. Vin. lib. 11. cap. 51.

Ex Vincent. lib. 11. c. 51.

To prosecute in length of History the Lives and Sufferings of all them, which in this terrible Persecution were martyred, it were too long, and almost infinite: briefly therefore to rehearse the Names of such as we find alledged out of a certain brief Treatise of Bede, intituled, De Temporibus, cited by Henricus de Erford, it shall be at this time sufficient. Under Decius suffered Hippolitus and Concordia, Hierenens and Abundus, Victoria a Virgin, being noble Personages of Antioch, Bellias Bishop of the City of Apollonia, Leucius, Tirsus, and Gallinetus. Nazanzo, Trithon in the City of Egypt, called Tamas, Phileas Bishop, Philoconmus, with many other in Perside, Phileromius Bishop of Babylon; Theophon Bishop of Pamphilia, Nestor Bishop in Corduba, Parmenius Priest, with divers more. In the Province called Colonia, Circensis, Marianus and Jacobus. In Africa, Nemesianus, Felix, Rogatianus Priest, Felicissimus. At Rome, Jovinus, Basileus, also Ruffina, and Secunda Virgins, Tertullianus, Valerianus, Nemesius, Sempronianus and Olympius. In Spain, Teragon. At Verona, Zeno Bishop. At Cesarea, Marinus and Archemius. In the Town of Milaine, Privatus Bishop, Theodorus, surnamed Gregorius Bishop of Pontus. Hæc Beda.

Children martyred. Ex Vincent. lib. 11. c. 52.

Vincentius in his eleventh Book maketh mention, citing Ex Hugone, of certain Children suffering Martyrdom under the same Persecution, in a City of Tuscia, called Aretium, whose names I find not, except they be Pergentius and Lawrentius mentioned in Equilinus, lib. 5. cap. 80.

Such as revolted and fell in this Persecution.

Now that I have recorded of them sufficiently, which under this tempest of Decius constantly gave their lives to Martyrdom for the Testimony of Christ: it remaineth that a few words also be spoken of such as for fear or frailty in this Persecution did shrink and slide from the truth of their Confession. In the number of whom first cometh in the remembrance of Serapion an aged old man. Of whom writeth Dionysius Alexandrinus unto Fabius, declaring that this Serapion was an old man, which lived amongst them a sincere and upright life of long time, but at length fell. This Serapion oft and many times desired to be received again, but no man listened to him, for he had sacrificed before. After this, not long after, he fell into Sickness, where he remained three days dumb, and benummed of all Senses. The fourth day following, beginning a little to recover, he called to him his Sisters Son, and said, How long, how long (my Son) do ye hold me here? Make haste, I pray you, that I were absolved. Call hither some of the Ministers to me: and so, saying no more, held his peace as dumb and speechless. The boy ran (it was then night) unto the Minister, who, at the same time being sick, could not come with the Messenger, but said, For so much as he willed heretofore (as he said) that such as lay a dying, if they covet to be received and reconciled, and especially if they required it earnestly, should be admitted, whereby with the better hope and confidence they may depart hence: therefore he gave to the boy a little of the Eucharist*, willing him to crumble it into the Cup, and so to drop it into the mouth of the old man. With this the boy returned, bringing with him the holy Eucharist. As he was now near at hand, before he had entred in, Serapion the old man, speaking again,

* Note here the Sacrament to be called the Eucharist, and not the body of Christ.

again, Comest thou (said he) my Son? The Priest, quoth the Messenger, is sick and cannot come, but do as he willeth you, and let me go. And the boy immixed the Eucharist, and dropt it in softly into the mouth of the old man, who after he had tasted a little, immediately gave up the ghost, &c. Hæc Dionys. ex Euseb.

In the City of Troad, as the Proconsul was grievously tormenting one Nicomachus, he cried out, That he was no Christian, and so was let down again. And after, when he had sacrificed, he was taken with fits and with a wicked Spirit, and so thrown down upon the ground, where he, biting off his Tongue with his teeth, so departed. Henr. de Erford.

A terrible example of denying, thereof upon Nicomachus. Dionysius ad Fabium.

Dionysius in his Epistles also writing to Fabius, and lamenting the great terror of this Persecution, declareth, how that many worthy and notable Christians, for fear and horror of the great Tyranny thereof, did shew themselves feeble and weak men. Of whom some for dread, some of their own accord, others after great Torments suffered, yet after revolted from the constancy of their Profession. Also Saint Cyprian in his Treatise De Lapsis reciteth with great sorrow, and teftifieth how that a great number at the first threatning of the Adversary, neither being compelled nor thrown down with any violence of the Enemy, but of their voluntary weakness fell down themselves. Neither (saith he) tarrying while the Judge should put Incense in their hands, but before any stroke stricken in the field, turned their backs, and played the Cowards; not only coming to their Sacrifices, but preventing the same, and pretending to come without compullion, bringing moreover their Infants and Children either put into their hands, or taking them with them of their own accord, and exhorting moreover others to do the like after their example.

Cyprianus Serm. de lapsis.

The weakness of Christians denying their Faith.

Ex lib. Beda de Temporibus, citatus Henrico de Erfordia.

Of this weakness and falling, the said Author sheweth two Causes, either love of their Goods and Patrimony, or fear of Torments: and addeth moreover examples of the Punishments of them which revolted; affirming, that many of them were taken and vexed with wicked Spirits; and that one man among other, after his voluntary denial, was suddenly stricken dumb. Again, another after his Abjuration, as he should communicate with others, in stead of bread received ashes in his hand. Item, a certain Maiden being taken and vexed with a Spirit, did tear her own Tongue with her teeth, and tormented with pain in her belly and inward parts so deceased.

Examples of God his punishment after denial.

S. Cyprian. de lapsis.

Amongst others of this sort, S. Cyprian. lib. 2. cap. 8. maketh also mention of one Eutarsius a Bishop in Africa, who leaving his Charge, and making shipwrack of his Faith, went wandring about in other Countries, forsaking his own Flock. In like manner, he maketh also mention of Nicostratus a Deacon, who forsaking his Deaconship, and taking the Goods of the Church with him, fled away into other Countries, &c. Albeit Bergomensis affirmeth, that this Nicostratus the Deacon afterward died a Martyr, how (saith he) there was, whom neither fear could remove, nor pain could overthrow, to cause them to betray their Confession, but they stood like glorious Martyrs unto the end. Cyprian.

Cyprian. lib. De mortalitate.

The same Cyprianus also, in another Book De Mortalitate, reciteth a notable story of one of his own Collegues and fellow Priests, who being oppressed with weakness, and greatly afraid with death drawing at hand, desired leave to depart, and to be discharged. As he was thus intreating, and almost now dying, there appeared by him a young man, of an honourable and reverent Majesty, of a tall stature, and comely behaviour, so bright and clear to behold, that scarce mans carnal eyes were able so to do, which was now ready to depart this world. To whom this young man speaking with a certain indignation of mind and voice, thus said, Pati timetis, exire non vultis, quid faciam vobis? To suffer ye dare not, to go out ye will not, what would ye have me to do unto you?

A notable voice of God to a Priest of Conage.

The occasion and rising up of Novatus Heresie.

Upon the occasion of these and such others, which were a great number, that fell and did renounce, as is afore-said, in this Persecution of Decius, rose up first the quarrel and heresie of Novatus, who in these days made a great disturbance in the Church, holding this opinion, that they which once renounced the Faith, and for fear of torments had offered Incense to the Idols, although they repented therefore, yet could not afterward be reconciled, nor admitted to the Church of Christ. This Novatus being first Priest under Cyprian at Carthage, afterward by stirring up Discord and Factions began to disturb the Bishoprick of Cyprian, to appoint there a Deacon called Felicissimus, against the Bishops mind or knowledge; also to allure and separate certain of the Brethren from the Bishop; all which Cyprian. lib. 2. Epist. 8. doth well declare. After this the said Novatus going to Rome, kept there the like stir with Cornelius (as the fame is) whereupon Cornelius in Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. doth teftifie) setting himself up as Bishop of Rome against Cornelius, which was the lawful Bishop of Rome before. The which to bring to pass, he used this practice. First he had allured to him, to be his Adherents, three or four good men and holy Confessors, which had suffered before great torments for their Confession, whose names were Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus. After this he inticed three simple Bishops about the Coasts of Italy to repair to Rome, under pretence to make an end of certain Controversies then in hand. This done, he called the same, whether by making them drunk, or by other crafty counsel, to lay their hands upon him, and to make him Bishop, and so they did. Wherefore the one of those three Bishops hardly was received to the Communion, by the great intercession of his people: the other two by Discipline of the Church were displaced from their Bishopricks, and others possessed with their rooms. Thus then were there two Bishops together in one Church of Rome, Novatus and Cornelius, which was unseemly, and contrary to the Discipline of the Church. And hereupon riseth the true cause and meaning of St. Cyprian, writing in his Epistles so much of one Bishop, and of the unity to be kept in Ecclesiastical Regiment, as appeareth, 4 Lib. 4. Epist. 2. de simplicit. prælat. Item, lib. 3. Epist. 11. &c. And in like fort writeth also Cornelius himself of one Bishop, saying, Itaque vindex ille Evangelii ignoravit unum esse debere Episcopum in Catholica Ecclesia, &c. that is, He knew not that there ought to be one Bishop in a Catholick Church, &c. This by the way, not out of the way I trust, I have touched briefly, to detect or refute the cavilling wrestling of the Papists, which falsly apply these places of Cyprian and Cornelius to maintain the Popes supremacy of Bishop alone, over the whole Universal Church of Christ in all places; when their meaning is otherwise, how that every one Catholick Church or Diocese ought to have one Bishop over it, not that the whole World ought to be subject to the Dominion of him only that is Bishop of Rome. Now to the story again. Novatus being thus Bishop, took not a little upon him, going about by all means to defeat Cornelius, and to allure the people from him. Informuch that (as in the foresaid Book of Eusebius appeareth) when Novatus came to the distributing of the Offerings, and should give every man his part, he compelled the simple persons every man to swear, before they should receive of the Benedictions, and of the Collects or Oblations, holding both their hands in his, and holding them so long, speaking these words unto them (Swear to me by the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, that thou wilt not leave me and go to Cornelius) till that they swearing unto him, in stead of Amen (to be said at the receiving of the * Bread) should answer, I will not return to Cornelius, &c. Where note by the way, that the Latine Book of Christoferson translation, in this place, craftily leaveth out the name of Bread. This story being written in Eusebius, also contained in Nicephorus, although not in the same order of words, yet in effect drawn out of him, doth declare in plain words in both the Authors (who so will mark the fame) that the Sacrament of the Body of Christ is termed with the plain name of Bread, after the Consecration.

* Note here the Sacrament of the Body to be called bread Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 43. Nicephor. lib. 6. cap. 3. The Latine translation corrupted by Christoferson, lib. 6. cap. 43. Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, Celerinus Confessors.

If followeth more in the story, that Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus, before mentioned, perceiving at length the crafty Diffimulation and Arrogancy of Novatus, left him, and with great Repentance returned again to the Church, and were reconciled to Cornelius, as they themselves writing to Cyprian, and Cyprian likewise writing to them an Epistle gratulatory doth declare, lib. 3. Epist. 3. and Cornelius also in his Epistle to Fabius witnesseth the same. In this Epistle the said Cornelius moreover writeth of one Moses a worthy Martyr, which once being also a Follower of Novatus, after per-

A Synod at Rome. { Anno 255.

After Fabianus (or as Zonaras calleth him Flavianus) next ſucceeded into the Biſhoprick of Rome Cornelius, whom Cyprian noteth to be a worthy Biſhop, and for his great vertue and maidenly continency much commendable, choſen to that room not ſo much by his own conſent, as by the full agreement, both of the Clergy-men, and alſo of the people. Hieromе addeth alſo, That he was a man of great Eloquence: whereby it may appear thoſe two Epiſtles decretal, which go in his name, not to be his, both for the rudeneſs of the barbarous and groſs ſtile, and alſo for the matter therein contained, nothing taſting of that time, nor of that age, nor doings then of the Church. Whereof in the firſt he writeth to all Miniſters and Brethren of the Church, concerning the lifting up of the bodies and bones of Peter and Paul, De Cathecumbis, and tranſpoſed to Vaticanum, at the inſtance of a certain devout Woman named Lucina, having no great argument or cauſe to write thereof unto the Churches, but only that he in that Letter doth deſire them to pray unto the Lord, that through the Interceſſion of thoſe Apoſtolical Saints, their ſins might be forgiven them, &c. In the ſecond Epiſtle written to Ruffus a Biſhop of the Eaſt Church, he decreeth and ordaineth, that no Oath ought to be required or exacted of any head or chief Biſhop, for any cauſe, or by any power. Alſo that no cauſe of Prieſts or Miniſters ought to be handled in any ſtrange or foreign Court, without his Precinct, except only in the Court of Rome by Appellation: whereby who ſeeth not the train of our later Biſhops, going about craftily to advance the Dignity of the Court of Rome, under and by the pretended Title of Cornelius, and of ancient Biſhops? If Cornelius did write any Epiſtles to any indeed in thoſe turbulent times of Perſecution, no doubt but ſome ſignification thereof he would have touched in the ſaid his Letters, either in miniſtring Conſolation to his Brethren, or in requiring Conſolation and Prayers of others. Neither is there any doubt, but he would have given ſome touch alſo of the matter of Novatus, with whom he had ſo much to do; as indeed he did: for ſo we find it recorded both in Euſebius, and Hieromе, that he wrote unto Fabius Biſhop of Antioch, of the decreements of the Council of Rome, and another Letter of the manner of the Council, the third alſo of the cauſe of Novatus, and again of the Repentance of ſuch as fell, whereof there is no word touched at all in theſe foreſaid Epiſtles decretal.

Cornelius Biſhop of Rome, and Martyr. Biſhops were choſen then not without the voice of the people. A cenſure of the decretal Epiſtles of Cornelius.

What trouble this Cornelius had with Novatus, ſufficiently is before ſignified. In this Perſecution of Decius, he demeaned himſelf very conſtantly and faithfully, which ſuſtained great Conflicts with the Adverſaries, as Saint Cyprian giveth witneſs, lib. 1. Epiſt. 1. Hieromе teſtifieth that he remained Biſhop after the death of Decius, to the time of Gallus, and ſo appeareth alſo by Saint Cyprian, which hath theſe words, Et tyrannum armis & bello poſtmodum victum, prior ſacerdotio ſuo vicit. But Damaſus and Sabellicus, his Followers, affirm, that he was both exiled and alſo martyred under the tyrannous Reign of Decius. Of whom Sabellicus writeth this ſtory, taken out (as it ſeemeth) of Damaſus, and ſaith, That Cornelius by the Commandment of Decius, was baniſhed to a Town called Centumcellæ, bordering on Hetruria, from whence he ſent his Letters to Cyprian Biſhop of Carthage, and Cyprian again to him. This coming to the ears of Decius the Emperor, he ſendeth for Cornelius, asking him, How he durſt be ſo bold to ſhew ſuch ſtubbornneſs, that he neither caring for the gods, nor fearing the diſpleaſure of his Princes, durſt againſt the Common wealth give and receive Letters from others? To whom Cornelius anſwering again, thus purged himſelf, declaring to the Emperor, That Letters indeed he had written, and received again concerning the Praiſes and honouring of Chriſt, and the Salvation of Souls, but nothing as touching any matter of the Common-wealth. And it followeth in the ſtory; That Decius moved with anger, commanded him to be beaten with Plumbats (which, as ſaith Sabellicus, is a kind of ſcourging) and ſo to be brought to the Temple of Mars: either there to do Sacrifice, or to ſuffer the extremity. But he rather willing to die, than to commit ſuch Iniquity, prepared himſelf to Martyrdom, being ſure that he ſhould die. And ſo commending the Charge of the Church unto Stephanus his Archdeacon, was brought to the way of Appius, where he ended his life in faithful Martyrdom. Euſebius in one place ſaith that he ſat two years, in another place he ſaith that he ſat three years, and ſo doth Marianus Scotus, following alſo the diverſity of the ſaid Euſebius. Damaſus giveth him only two years.

In this foreſaid Perſecution of Decius, it ſeemeth by ſome Writers alſo that Cyprian was baniſhed; but I ſuppoſe rather his Baniſhment to be referred to the Reign of Gallus next Emperor after Decius, whereof more ſhall be ſaid (Chriſt willing) in his place hereafter. In the mean time the ſaid Cyprian in his ſecond Book, Epiſt. 5. & 6. maketh mention of two that ſuffered either in the time of this Decius, or much about the ſame time. Of whom one was Aurelius a worthy and valiant young man, who was twice in torments for his Confeſſion, which he never denied, but manfully and boldly withſtood the Adverſary till he was baniſhed, and alſo after: and therefore was commended of Cyprian to certain Brethren to have him for their Lecturer, as in the forenamed Epiſtle of Cyprian appeareth. The other was named Mappalicus, who in the day before he ſuffered, declaring to the Proconſul in the midſt of his torments, and ſaying, Videbas eras agonem: that is, To morrow you ſhall ſee the running for a wager, &c. Was brought forth, according as he foreſpoke, to Martyrdom, and there with no leſs conſtancy than patience did ſuffer.

And thus much of the tyranny of this wicked Decius againſt God his Saints. Now to touch alſo the Power of God, his Vengeance and Puniſhment againſt him. Like as we ſee commonly a tempeſt that is vehement, not long to continue: ſo it happened with this tyrannical Tormentor, who reigning but two years, as ſaith Euſebius, or three at moſt, as writeth Oroſius, among the middle of the Barbarians, with whom he did war, was there ſlain with his Son. Like as he had ſlain Philippus and his Son his Predeceſſors before, ſo was he with his Son ſlain by the righteous Judgment of God himſelf. Euſebius, lib. 7. cap. 1. Platin. Pomponius affirmeth, that he warring againſt the Gothbians, and being by them overcome, left he ſhould fall into their hands, ran into a Whirle-pit, where he was drowned, and his body never found after.

The death and deſtruction of Decius.

Oroſius, lib. 4. cap. 14.

The juſt revenge of God againſt Perſecutors.

Neither did the juſt hand of God plague the Emperor only, but alſo revenged as well the Heathen Gentiles and Perſecutors of his Word throughout all Provinces and Dominions of the Roman Monarchy; amongſt whom the Lord, immediately after the death of Decius, ſent ſuch a Plague and Peſtilence, laſting for the ſpace of ten years together, that horrible it is to hear, and almoſt incredible to believe. Of this Plague or Peſtilence teſtifieth Dionyſius to Hierax a Biſhop in Egypt, Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 21, 22. where he declareth the mortality of this Plague to be ſo great in Alexandria where he was Biſhop, that there was no houſe in the whole City free. And although the greateſt of the Plague touched alſo the Chriſtians ſome what, yet it fcourged the Heathen Idolaters much more: beſide that the order of their behaviour in the one and in the other was much divers. For as the foreſaid Dionyſius doth record, the Chriſtians through brotherly love and piety, did not refuſe one to viſit and comfort another: and to miniſter to him what need required, notwithſtanding it was to them great danger: for divers there were who in cloſing up their eyes, in waſhing their bodies, and interring them in the ground were next themſelves which followed them to their graves. Yet all this ſtayed not them from doing their duty, and ſhewing mercy one to another: whereas the Gentiles contrarily, being extreamly vilited by the hand of God, felt the Plague, but conſidered not the ſtriker, neither yet conſidered they their Neighbour, but every man ſhifting for himſelf, neither cared one for for another, but ſuch as were infected, ſome they would caſt out of the doors half dead to be devoured of Dogs and wild Beaſts, ſome they let die within their houſes without all ſuccour, ſome they ſuffered to lie unburied, for that no man durſt come near them: and yet notwithſtanding for all their voiding and ſhifting, the Peſtilence followed them whitherſoever they went, and miſerably conſumed them. Inſomuch that Dionyſius Biſhop the ſame time of Alexandria, thus reporteth of his own City, that ſuch a mortality was then among them, that the ſaid City of Alexandria had not in number ſo many of all together both old and young, as it was wont to contain before of the old men only from the age of threeſcore to ſeventy, and as were found in time paſt commonly almoſt in that City. Pomponius Letus and other Latine Writers alſo making mention of the ſaid Peſtilence, declare how the beginning thereof firſt came (as they think) out of Ethiope, and from the hot Countries, and ſo invading, and waſting firſt the South parts, from thence ſpread into the Eaſt, and ſo further running and increaſing into all other quarters of the world, eſpecially wherefoever the Edicts of the Emperor went againſt the Chriſtians, it followed after and continued the moſt part of the Inhabitants; whereby many places became deſolate and void of all Concourſe, and ſo continued the term of ten years together.

St. Cyprian exhorteth and encourageth the Chriſtian Martyrs. Cyp. lib. 5. Epiſt. ult.

This peſtiferous Mortality (by the occaſion whereof Cyprian took the ground to write his Book De mortalitate) began as is ſaid, immediately after the death of Decius the Perſecutor, in the beginning of the Reign of Vibius Gallus, and Voluſianus his Son, who ſucceeded through treaſon next unto Decius, about the year of our Lord two hundred fifty and five, and continued their Reign but two years.

Cyprianus lib. de mortalitate. Gallus and Voluſianus Emperors. { Anno 255.

Mappalicus Martyr.

This Gallus, although the firſt beginning of his Reign was ſomething quiet, yet ſhortly after following the ſteps of Decius, by whom rather he ſhould have taken better heed, ſet forth Edicts in like manner for the perſecution of Chriſtians, albeit in this Edict we find no number of Martyrs to have ſuffered, but only all this Perſecution to reſt only in the exilement of Biſhops or Guids of the Flock. Of other Sufferings or Executions we do not read, for the terrible Peſtilence following immediately kept the barbarous Heathen otherwiſe occupied. Unto this time of Gallus, rather than to the time of Decius, I refer the baniſhment of Cyprian, who was then Biſhop of Carthage, of the which baniſhment he himſelf teſtifieth in divers of his Epiſtles, declaring the cauſe thereof to riſe upon a Commotion or Sedition among the people, out of the which he withdrew himſelf: leſt the Sedition ſhould grow greater: notwithſtanding the ſaid Cyprian, though being abſent, yet had no leſs care of his Flock, and of the whole Church, than if he had been preſent with them, and therefore never ceaſed in his Epiſtles continually to exhort and call upon them to be conſtant in their Profeſſion, and patient in their Afflictions. Amongſt divers others whom he doth comfort in his baniſhment, although he was in that caſe to be comforted himſelf, writing to certain that were condemned to mining for metals, whoſe Names were Nemeſianus, Felix, Lucius, with other Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons, he declareth unto them: How it is no ſhame but a glory not to be feared, but to be rejoyced at, to ſuffer baniſhment or other pains for Chriſt; and confirming them in the ſame, or rather commending them, ſignifieth how worthily they do ſhew themſelves to be as valiant Captains of vertue, provoking both by the confeſſions of their mouth, and by the ſuffering of their bodies, the hearts of the Brethren to Chriſtian Martyrdom, whoſe example was and is a great confirmation to many, both Maids and Children to follow the like: as for Puniſhment and Suffering, it is (ſaith he) a thing not execrable to a Chriſtian: for a Chriſtian mans breaſt, whoſe hope doth wholly conſiſt in the Tree, dreadeth neither bat nor club: wounds and ſkars of the body be Ornaments to a Chriſtian man, ſuch as bring no ſhame nor diſhoneſty to the party, but rather preferreth and fetcth him with the Lord. And although in the Mines where the metals be digged there be no beds for Chriſtian mens bodies to take their reſt, yet they have their reſt in Chriſt: and though their weary bones lie upon the cold ground, yet it is no pain to lie with Chriſt. Their feet have been fettered with bands and chains, but happily he is bound of man, whom the Lord Chriſt doth looſe: happily doth he lie tied in the ſtocks, whoſe feet thereby are made ſu ifter to run to Heaven. Neither can any man tie a Chriſtian ſo faſt, but he runneth ſo much the faſter for his garland of life. They have no garments to ſave them from cold, but he that putteth on Chriſt is ſufficiently cated. Doth bread lack to their hungry bodies? But man liveth not only by bread, but by every word proceeding from the mouth of God. Your deformity (ſaith he) ſhall be turned to honour, your mourning to joy, your pain to pleaſure, and felicity infinite. And if this do grieve you that you cannot now imploy your Sacrifices and Oblations after your wonted manner, yet your daily Sacrifice ceaſeth not, which is a contrite and humble heart, as when you offer up daily your bodies a lively and a glorious Sacrifice unto the Lord, which is the Sacrifice that pleaſeth God. And though your travel be great, yet is the reward greater, which is moſt certain to follow: for God beholding and looking down upon them that confeſs his Name, in their willing mind approveth them, in their ſtriving helpeth them, in their Victory crowneth them, rewarding that in us which he hath performed, and crowning that which he hath in us perfected. With theſe, and ſuch like comfortable words he doth animate his Brethren, admoniſhing them that they are now in a joyful journey, haſting apace to the manſions of the Martyrs; there to enjoy after the darkneſs a ſtable light and brightneſs greater than all their Paſſions, according to the Apoſtles ſaying, Theſe ſufferings of this preſent time be nothing like comparable to the brightneſs of the Glory that ſhall be revealed in us, &c.

The Chriſtian mans fight.

And after the like words of ſweet comfort and conſolation writing to Seagrius and Rogatianus, which were in priſon and bonds for the teſtimony of truth, Doth encourage them to continue ſtedfaſt and patient in the way wherein they have begun to run: for that they have with the Lord with them their Helper and Defender, who promiſeth to be with us to the Worlds end; and therefore willeth them to ſee before their eyes in their death Immortality, in their pain everlaſting Glory, of the which it is written, Precious in the ſight of the Lord is the death of his Saints. Item, although before men they ſuffered torments, yet their hope is full of Immortality, and being vexed in ſmall things, they ſhall be well requited in great matters: For the Lord hath tried them as gold in the fire. And writeth moreover, admoniſhing that it is appointed from the beginning of the World, that Righteouſneſs here ſhould ſuffer in ſecular Conflicts; for ſo juſt Abel was ſlain in the beginning of the World, and after him all juſt and good men, the Prophets alſo and the Apoſtles ſent of the Lord himſelf: unto whom all the Lord hath given an example in himſelf, teaching that there is no coming to his Kingdom, but by that way which he entred himſelf, ſaying by theſe words, He that loveth his life in this World ſhall loſe it, &c. And again, Fear ye not them that ſlay the body, but have no power to ſlay the ſoul. And Saint Paul likewiſe admoniſhing all them whoſoever covet to be Partakers of the Promiſes of the Lord, to follow the Lord, ſaith, If we Suffer together with him, we ſhall Reign together, &c.

Cyp. lib. 4. Epiſt. 6.

Furthermore, as the ſame Cyprian doth encourage here the holy Martyrs which were in Captivity to perſiſt: ſo likewiſe writing to the Prieſts and Deacons which were free, he exhortith them to be ſerviceable and obſequious with all care and love, to cheriſh and embrace them that were in bonds, Cyprian, lib. 3. Epiſt. 6. Whereby may appear the fervent zeal and care of this good Biſhop toward the Church of Chriſt, although being now in exile in the time of this Emperor Gallus.

In the ſame time, under the ſaid Gallus reigning with his Son Voluſianus, was alſo Lucius Biſhop of Rome ſent to baniſhment, who next ſucceeded after Cornelius in that Biſhoprick, about the year of our Lord two hundred fifty and ſix. Albeit in this baniſhment he did not long continue, but returned home to his Church, as by the Epiſtle of Saint Cyprian, lib. 3. Epiſt. 1. may appear. As to all other Biſhops of Rome in thoſe Primitive days certain decretal Epiſtles with ſeveral Ordinances be aſcribed, bearing their Names and Titles, as hath been before declared: So alſo hath Lucius one Epiſtle fathered upon him, in the which Epiſtle he writing to the Brethren of France and of Spain, appointeth ſuch an order and form of the Church as ſeemeth not to agree with the time then preſent: for ſo he declareth in that Epiſtle, Lucius.

The Ordinances of the Church.

that a Bishop in all places, whithersoever he goeth, should have two Priests with three Deacons waiting upon him to be witnesses, of all his ways and doings. Which ordinance although I deny not but it may be and is convenient, yet I see not how that time of Lucius could serve then for a Bishop to carry such a pomp of Priests and Deacons about him, or to study for any such matter: For so much as Bishops commonly in those days were seldom free to go abroad, went they never so secret, but either were in houses close and secret, or in Prison, or else in banishment. Moreover in the said Epistle how pompously writeth he to the Church of Rome? This holy and apostolical Church of Rome (saith he) the mother of all Churches of Christ, by the Grace of God omnipotent hath never been provoked to swarve out of the path of Apostolical tradition, neither hath ever fallen or been depraved with heretical innovations: But even as in the first beginning it received the rule of the Apostolical faith by his first instructors, the Princes of the Apostles, so it continueth ever immaculate and undefiled unto the end.

The pompous Stile of the Church of Rome.

Unto this Lucius also is referred in the decrees of Gratian this constitution, that no Minister whatsoever after his ordination, would at any time reenter into the chamber of his own wife, in pain of losing his Ministery in the Church, &c. Eusebius in his seventh Book making mention of the death of Lucius, and not of his Martyrdom, saith that he sat but eight months: But Damasus in his Martyrologe holdeth that he sat three years, and was beheaded the second year of Valerian and Galienus Emperors, and so doth also Marianus Scotus and Nauclerus, with other that follow Damasus, affirm the same.

Dist. 81. ministri. Ministers restrained from their own Wives. Eusebius and Damasus vary in time. Lucius Bishop of Rome martyr.

After him came Stephanus next Bishop of Rome following Lucius, whom Damasus, Platina, and Sabellicus affirm to have sit seven years and five months, and to die a martyr. Contrary Eusebius, and Volateranus holding with him, give him but two years: which part cometh most near to the truth, I leave to the Readers Judgment. Of his two Epistles decretal, and of his Ordinances out of the same collected, I need not much to say, for two respects; either for that concerning these decretal Epistles and ordinances of Stephanus. satisficiously intituled to the names of the Fathers of the primitive Church sufficiently hath been said before; or else because both the phrase barbarous and incongrue, and also the matter it self therein contained is such, that although no testimony came against it, yet it easily refelleth it self. As where in the second Epistle he decreeth. That no Bishop being expulsed out of his seat, or deprived of his goods, ought to be accused of any, or is bound to answer for himself: before that by the Law regularly he be restored again fully to his former state, and that the Primates and the Synod, render unto him again all such possessions and fruits as were taken from him before his accusation, as is agreeing both to the Laws canon and also secular. First here I would define the Reader a little to stay, and this to consider with himself, who be these here meant which either sued or might despoile these Bishops of their goods, and expulse them from their seats for such wrongful causes, but only Kings and Emperors, which at this time were not yet Christned, nor used any such proceedings against these Bishops, in such sort as either Primates of Synods could restore them again to their places and possessions: Again, what private goods or possessions had Bishops then to be taken from them, when as Churches yet neither were indued with patrimonies nor possessions? And if any treasures were committed to the Church, it pertained not properly to the Bishop, but went in general to the subvention of the poor in the Church, as in the Epistle of Cornelius to Fabius may appear, alledged in Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. where he speaking of his Church, and declaring how there ought to be but one Bishop in the same, inferreth mention of forty and six Priests, seven Deacons, with seven Subdeacons, forty two Acolathes, of Widdows and poor afflicted persons, to the number of fifteen hundred and above, found and nourished in the same by the mercifull benignity and providence of God: Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. It followeth more in the end of the said Canon, Which thing is forbidden both by the Lawes Ecclesiastical, and also secular, &c. Now what Lawes secular were in the time of Steven, for Bishops not to be charged with any accusation before they were restored again to their state, let any Reader marking well the state of the heathen Laws that then were, Judge: and in judging I doubt not but this matter alone, though there were no other, will be enough to discribe the untruth hereof.

No Bishop ought to be accused, after he be expulsed, before he be restored again.

Moreover, by divers other probable notes and arguments in the said second Epistle of Stephanus it may be easily espied, this Epistle to be fained and misauthorised, especially by the fift canon of the said Epistle, where he so solemnly entreateth of the difference between Primats, Metropolitans, and Arch-Bishops: Which destinction of degrees and titles, favouring more of ambition than of persecution, giveth me verily to suppose this Epistle not to be written by this Stephan, but by some other man either of that name, or of some other time when the Church began to be setled in more prosperity, and orders therein to be taken for every man to know his degree and limits of his authority, according as is prescribed by the sixth and seventh canon of the Nicene council, decreeing of the same matter.

Primats. Metropolitans. Arch-Bishops.

The like estimation may be conceived also of the seventh canon of the said Epistle, where he willeth and appointeth all causes judiciary to be decided and determined within the precinct of their own proper Province, and not to pass over the bounds thereof, unless (saith he) the Appeal be made to the apostolical See of Rome; which favoureth in my nose rather of a smack of Popery, than of the vain of Christianity, especially in these times, during this terrible persecution among the Bishops of Christ. And thus much of the second decretal Epistle of Stephanus, although of the first Epistle also written to Hilarius, something may be said; as where he speaketh in the said Epistle of holy Vestiments, and holy Vessels, and other ornaments of the Altar serving to divine worship, and therefore not to be touched nor handled of any man, saving of Priests alone. Concerning all which implements my opinion is this; I think the Church of Rome, not to have been in so good state then, that either Stephanus or Sixtus before him, being occupied about other more earnest matters, and scarce able to hide their own heads, had any mind or cogitation to study upon such unnecessary inventions serving in publick Churches: Neither do I see how the Heathen in those days would have suffered those ornaments to be unconsumed, which would not suffer the Bishops themselves to live amongst them, notwithstanding Idoras and Polydoras judge the contrary. Between this Stephan and Cyprian Bishop of Carthage was a great contention about rebaptising Hereticks, whereof more hereafter (Christ willing) shall be said.

Lawful to appeal to Rome.

Vestiments and holy vessels serving for the Altar.

Besides these Bishops above specified, divers other there were also sent into banishment under the forenamed Emperors, Gallus and Voluſianus, as appeareth by Dionysius writing to Hermanius on this wise: That Gallus not seeing the evil of Decius, nor forbearing the occasion of his seduction and ruin, stumbled himself also at the same stone, lying open before his eyes: For when at the first beginning his Empire went prosperously forward, and all the things were luckily with him, afterward he drave out holy men, which prayed for his peace and safeguard, and so with them rejected also the prayers which they made for him, &c. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 1. Otherwise of any bloodshed, or any Martyrs that in the time of this Emperor were put to death, we do not read.

Bishops letted in the time of Gallus.

After the Reign of which Emperor Gallus, and of his son Voluſianus being expired (who Reigned but two years) Emilianus, which slew them both by civil sedition, succeeded in their place, who Reigned but three months, and was also slain. Next to whom Valerianus and his son Galienus were advanced to the Empire.

Gallus and Voluſianus Reigned two years. Emilianus Emperor three months. Valerianus and Galienus Emperors.

About the changing of these Emperors the persecution which first began at Decius, and afterward slacked in the time of Gallus, was now extinguished for a time, partly for the great Plague reigning in all places, partly by the change of the Emperors, although it was not very long. For Valerianus in the first entrance of the Empire, for the space of three or four years, was right courteous and gentle to the people of God, and well accepted of the Senate.

Persecution ceased for a time.

The good beginning of Valerian.

Neither was there any of all the Emperors before him, no not of them which openly professed Christ, that shewed himself so loving and familiar toward the Christians as he did: In so much that (as Dionysius writing to Hermanis doth testifie) all his whole court was replenished with holy Saints and servants of Christ said Godly persons, to that his house might seem to be made a Church of God. But by the malice of Satan, through wicked counsel, these quiet days endured not very long. For in proces of time this Valerian being charmed or incensed by a certain Egyptian, a chief Ruler of the Heathen Synagogue of the Egyptians, a master of the Charmers or Inchanters, who indeed was troubled for that he could not do his Magical feats for the Christians, was so far infatuated and bewitched, that through the detestable provocations of that devilish Egyptian, he was wholly turned unto abominable idols, and to execrable impiety, in sacrificing young infants, and quartering bodies, and dividing the intrails of children new born; and so, proceeding in his fury, he moved the eighth Persecution against the Christians, whom the wicked Egyptian could not abide, as being the hinderers and destroyers of his Magical Inchantings, about the year of our Lord 259.

Wicked counsel what evil it doth.

The eighth Persecution.

The eighth persecution. Anno 259.

IN the which Persecution the chief administers and executers were Emilianus Prefident of Egypt, Paternus and Galerius Maximus, Proconsuls in Africa. Bergomensis also maketh mention of Paternus Vicegerent of Rome, and of Perennius. Vincentius speaketh also of Nicerius and Claudius Presidents, &c.

The chief executors of this Persecution.

The special causes of this persecution. Cyp. lib. 4. Epist. 6.

What was the chief original cause of this Persecution partly is signified before, where mention was made of the wicked Egyptian: but as this was the outward and political cause, so S. Cyprian sheweth other causes more special and Ecclesiastical in his fourth book, Epist. 4. whose words be these: But we (saith he) must understand and confesse, that this turbulent oppression and calamity, which hath wasted for the most part all our whole company, and doth daily consume it, riseth chiefly of our own wickedness and sins, while we walk not in the way of the Lord, nor observe his precepts left unto us for our institution. The Lord observed the will of his Father in all points, but we observe not the will of the Lord, having all our mind and study set upon lucre and possessions, given to pride, full of emulation and dissension, void of simplicity, and faithful dealing, renouncing this World in word only, but not living in deed, every man pleasing himself: and displeasing all others. And therefore are we thus scourged, and worthily: for what stripes and scourges do we not deserve, when the Confessors themselves (such as have bid the trial of their confession) and such as ought to be an example to the rest of well-doing, do keep no discipline? And therefore because some such there be, proudly puft up with this swelling and unmannerly bragging, of their confession, these torments come, such as do not easily send us to the Crown, except by the mercy of God, some, being taken away by quickness of death, do prevent the tediousness of punishment. These things do we suffer for our sins and desarts, as by the Lords censure we have been forewarned, saying: If they shall forsake my Law, and will not walk in my Judgments; if they shall prophane my Institutions, and will not observe my precepts, I will visit their iniquities with the rod, and their transgressions with scourges. These rods and scourges (saith he) we feel, which neither please God in our good deeds, nor repent in our evil deeds. Wherefore the said Cyprian adding this exhortation withal, exhorted them to pray and intreat from the bottom of their heart and whole mind, the mercy of God, which promiseth, saying: But yet my mercy I will not scatter from them, &c. Let us ask, and we shall obtain; and though (saith Cyprian) is be with tariance, yet for so much as we have grievously offended, let us continue knocking, for to him that knocketh it shall be opened, if our prayers, sighings, and weepings knock still at the door with continuance, and if our prayers be joyned together with brotherly agreement, &c. Moreover, what vices were then principally reigning among the Christians, he further specifieth in the said Epistle, which chiefly were division and dissention among the brethren. For when it was spoken to them in a Vision by these words, Petite & impetrabitis, that is, Pray and ye shall obtain: afterward it was required of the Congregation there present, to direct their prayers for certain persons alligned to them by name: but they could not agree and condescend altogether of the names and persons of them which they should pray for, but were dissonant in their consent and petition; which thing (saith Cyprian) did greatly displease him that spake unto them, Pray, and ye shall obtain, for that there was no uniform equality of voice and heart, nor one simple and joynt concord among the brethren, whereof it is written in the sixty seventh Psalm, God which maketh to dwell in the house together men of one accord, &c. And so by the occasion hereof, he writeth unto them in the foresaid Epistle, and moveth them to prayer and mutual agreement. For (saith he) if it be promised in the Gospel to be granted what soever any two consenting together shall ask, what shall then the whole Church do agreeing together? Or what if this unanimity were among the whole Fraternity? Which unanimity (saith Cyprian) if it had been then amongst the brethren, Non veniſſent fratribus hæc mala, ſi in unum fraternitas fuiſſet animata: that is, These evils had not happened to the brethren, if the brethren had joyned together in brotherly unanimity, &c.

Psal. 67.

After the causes thus declared of this and other Persecutions, the said Saint Cyprian moreover in the forenamed Epistle (worthy to be read of all men) describeth likewise a certain Vision, wherein was shewed unto him by the Lord before the Persecution came, what should happen. The Vision was this. There was a certain aged father sitting, at whose right hand sate a young man very sad and pensive, as one with an indignation sorrowful, holding his hand upon his breast, his countenance heavy and unchearful. On the left hand sate another person, having in his hand a Net, which he threatned to lay to catch the people that stood about. And as he was marvelling that saw the sight thereof, it was said unto him: The young man, whom thou seest sit on the right hand, is sad and sorry that his precepts be not observed. But he on the left hand glanceth, and is merry, for that occasion is given him to have power of the aged father to afflict men. And this Vision was seen long before this tempest of Persecution happened, wherein is declared the same that before is said; the sins of the People to be the cause why Satan, in this Persecution and all others, hath had and hath still such power with his net of destruction to rage against the blood of Christian men, and all because (saith Cyprian) we forslack our praying, or be not so vigilant therein as we should: wherefore the Lord, because he loveth us, correcteth us: correcteth us to amend us, amendeth us to save us, &c. Cyprian.

A Vision forthwaying perſecution to come. Cyp. lib. 4. epiſt. 4.

Furthermore, the same Cyprian, and in the same Epistle, writing of his own revelation or message sent to him, thus saith: And to his least servants hath simple and unworthy (meaning himself) God of his tender goodness hath vouchsafed to direct this word: Tell him (saith he) that he be quiet and of good comfort, for peace will come, albeit a little stay there is for a while: for that some remain yet to be proved and tryed, &c. And sheweth also in the same place of another revelation of his, wherein he was admonished to be spare in his feeding, and sober in his drink, left his mind, given to heavenly meditation, might be carried away with worldly allurements, or oppressed with too much surfeit of meats and drinks, should be less apt or able to prayer and spiritual exercise.

Another revelation shewed to S. Cyprian.

Spare diet and sober drink convenient in a Christian Bishop.

Finally, in the later end of the foresaid Epistle mention also followeth of other revelations or shewings: Wherein the Lord (saith Cyprian) doth vouchsafe to many of his servants to fore-shew to come the restoring of his Church, the stable quiet of our health and safeguard; after rain fair weather, after darkness light, after stormy tempest peaceable calm, the fatherly help of his love, the wont and old glory of his divine Majesty, whereby both the blasphemy of the Persecutor shall be repressed, and the repentance of such as have fallen be reformed, and the strong and stable confidence of them that stand shall rejoyce and glory. Thus much hath S. Cyprian written of these things to the Clergy. Libi 4. Epist. 4.

The peace of the Church to come, foreshewed by the Lord.

As touching now the crimes and accusations in this Persecution laid to the charge of the Christians, this was the principal: First, because they refused to do worship to their Idols and to the Emperors; then for that they professed the Name of Christ: besides, all the calamities and evils that happened in the World, as Wars, Famine and Pestilence, were imputed only to the Christians. Against all which quarrelling Accusations Cyprian doth eloquently defend the Christians in his Book Contra Cyp. Contra Demetrianum. Cypr. de Idolorum vanitate.

Demetrianum : like as Tertullian had done before, writing contra Scapulam. And first touching the objection, for not worshipping Idols, be cleareth the Christians both in his Book Contra Demetrian. And also De vanitate idol. proving those Idols to be no true Gods, but images of certain dead Kings, which neither could save themselves from death, nor such us worship them. The true God to be but one, and that by the testimony of Sosthenes, Plato and Trismegistus, the which God the Christians do truly worship. And as concerning that the Christians were thought to be the cause of publick calamities, because they worshipped not the Gentiles Idols, be purgeth the Christians thereof, proving that if there be any defect in increase of things, it is not to be ascribed to them, but rather to the decrease of Nature, languishing now towards her age and latter end. Again for that it hath been so foresaid and prophesied, that towards the end of the World should come Wars, Famine and Pestilence. Moreover, if there be any cause thereof more proper than other, it is most like to be imputed to their vain Idolatry, and to the contempt of the true God. Also that such evils be increased by the wickedness of the people, so that to speak in his own words, Famem majorem facit rapacitas quam ficitias, that is, Famine cometh more by avarice of men, than by drought of the Air: but especially the cause thereof to proceed of the cruel shedding of the innocent blood of the Christians, &c.

Thus with many other more probations doth Cyprian defend the Christians against the barbarous exclamations of the Heathen Gentiles. Of which Cyprian, for so much as he suffered in the time of this Persecution, I mind (Christ willing) to recapitulate here in ample discourse the full sum, first of his life and bringing up, then of his death and Martyrdom, as the worthiness of that man deserveth to be remembred. Of this Cyprian therefore, otherwise named Statius, thus writeth Nicephorus, Nazianzenus, Jacobus de Voragine, Henricus de Erfordia, Volaterranus, Hieronymus, and others; that he being an African, and born in Carthage, first was an Idolater and Gentile, altogether given to the study and practice of the Magical Arts; of whose parentage and education in Letters from his youth no mention is made, but that he was a worthy Rhetorician in Africa: of whose Conversion and Baptism he himself in his first Book and second Epistle writeth a flourishing and eloquent History. Which his conversion unto the Christian Faith, as Hieronymus affirmeth in his Commentary upon Jonas, was through the grace of God, and the means of Cecilius a Priest, whose name after he bare, and through the occasion of hearing the History of the Prophet Jonas. The same Hierome moreover testifieth how he immediately upon his Conversion distributed among the poor all his substance, and after that, being ordained a Priest, was not long after constituted Bishop of the Congregation of Carthage. But whether he succeeded Agrippinus of whom he often maketh mention (which also was the first author of Rebaptisation) or some other Bishop of Carthage, it remaineth uncertain. But this is most true, he himself shined in his office and dignity with such good gifts and vertues, that, as Nazianzenus writeth, he had government of the whole East Church, and Church of Spain, and was called the Bishop of the Christian men.

Cyprian made first Priest, then Bishop of Carthage.

The vertues of Cyprian life deficiled.

And to the further setting forth (to the praise of God) of his godly Vertues wherewith he was endued, appearing as well in his own works to them that list to peruse the same, as also described by other worthy Writers: he was courteous and gentle, loving and full of patience, and therewithal sharp and severe in his office, according as the cause required, as appeareth in his first Book and third Epistle.

The care of Cyprian toward the afflicted brethren.

Furthermore, he was most loving and kind toward his brethren, and took much pains in helping and relieving the Martyrs, as appeareth by his Letters to the Elders and Deacons of his Bishoprick, that with all study and endeavour they should gently entertain and shew pleasure unto the Martyrs in his absence, as partly is touched before.

The modesty of Cyprian in conferring with his fellow brethren.

The third Epistle of his first Book doth declare of what stomack and godly courage he was in executing his office, and handling his matters. Neither was he void of prudence and circumspection, but was adorned with marvellous modesty, whereby he attempted nothing upon his own head and judgment, but with the consent of his fellow Bishops and other inferior Ministers: and that chiefly (among others) doth the tenth Epistle of his third Book witness. He was of a marvelous liberal disposition towards the poor brethren of other Countries: for so often as he had cause of absence, he committed the care of those poor men to his fellow officers, and wrote to them, that of their own proper goods they would help their banished brethren to that which was necessary for them, as witnesseth the twenty fourth Epistle of his third Book. He recited among other gifts wherewith he was indued, as touching the Visions and heavenly admonitions of the Persecutions that should follow, and of other matters touching the government of the Church in his first book and third epistle, and fourth book and fourth epistle, where he reciteth and expoundeth the form or manner of a certain Vision which we have before sufficiently expressed.

Visions touching the troubles and peace of the Church, received and expounded by Cyprian.

The judgment of Augustine upon the Books of Cyprian. Augustin. cont. Cresconium Grammat. lib. 2. cap. 32.

He had moreover great skill in the foreknowledge of things that should chance, as may be gathered in the sixth Epistle of his fourth book. Also Augustine doth attribute unto him many worthy vertues, who writeth much in setting forth his gifts of humility in his second book of Baptism, the fourth Chapter against the Donatists; and in his seventh book and eleventh chapter, of his long sufferance and patience; also of his courtesie and meekness: by which vertues he concealed nothing that he understood, but uttered the same meekly and patiently. Also that he kept the ecclesiastical peace and concord with those that were of another opinion than he was of. Lastly, that he neither circumvented nor did prejudice any man, but followed that thing which seemed good in his judgment, it is manifest in St. Augustine his first book, De baptismo contra Donatistas. Neither is this to be passed with silence, that Hierome writeth, that he was very diligent in reading, especially the works of Tertullian: for he saith, that he saw a certain old man whose name was Paulus, which told him he saw the Notary of blessed Cyprian, being then an old man, when he himself was but a springal in the City of Rome, and told him that it was Cyprians wont, never to let one day pass without some reading of Tertullian, and that he was accustomed oftentimes to say unto him: Give me my Master, meaning thereby Tertullian.

Cyprian held in great estimation.

Now a few words touching his Exile and Martyrdom. Of his Epistles which he wrote back to his Congregation, leading his life in exile, mention is made above, wherein he sheweth the vertue befeeming a faithful Pastor, in that he took no less care as well of his own Church, as of other Bishops being absent, than he did being present. Wherein also he himself doth signifie that voluntarily he absented himself, lest he should do more hurt than good to the Congregation, by reason of his presence, as is likewise declared before. Thus from the desolate places of his banishment, wherein he was oftentimes sought for, he writeth unto his brethren, as in his third book and tenth epistle is manifest, which thing seemeth to be done in the Reign of Decius or Gallus. But after that he returned again out of exile in the Reign of this Valerianus, he was also after that the second time banished of Paternus the Proconsul of Africa into the City of Thurbin, as the Oration of Augustine touching Cyprian sheweth; or else, as Pontius the Deacon saith, into a City named Curabilitana, or Curabilitana. But when Paternus the Proconsul was dead, Galienus Marimus succeeded in the room and office of Paternus, who finding Cyprian in a Garden, caused him to be apprehended by his Serjeants, and to be brought before the Idols to offer Sacrifice. Which when he would not do, then the Proconsul breaking forth in these words, said, Long hast thou lived in a sacrilegious mind, and hast gathered together men of a wicked conspiracy, and hast shewed thy self an enemy to the Gods of the Romans, and to their holy laws: neither could the sacred Emperors Valerianus and Gallienus revoke thee to the Sect of their ceremonies. At length the wicked Tyrant condemned him to have his head cut off, he patiently and willingly submitted his neck to the stroke of the Sword, as Hieronymus affirmeth. And so this blessed Martyr ended this present life in the Lord; Xistus then being Bishop of Rome, as Eusebius noteth, in the year of our Lord two hundred fifty and nine. Sabellicus saith that he was martyred in the Reign of Gallus and Volusianus, Lucius being Bishop of Rome: but that seemeth not like.

Now

The Books of Cyprian.

Now remaineth to speak something likewise of his Works and Books left behind him, although all peradventure that he wrote do not remain: whereof some are missing, some again, in the livery of his Name and Title, are not his: but such as be certainly his, by the stile and sense may soon be discerned; such is the eloquence of his phrase, and gravity of his sentence, vigor of wit, power in perswasion, so much differing from many others, as he can lightly be imitated but of few. Of the which his Books with us extant, as the flourishing eloquence is worthily commended, proceeding out of the School of Rhetoricians, so is the authority thereof no less of Reputation, not only among us of this age of the Church, but also among the ancient Fathers. Whereof St. Augustine speaking in his commendation, saith, Ego (inquit) literas Cypriani non ut canonicas habeo, sed eas ex canonicis considero: & quod in eis divinarum Scripturarum authoritati congruit cum laude ejus accipio; quod autem non congruit, cum pace ejus respuo, &c. By which words it may appear that Augustine, although he did not repute the Books and Writings of Cyprian to be equivalent with the Holy Scripture, yet notwithstanding, next after the Holy Scriptures he had the same in exceeding great admiration.

Sentences of Cyprian collected. Ex Vincentio. lib. 12. c. 6.

Vincentius and Lazsarus Celestinus reciting the names of divers Books, bearing the Title of Cyprian (more perchance than be truly his) do collect out of them a certain extract of his most pithy Sentences, all which here to repeat were too tedious. To give a taste of the special, I thought it not impertinent. As where he speaking of the treasures of a rich man, exhorteth saying:

Ne dormiat in thesauris tuis, quod pauperi prodesse potest.
Let it not sleep in thy treasures, that may profit the poor.

Duo nunquam veterascunt in homine: cor semper novas cogitationes machinando: lingua, cordis vanas conceptiones proferendo.
Two things never wax old in man, the heart ever imagining new cogitations, the tongue ever in uttering the vain conceptions of the heart.

Quod aliquando de necessitate amittendum est, fiomte pro divina remuneratione distribuendum est.
That which a man must needs forgo of necessity, wisdom it is for a man to distribute so, that God may everlastingly reward him.

Disciplina est morum praesentium ordinata correctio, & malorum praeteritorum regularis observatio.
Discipline is an ordinate amendment of manners present, and a regular observation of evils past.

Integritas ibi nulla esse potest, ubi, qui improbos damnent, desunt: & soli, qui damnentur, occurrunt.
There can be no integrity, whereas they which should condemn the wicked, are ever wanting: and they only which are to be condemned, are ever present.

Avari ad hoc tantum possident quae habent, ut ne alteri possidere liceat,
A covetous man only possesseth his goods for this, because another should not possess them.

Sericum & purpurum induit ac Christum induere non possunt.
Women, that advance themselves in putting on silks and purple, cannot lightly put on Christ.

Famine crines suos inficiunt malo praesagio: capillos enim sibi flammeos auspicari non metuunt.
They which colour their locks with red and yellow, begin betime to prognosticate of what colour their hair shall be in Hell.

Qui se pingunt in hoc seculo, aliter quam creavit deus; mentiunt, ne cum resurrectionis veneris dies, artifex creaturam suam non recognoscat.
They which love to paint themselves in this world otherwise than God hath created them: let them fear, left when the day cometh of resurrection, the Creator will not know them.

Qui pauperi eleemosynam dat, Deo suavitatis odorem sacrificat.
He that giveth an alms to the poor, sacrificeth to God an odor of sweet smell.

Contemnenda est omnis injuria praesentium malorum, fiducia futurorum bonorum.
All injury of evils present, is to be neglected, for the good hope of good things to come.

Nihil prodest verbis proferre virtutem, & factis destruere.
To set out vertue in words, and to destroy the same in facts, is nothing worth.

Quo plures domi sunt tibi liberi, hoc plus tibi non recondendum, sed erogandum est, quia multorum jam delicta redimenda sunt, multorum purganda conscientiae.
The more children and greater houshold thou hast at home, the more cause thou hast not to hoord up, but to disperse abroad, for that many sins are to be redeemed, many Consciences are to be purged.

Moreover left the Papists here should take an occasion by this Text, grounded upon the Text of Tob. cap. 4. Alms (saith he) delivereth from all sin and death: to build up the works of satisfaction, the said Cyprian, Lib. 4. Epist. 2. more plainly expoundeth both himself, and that place of Scripture, writing in these words: Quia scriptum est, Eleemosyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat: Tob. 4. Non utique ab ea morte, quam semel Christi sanguis extinxit, & a qua nos salutaris baptismi & redemptoris nostri gratia liberavit, sed ab illa quae per delicta postmodum serpit, &c. that is, Alms do deliver from all sin and from death, Tob. 4. Not from that (faith Cyprian) which the blood of Christ hath once extinguished, and from which the whole fome grace of our Baptism, and of our Redeemer hath delivered us, but from that death which afterwards creepeth in by sin, &c. Cyprian. Lib. 4. Epist. 2. By which words it is apparent, that Cyprian meaneth this deliverance (which cometh by Alms giving) from death and sin, not to be expounded nor to be taken for death everlasting, from which only the blood of Christ doth save us: but for temporal or tranitory punishment, which is wont to be inflicted in this body of sin. For so it is nothing repugnant, but that temporal vertues may have their temporal rewards in this life, and likewise sins committed, may have temporal punishments both in us and in our families, our eternal salvation standing evermore firm in Christ yet notwithstanding.

The place of Scripture expounded. Eleemosyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat. Tob. 4. Ex Cypr. lib. 4. Epist. 2.

The foresaid Vincentius moreover speaking of another Book of Cyprian (although the said Book be not numbred in the Catalogue of his Works) maketh mention of twelve abuses, or absurdities in the life of man, which in order be these:

Twelve absurdities in the life of man noted out of Cyprian.

1. Sapiens sine operibus. A wise man without good works.
2. Senex sine Religione. An old man without Religion.
3. Adolescens sine obedientia. A young man without obedience.
4. Dives sine eleemosyna. A rich man without Alms.
5. Famina sine pudicitia. A woman shameless.
6. Dominus sine virtute. A guid without vertue.
7. Christianus contentiosus. A Christian man contentious.
8. Pauper superbus. A poor man proud.
9. Rex iniquus. A King unrighteous.
10. Episcopus negligens. A Bishop negligent.
11. Plebs sine Disciplina. People without Discipline.
12. Populus sine lege. Subjects without Law.

As we have hitherto set forth the commendation of Cyprian this blessed Martyr: so must we now take heed again that we do not here incur the old and common danger, which the Papists are commonly accustomed to run into, whose fault is always almost to be immoderate and excesive in their proceedings, making too much almost of every thing. So in speaking of the Holy Sacraments, they make more of them than doth the nature of Sacraments require; not ufing them, but abuling them, not referring or applying them, but adorning them, not taking them in their kind for things godly, as they are, but taking them for God himself, turning Religion into Superstition, and the creature to the Creator, the things signifying to the things themselves signified, &c. To the Church likewise and ceremonies of the Church, to General Councils, to the blessed Virgin Mary Mother of Christ, to the Bishop of Rome, and to all other in like case; not contented to attribute that which is sufficient, they exceed moreover, the bounds of judgment and verity, judging so of the Church, and General Councils, as though they could never, or did never err in any jot. That the blessed Mother of Christ amongst all women was blessed, and a Virgin full of grace, the Scripture and truth doth give: but to say that she was born without all original sin, or to make of her an advocate, or mother of mercy, there they run further than truth will bear. The ceremonies were first ordained to serve but only for order sake, unto the which they have attributed so much at length, that they have set in them a great part of our Religion, yea, and also of Salvation. And what thing is there else almost, wherein the Papists have not exceeded?

The fault of Papists to make too much of every thing.

How far the authority of the Doctors ought to extend.

Wherefore, to avoid this common error of the Papists, we must beware in commending the Doctors and Writers of the Church, and so commend them, that truth and consideration, go with our commendation. For though this cannot be denied, but that holy Cyprian, and other blessed Martyrs were holy Men; yet notwithstanding, they were Men, that is, such as might have, and had their falls and faults; Men, I say, and not Angels, nor Gods to be saved by God, not saviours of Men, nor Patrons of Grace. And though they were also men of excellent learning, and worthy Doctors, yet with their learning they had their errors also annexed. And though their Books be (as they ought to be) of great authority, yet ought they not to be equal with the Scriptures. And albeit they said well in most things, yet it is not therefore enough that what they said, it must stand for a truth. That preeminence of authority only belongeth to the Word of God, and not to the Pen of Man. For of Men and Doctors, be they never so famous, there is none that is void of his reprehension. In Origen (although in his time the admiration of his learning was singular) yet how many things be there, which the Church now holdeth not? But examining him by Scriptures, where he said well, they admit him, where otherwise, they leave him. In Polycarpus, the Church hath corrected and altered that which he did hold in celebrating the Easter day after the Jews. Neither can holy and blessed Ignatius be defended in all his sayings; as where he maketh the fasting upon the Sunday or the Sabbath day as great an offence, as to kill Christ himself: Ignat. Epist. ad Philip. contrary to this saying of Saint Paul, Let no man judge you in meat and drink: also where the said Ignatius speaketh De Virginitate, and of other things more. Irenæus did hold that man was not made perfect in the beginning. He seemeth also to defend free will in man, in those things also that be spiritual. He saith that Christ suffered after he was fifty years old, abusing this place of the Gospel, Quinquaginta annos nondum habes, &c. Tertullian (whom Saint Cyprian never laid out of his hands almost) is noted to be a Chiliast: also to have been of Montanus Sect. The same did hold also with Justine, Cyprian, and others, that the Angels fell first for the concupiscence of women: Lib. de habitu mulierum. He defendeth free will of man after the corruption of nature, inclining also to the error of them, which defend the possibility of keeping Gods Law. Concerning Marriage; Unum matrimonium (inquit) novimus, sicut unum Deum: that is, We know (saith he) one Marriage, as we know one God; condemning the second Marriage. Lib. de Monogam. Divers other things of like absurdity in him be noted. Justinus also seemeth to have inclined unto the error of the Chiliasts, of the fall of certain Angels by Women, of free will of man, of possibility of keeping the Law, and such others. Neither was this our Cyprian, the great Scholar of Tertullian, utterly exempt from the blot of them, who, contrary to the Doctrine of the Church, did hold with rebaptising of such as were before baptised of Hereticks, whereof speaketh Saint Augustine, misliking the same error of Cyprian, in these words contained in his second Book Contra Crescon. Cyprianus, inquit, laudem ego consequi non valeo, ejus multis Literis mea scripta non comparo, ejus ingenium diligo, ejus ore delector, ejus charitatem miror, ejus martyrium veneror: non accepio quod de baptizandis hæreticis & schismaticis sensit. &c. Upon the which matter there was a great contention between the said Cyprian and Stephan Bishop of Rome, as partly afore is noted. Of Augustine himself likewise, of Ambrose, Hierome, Chrysostome, the same may be said, that none of them all so clearly passed away, but their peculiar faults and errors went with them, whereof it were too long, and out of our purpose at this present to intreat. And thus much concerning the story of Cyprian, the holy learned Martyr of Christ.

Cyprian.

Contention between Cyprian and Stephanus Bishop of Rome.

Albeit here is to be noted by the way, touching the life and story of Cyprian, that this Cyprian was not he whom the narration of Nazianzen speaketh of (as is above mentioned) who from Art Magick was converted to be a Christian, which Cyprian was a Citizen of Antioch, and afterward Bishop of the same City, and was martyred under Diocletian: whereas this Cyprian was Bishop of Carthage, and died under Valerianus, as is said, &c. By the decrees of Gratian, dist. 10. quoniam, it appeareth moreover that there was also a third Cyprian in the time of Julianus the Emperor Apostata, long after both these aforenamed: for so giveth the title prefixed before the said distinction, Cyprianus Juliano Imperatori: the distinction beginning: Quoniam idem Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Jesus, sic aliibus proprius, & dignitatibus distinctus officia potestatis utriusque disseruit, &c. Upon the which distinction the gloss cometh in with these words, saying, that the Popedome, and the seat Imperial, have both one beginning of one, that is Christ: who was both Bishop, and King of Kings. And that the said dignities be distinct, albeit the Pope notwithstanding hath both the swords in his hand, and may exercise them both sometime. And therefore although they be distinct, yet in exercise the one standeth lineally under the other, so that the imperial dignity is subject under the Papal Dignity, as the inferiour is subject under the superiour: that as there is one ruler over the whole World, which is God: so in the Church is one Monarch, that is, the Pope, to whom the Lord hath committed the power and lawful right both of the heavenly and terrene dominion. Hæc glossa.

Cyprian differs not from the rest of that name.

Dist. 10. Quoniam.

Gloss. dist. 22. A blind gloss claiming both the swords to the Popes hand.

Thus much I thought here to note by the way, because this distinction is fathered upon Cyprian, which is false: for this Cyprian was not in the time of Julian, not by two hundred years, and so likewise the other Cyprian, which died Martyr under Diocletian. Of any Cyprian besides these two we read not; neither is it credible, that, if there were any such Cyprian, he would ever have written of any such matter, of the difference and mutual need of Christian Emperors and Christian Popes; when as that Emperor being an Apostata, neither regarded Christ, nor cared for any Pope.

A distinction of God, no disposed.

About this time, and under the same Emperor Valerianus suffered also Xistus, or Sixtus, the second of that name, Bishop of Rome, who, being accused of his adversaries to be a Christian, was brought with his six Deacons to the place of execution, where he with Nemesius and other his Deacons were beheaded and suffered Martyrdom. Laurence in the same time, being also Deacon, followed after, complaining to Xistus (as one being grieved) that he might not also suffer with him, but to be secluded as the son from the father. To whom the Bishop answering again, declared that within three days he should follow after. In the mean time he willed him to go home, and to distribute his treasures, if he had any, unto the poor. The Judge, belike hearing mention to be made of treasures to be given to the poor, and thinking that Laurence had great store of treasure in his custody, commanded him to bring the same unto him, according as in the discourse of the story here under written more fully may appear. Which History, because it is set forth more at large in Prudentius, Ambrose, and other Writers, and containeth in it more things worthy to be noted of the Reader; we have therefore with the more diligence here inserted the more ample description of the same, to the farther admiration of his patience, and God his glory shewed in him.

Xistus the second Bishop of Rome Martyr.

Six Deacons with Xistus Martyrs.

Now then, as order required, let us enter the story of that most constant and courageous Martyr of Christ S. Laurence, whose words and works deserve to be as fresh and green in Christian hearts, as is the flourishing Laurel tree. This thirsty heart longing after the water of life, so deirous to pass unto it through the strait door of bitter death, when on a time he saw his vigilant shepherd Xistus, led as an harmeless Lamb, of harmeful Tyrants to his Death, cryed out with open mouth and heart invincible, saying,

The story & martyrdom of Laurence.

The words of Laurence to Xistus.

saying: O dear Father, Whither goest thou, without the company of thy dear son? Whither hastnest thou, O reverend Priest, without thy Deacon? Never wait thou wont to offer sacrifice without thy Minister. What crime is there in me that offendeth thy fatherhood? Hast thou proved unnatural? None try, sweet Father, whether thou hast chosen a faithful Minister or not? Deniest thou unto him the fellowship of thy blood, to whom thou hast committed the distribution of the Lords blood? See that thy Judgment be not mistaken, whilst thy fortitude is liked and lauded. The abusing of the Scholar is the disgracing of the Master. What? Have we not learned that worthy Masters have obtained most worthy fame by the worthy acts of their Disciples and Scholars? Finally, Abraham sacrificed his only begotten Isaac; stoned Stephan, prepared the way to Preaching Peter: Even so Father declare thy manifold vertues by me thy son. Offer thou him that prosfereth himself; grant that the body of thy Scholar may be sacrificed, whose mind with good letters thou hast beautified. These words with tears Saint Laurence uttered, not because his Master should suffer, but for that he might not be suffered to taste of Deaths, cup which he thirsted after.

Some say that this Tyrant was Decius the Emperor, but that cannot be, except Galienus or some other Judge now was called by the name of Decius.

The answer of Xistus to Laurence.

Then Xistus to his son shaped this answer: I forsake thee not, O my son; I give thee to wit, that a sharper conflict remaineth for thee. O feeble and weak old man I, and therefore run the race of a lighter and easier Death: But lusty and young thou art, and more lustily, yea more gloriously shalt thou triumph over this Tyrant: Thy time approacheth, cease to weep and lament, three days after thou shalt follow me: Decent it is that this space of time come between the Priest and the Levite. It may not beseem thee, O sweet pupil, to triumph under thy Master, left it be said, he wanted an helper. Why craveth thou to be partaker with me in my passion? I bequeath unto thee the whole inheritance. Why requirest thou to enjoy my presence? Let weak scholars go before, and the stronger come after, that those without master may get the victory, which have no need by master to be governed. So Helias left behind him his beloved Helisæus. I yield up into thy hands the succession of my virtues. Such was their contention, not unmeet for so Godly a Priest, and so zealous a Minister; striving with themselves who should first suffer for the name of Christ Jesus.

In tragical Histories we have it mentioned, that through joy and admiration, people clapped their hands, when Pilades named himself Orestes; Orestes (as truth it was) affirmed himself to be Orestes: Pilades willing to die for Orestes, Orestes not suffering Pilades to lose his life for his sake; but neither of them might escape Death; for both these lovers were guilty of blood, the one committing the fact, the other consenting. But this our Laurence, the Martyr most constant, was by no means enforced to make this proffer, saving only by his ardent zeal and fervent spirit, who thirsting after the Cup of Martyrdom, had it thortly after filled to the hard brim.

Now let us draw near to the fire of Martyred Laurence, that our cold Hearts may be warmed thereby. The merciless Tyrant, understanding this vertuous Levite, not only to be a Minister of the Sacraments, but a distributer also of the Church riches (wherof mention is made before in the words of Xistus) promised to himself a double prey, by the apprehension of one filly Sheep. First with the rake of avarice to scrape to himself the Treasure of poor Christians; then with the fiery fork of Tyranny, so to toss and turmoil them, that they should wax weary of their Profession: With furious face and cruel countenance, the greedy wolfe demanded where this Deacon Laurence, had bestowed the substance of the Church? Who craving three days respite, promised to declare where the Treasure might be had. In the mean time, he caused a good number of poor Christians to be Congregated. So when the day of his answer was come, the persecutor strictly charged him to stand to his promise. Then valiant Laurence stretching out his Arms over the poor, said: These are the precious Treasure of the Church, these are the Treasure indeed, in whom the faith of Christ Reigneth, in whom Jesus Christ hath his mansion place. What more precious jewels can Christ have, than those in whom he hath promised to dwell? For so it is written, I was hungry and ye gave me to eat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me to drink; I was harbourless, and ye lodged me. And again; Look what ye have done to the least of these, the same have ye done to me. What greater riches can Christ our Master possess, than the poor People, in whom he loved to be seen? Oh, what tongue is able to express the fury and madness of the tyrants Heart! Now he stamped, he stared, he ramped, he fared as one out of his wits: his eyes like fire glowed, his mouth like a Bore fomed, his teeth like a helhound grinned. Now not a reasonable man, but a roaring Lion he might be called. Kindle the fire (he cryed) of wood make no spare. Hath this valkain deluded the Emperor? Away with him, away with him: Whip him with scourges, jerk him with rods, buffet him with fists, brain him with clubs. Jesteth the traytor with the Emperor? Pinch him with fiery Tongs, gird him with burning plates, bring out the strongest chains, and the fire-forks, and the grated bed of Iron: on the fire with it, bind the rebel hand and foot; and when the bed is fire hot, on with him: Roft him, broil him, to fit him, turn him: on pain of our high displeasure do every man his office. O tormentors. The word was no sooner spoken, but all was done.

Laurence's tormented on the fiery gridiron.

After many cruel handlings, this meek lamb was laid, I will not say on his fiery bed of Iron, but on his soft bed of Down. So mightily God wrought with his Martyr Lawrence, so miraculously God tempered his element the fire; not a bed of consuming pain, but a palace of nourishing rest was it unto Lawrence. Not Lawrence, but the Emperor might seem to be tormented: The one broyling in the flesh, the other burning in the Heart. When this triumphant Martyr had been pressed down with fire-picks for a great space, in the mighty Spirit of God he spake to the vanquished Tyrant.

The stately patience of Laurence in his pains.

This side is now rosted enough, turn up O Tyrant great: Assay whether rosted or raw, thou thinkest the better meat.

O rare and unaccustomed patience! O faith invincible! that not only not burneth, but by means unspeakable doth recreate, refresh, stablish, and strengthen those that are burned, afflicted and troubled. And why so mightily comforteth thou the persecuted? Because through thee they believe in Gods promises infallible. By thee this glorious Martyr overcometh his torments, vanquisheth this Tyrant, confoundeth his Enemies, confirmeth the Christians, sleepeth in peace, and reigneth in glory. The God of might and mercy grant us grace by the life of Laurence to learn in Christ to live, and by his death to learn for Christ to die, Amen.

The martyr doth end of blessed Laurence.

Such is the wisdom and providence of God, that the blood of his dear Saints (like good seed) never falleth in vain to the ground, but it bringeth forne increase: So it pleased the Lord to work at the Martyrdom of this holy Laurence, that by the constant confession of this worthy and valiant Deacon, a certain Souldier of Rome being therewith compunched, and converted to the same faith, he being called for of the Judge, was scourged, and afterward beheaded. Henr. de Erford.

A Roman souldier converted by Laurence, and martyred.

Under the same Velerianus, suffered also Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria, much affliction and banishment, with certain other brethren: Of the which he writeth himself, and is alledged in the Ecclesiastical story of Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 11. the words whereof tend to this effect. Dionysius with three of his Deacons, to wit, Maximus, Faustus and Cheremon, also with a certain Brother of Rome, came to Emilianus then president, who were declared unto them in circumstance of words, how he had signified unto them the clemency of his Lords and Emperors; who had granted them pardon of life, so that they would return to them, and worship the Gods and keepers (as he called them) of their Empery, asking them what answer they would give him thereunto: Trusting as he said that they would not shew themselves ingrateful, to the clemency of them which so gently did exhort them. To this Dionysius answering, said: All men worship not all Gods, but divers men, divers Gods; so as every one hath in himself a mind or Phantasie to worship. But we worship not many, nor divers Gods, but only that one God, who is the Creator of all things, and hath committed to our Lords, Valerianus and Galienus, the government of their Empery, making to him our prayers incessantly for their prosperous health and continuance. Then the President said: And what hurt is it, sith that you may both worship your God, what God soever he be, and these our Gods also? For you are commanded to worship such Gods, as all men know to be Gods. Dionysius answered, We worship none other, but as we have said. Emilianus the President said; I see you are ingrateful men, and consider not the benignity of the Emperor; wherefore you shall remain no longer in this City, but shall be sent out to the parts of Libya, unto a Town called Cephro: For that place by the commandment of the Emperor I have chosen for you. Neither shall it be lawful for you to convent your assemblies, or to resort as ye are wont to your burial places. And if any of you shall be found out of your places whereunto you are appointed, at your peril be it. And think not contrary, but ye shall be watched well enough. Depart therefore to the place, as is commanded you. And it followeth more of the said Dionysius, speaking of himself: And as for me (saith he) although I was sick, yet he urged me so strictly to depart, that he would not give me one days respite. And how (said he, writing to Germanus) could I congregate, or not congregate any assemblies? And after a few lines it followeth; And yet neither am I altogether absent from the Corporal society of the Lords flock, but I have collected them together, which were in the City, being absent, as though I had been present; absentin body, yet present in Spirit. And in the same Cephro, a great Congregation remained with me, as well of those brethren which followed me out of the City, as also of them which were remaining there out of Egypt. And there the Lord opened to me the door of his Word: Although at the first entrance I was persecuted and stoned among them, yet afterward a great number of them fell from their Idols, and were converted unto the Lord. And so by us the Word was preached to them which before were infidels: Which Ministery after that we had accomplished there, the Lord removed us to another place. For Emilianus translated us from thence to more sharp and stricter places of Libia, and commanded us to meet all together at the City Mareota: Thinking there to separate us severally into sundry Villages, or thinking rather to take and prevent us by the way. After we were come thither, it was affigned to me (saith Dionysius) to go to Collunthian, which place I never heard of before: Which was the more grief to me; yet some solace it was to me, that the brethren told me it was near to a City named Peretonium. For as my being at Cephro got me the acquaintance of many brethren of Egypt, so my hope was, that the vicinity of that place (where I should be) to the City, might procure the familiarity and concourse of certain loving brethren, which would resort and assemble with us, and so it came to pass, &c.

Moreover, the said Dionysius in his Epistle, Ad Domitium & Dydimum, making mention of them which were afflicted in this persecution of Valerian, recordeth in these words, saying: It were superfluous (saith he) here to recite the names, peculiarly of all our brethren slain in this persecution, which both were many, and to me unknown. But this is certain, that there were men, women, young men, maidens, old wives, fouldiers, simple innocents, and of all sorts and ages of men. Of whom some with scourgings and fire, some with sword obtain victory, and got the Crown. Some continued a great time, and yet have been reserved. In the which number am I reserved hitherto, to some other opportune time known unto the Lord, which saith: In the time accepted I have heard thee, and in the day of salvation I have helped thee, &c. Now as concerning my self in what state I am, if thou desire to know first how I and Caius, and Faustus, Petrus and Paulus, being apprehended by the Centurion, were taken away by certain of the Town of Mareota, I have declared to you before. Now I and Caius, and Petrus alone are left here included in a Weft place of Libia, distant the space of three days journey from Peretonium, &c. And in process further he addeth: In the City (saith he) were certain which privily visit the brethren: Of Priests, Maximus, Dioscorus, Demetrius and Lucius. For they which were more notable in the world, Faustinus and Aquila, do wander abroad in Egypt. Of the Deacons besides them whom sickness hath consumed, Faustus, Eusebius, and Cheremon are yet alive. Eusebius hath God raised and stirred up to minister to the confessors lying in bands, and to bury the bodies of the blessed Martyrs, not without great peril. Neither doth the President cease yet to this day, cruelly murthering such as be brought before him, tearing some with torments, imprisoning and keeping some in custody, commanding that no man should come to them, enquiring also who resorted unto them. Yet notwithstanding God with cheerfulness, and daily resort of the brethren doth comfort the afflicted. Hæc Dionysius.

Concerning these Deacons above recited, here is to be noted, that Eusebius afterward was made Bishop of Laodicea in Syria. Maximus the Priest aforesaid, had the ministration of the Church of Alexandria after Dionysius. Faustus long after continued in great age, unto the later persecution, where he being a very old man, at length was beheaded, and died a Martyr.

As touching Dionysius himself, thus the stories report, that he surviving all these troubles and persecutions, by the providence of God, continued after the death of Valerian, unto the twelfth year of the Reign of Galienus, which was about the year of our Lord, two hundred threescore and eight; and so departed in peace in great age, after that he had governed the Church of Alexandria the space of seventeen years, and before that had taught the School of the said City of Alexandria, the term of sixteen years, after whom succeeded Maximus, as is above specified. And thus much touching the full story of Dionysius Alexandrinus, and of other also, Martyrs and confessors of Alexandria.

In Cesarea Palestine suffered also the same time Priscus, Malchus and Alexander, the which three dwelling in the Country, and good men, seeing the valiant courage of the Christians, so boldly to venture, and constantly to stand, and patiently to suffer in this persecution, as men being grieved with themselves, began to repent and accuse their so great sluggishness, and cowardly negligence, to see others so zealous and valiant, and themselves so cold and faint-hearted, in labouring for the Crown of Christian martyrdom: And first consulting and agreeing with themselves, they came to Cesarea, and there stepping to the Judge, declared themselves what they were, and obtained the end they came for, being given to the wild beasts. After which manner also and in the same City of Cesarea, a certain woman, whose name Eusebius expresseth not, who had been before of the sect of Marcion, was brought before the President, and likewise obtained the same Martyrdom, Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 12.

Neither was the City of Carthage all this while free from the stroke of this persecution, if credit should be given to the speculative glass of Vincentius, who citing it out of Hugo, recordeth of three hundred Martyrs, of which three hundred Martyrs, the story saith thus, that the President setting before them coals and incense to do sacrifice by a lime-kiln, which was there near at hand, offered unto them this condition, either to set incense to the coals for sacrifice to Jupiter, or else to go into the furnace of lime: Whereupon they all together with a general motion, suddenly rushed into the kiln, and there with the dusty smoke of the lime were smothered. Vincent. Erford.

In Africa also, in the City of Tuburba, the said Vincentius out of the Martyrology inferreth mention of three constant virgins, Maxima, Donatilla, and Secunda; who, in the persecution of this Valerian and Galienus, first had given for their drink vineger and gall, then with scourges were tried, after that upon the gibbet were tormented, and rubbed with lime, then were scorched upon the fiery grid-iron, at last were cast to the wild beasts; who, being not touched of them, finally with the sword were beheaded, Vincent. Erford.

In Simela, a City in Italy, under the Alps, one Pontius being there apprehended, by the commandment of Claudius the President, was hanged first upon the rack, then was caft to the wild beasts, of whom he being nothing hurt, was after committed to the fire; and finally, not touched therewith (if the story of Vincentius be true) was beheaded by the rivers side, and his body thrown into the flood, where immediately the same hour, the forefaid Claudius, with his affistant Anabius, were taken with wicked spirits, by whom they were so miserably vexed that they bit off their tongues, and died.

Zenon,

Zenon Bishop of Verona, is said also in the same persecution to sustain Martyrdom.

Moreover, in the same City of Alexandria aforesaid, Bergomensis in his eighth Book, writing of the story of Valerianus Emperor, maketh mention of Philippus, Bishop of the said See of Alexandria, who (as he saith) was under the said Valerian beheaded. But that is not to be found in any approved story, nor standeth it with the truth of time that any such Philip was then Bishop of Alexandria, or any other, except only Dionysius. After whom next succeeded Maximus, who remained eighteen years, and after him Thomas, &c. So that, by the ancient Records of old Writers, it appeareth not that Philippus, or any other of that name was Bishop of Alexandria, during this time signified by Bergomensis.

Although in some other later Writers, as Equilinus, Antoninus, and Bergomensis, I find a certain History of one Philippus, President of Alexandria about the same time of Valerian and Galienus, elected by the Emperor and Senate of Rome, to govern those quarters, where he was at length converted to the Christian Faith, and after made Priest or Bishop (as they say) of Alexandria: but that not to be so, the testimony of ancient Writers doth manifest. The History of this Philippus, witnessed in our later Chronicles, is this, Philippus being promoted to the Presidentship of Alexandria, came down with his wife Claudia, and his two Sons, Avitus and Sergius, and with his Daughter named Eugenia, of the which Eugenia a long History full of strange and prodigious Miracles is written of Antoninus and others, whereof many things I will cut off, and briefly touch the effect of the story, leaving to the judgment of the Reader the credit of mine Authors, as he shall see cause.

This Eugenia Daughter of Philippus, being of singular beauty, and diligently brought up by her Parents in the study of Science and Learning, was by occasion of hearing Christians reduced and brought up to Christianity, with two other Eunuchs her School-Fellows, called Prothus and Hiacinthus: with whom the taking counsel, upon occasion (whether to avoid the danger of Persecution, or refusing to marry with a Pagan) unknown to her Parents and Friends did fly away; and because she more boldly the might refort to hear the Readings of Helenus then an aged Bishop, and of others, she changed her self into mans Apparel, and named her self Eugenius, under the which name she was at length admitted unto a certain Monastery, or a Society of Christians in the Suburbs of Alexandria (although I hardly believe that any Monastery of Christians was then in the Suburbs of Alexandria permifted) where also at the last, for her excellency of Learning and Vertue, she was made Head of the Place.

Here by the way I omit the Miracles of the forefaid Helenus, Bishop (as the story faith) of Hieropolis, how he carried burning coals in his lap, and how he adventured himself to go in the burning fire, to refel wicked Zereas a Pagan, remaining in the same unburned. Here also I omit the careful search of her Parents for her, and of the answer of the Pithonisse again unto them, that she was taken up to Heaven among the goddesses. I omit moreover the Miracles done by the said Eugenia, in healing the Diseases and Sicknesses of such as came to her, &c. The story proceedeth thus, Among others which were by this Eugenius cured and restored, there was a certain Matron of Alexandria, named Melanecia; who, after the had used the help and acquaintance of Eugenius, supposing her to be a man, fell into an inordinate love of her, seeking by all means how to accomplish the luft of her Concupiscence. Informuch that in her daily visiting of her, at length she began secretly to break her mind, and to intice her to her lewdness. Eugenius contrarily exhorted her to vertue and honesty, shewing her the miseries of this life, and the peril of that folly. Melanecia seeing that by no means she would be allured, nor by force drawn to her desire, and fearing moreover, that she in detecting of her, would bring her to shame, beginning first to make an Out-cry of Eugenius, declaring how that she went about corruptly to deflower her; and so presented her Accusation before Philippus the President, as well against Eugenius, as also against the rest of that Company. This matter being heard, and the woman well known, the Crime began to seem suspicious, and so much the more, because it was objected against the Christians. By reason whereof Eugenius with her fellow Christians was now not only in great hatred, but also in danger of present death and destruction. Then Eugenius purging her self and her honestly, although with sufficient probation; yet notwithstanding, perceiving that whatsoever the said could take no place, and seeing no time now to dissemble any longer, for the danger as well of her own self, as specially of her Brethren, which troubled her more: she desired of the Judge place and time to make manifest to him the truth, and so shewed her self what she was, and how she was his Daughter, the other to be Prothus and Hiacinthus, the two Eunuchs, her School-Fellows, uttering moreover to him and to her Brethren, the cause of her departing from them. At the Narration whereof, Philippus her Father, and her two Brethren coming to the knowledge of her, conceived no little joy, in receiving their Eugenia again, whom they thought had been loft. No leis gladness was among the people, to see the evidence of the matter so plainly to try out the truth of the one, and the falseness of the other. Whereat the malignant Accuser was with double shame confounded, first, for her dishonesty fally cloaked: secondly, for the untruth of her Accusation openly detected. Bergomensis addeth moreover, that the said Accuser was stricken presently with lightning. Thus Eugenia trying her honesty to her Parents and Friends, was not only received of them again, but also by the Grace of the Lord working with her, in the space of time did win them to Christ. Whereby Philippus the Father of her by Nature, now by Grace was begotten of his own Daughter to a more perfect life; and whom once he thought to have been loft, not only he found again, but also with her found his own Soul, and his own life, which before he had loft indeed. This Philippus (saith the story) was made afterward Bishop of Alexandria, and there suffered Martyrdom. Concerning whose Martyrdom I deny not but it may be true; but that he was Bishop of Alexandria, that cannot be admitted, as is before sufficiently proved out of Eusebius and other ancient Historians.

Likewise it is faid, that Eugenia, after the Martyrdom of her Father, returning to Rome with Prothus and Hiacinthus, by occasion of converting Basilla (who should have been married to a Pagan Husband, and was then beheaded) to the Christian Faith, was assailed with sundry kinds of death: first, being tied to a great stone and cast into Tiber, where she was carried up from drowning, then put in the hot Baths, which were extinguished, and she preserved: afterward by famishment in Prison, where they say the was fed at the hand of our Saviour: all which legendary Miracles I leave to the Reader to judge of them as shall seem good unto him. At last the story saith, he was with the Sword beheaded. Antonin. Bergom. Ado.

And because in this present History mention was made of Helenus, whom Antoninus with his Fellows noteth to be the Bishop of Hieropolis, here is to be underfood and observed by the way, that as Philippus in the forefaid History is fally said to be Bishop of Alexandria; so likewise untrue it is, that Helenus was Bishop of Hieropolis. For by Eusebius it appeareth, lib. 7. cap. 5. alledging the words of Dionysius, that he was Bishop of Tarsus, in Cilicia, and had there overlight of that Church from the time of our Lord God, two hundred fifty and four, to the year of our Redemption two hundred seventy and four.

The fixth year of Valerianus and Galienus we read in the History of Herfordiensis, cited out of Ifuardus, of Victor and Victorinus, who lying in Prison the space of three years with Claudianus and Bassa his wife, are said to have sustained great Torments and Martyrdom for the testimony and Name of Christ, Ex Ifuardo.

Aurelius Prudentius, in his Book, Intituled, Peristephanon, inferreth mention of Fructuosus Bishop of Tarracontia in Spain, who, with his two Deacons, Augurius and Eulogius, suffered also Martyrdom, being burned after six days Imprisonment under the foresaid Emperors in his Persecution. The cause of their Punishment was for the Profession of Christs Name; their Judge and Condemner was Emilianus; their Imprisonment endured six days; the kind of death minissired unto them was fire; wherein they being all together set with their Arms bound behind hind them; their Bands (as Prudentius writeth) were dissolved, their Hands untouched with the fire, and their bodies remaining whole. The charge of this Judge unto the Bishop was this, That he should worship the gods whom the Emperor Galienus worshipped. To whom Fructuosus the Bishop answering, Nay (saith he) I worship no dumb god of Stocks and Blocks, whom Galienus doth worship, but I worship the Lord and Master of Galienus, the Father and Creator of all times, and his only Son sent down to us, of whose Flock I am here the Pastor and Shepheard. At this word Emilianus answering again, Nay (saith he) say not thou art, but say thou wast. And forthwith commanded them to be committed to the fire, where (as is said) their bands and manacles being loosed by the fire, they lifted up their hands to Heaven, praising the living God, to the great admiration of them that stood by, praying also that the Element, which seemed to fly from them, might work his full force upon them, and speedily dispatch them; which was after their request obtained. In the mean space, as they were in the fire, there was a certain Souldier in the house of Emilianus, who did see the Heavens above to open, and these foresaid Martyrs to enter into the same, which Souldier likewise shewed the sight the same time unto the Daughter of Emilianus the President, who, beholding the same sight with the Souldier, was a present witness of the blessedness of them whom her cruel Father had condemned.

Fructuosus and his Deacons strengthned in the fire.

The favour of God toward his Martyrs openly declared.

As this godly Bishop was preparing to his death (saith Prudentius) the Brethren approaching to him, brought him drink, desiring him with much weeping to receive and drink with them; but that he refused to do, requiring them moreover to refrain their tears. With like readiness the Brethren alſo were diligent about him to pluck off his shoos and hoſe, as he was addreſſing himſelf to the fire: but neither would he ſuffer any Servants help in that wherein he was no leſs willing than able to help himſelf. And thus this bleſſed and fruitful Bishop Fructuoſus, with his two Deacons Augurius and Eulogius, being brought to the fire, witneſſed the conſtant Confeſſion of the Name of Chriſt with the ſhedding of their blood. *Aurel. And thus far continued wicked Valerian in his tyranny againſt the Saints of Chriſt. But as all the Tyrants before, and Oppreſſors of the Chriſtians had their deſerved reward at the juſt hand of God, which rendreth to every man according to his Works: ſo this cruel Valerian, after he had raigned with his Son Galienus the term of ſix or ſeven years, and about two years had afflicted the Church of Chriſt, felt the juſt ſtroke of his hand, whoſe Indignation before he had provoked, whereof we have to witneſs Eutropius, Pollio, Sabellicus, Volateranus: for making his Expedition againſt the Perſians, whether by the fraud and treaſon of ſome about him, or whether by his own raſhneſs, it is doubtful: but this is certain, that he fell into the hands of his Enemies, being about the age of fourſcore years; where he led his wretched age in a more wretched Captivity. Inſomuch that Sapores the King of the Perſians uſed him (and well worthy) not for his riding-foal, but for his riding-block: for whenſoever the King ſhould light upon his Horſe openly in the ſight of the people, Valerian, Emperor Quondam, was brought forth in ſtead of a block for the King to tread upon his back in going to his horſeback. And ſo continued this blockiſh butcherly Emperor with ſhame and ſport enough unto his final end, as witneſſeth Letus and Aurelius Victor.

Gods puniſhment to be noted.

Albeit Euſebius, in a certain Sermon to the Congregation, declareth a more cruel handling of him, affirming that he was ſlain, writing in theſe words, Sed & ta Valeriane, quoniam eandem homicidiorum ſævitiam erga ſubditos Dei exercuiſti, juſtum Dei judicium declaraſti, dum captivus ac vinctus una cum ipſa purpura ac reliquo Imperatorio ornatu abductus ac tandem a Sapore Perſarum Rege excoriari juſſus ſaleque conditus, perpetuum infelicitatis tuæ tropheum exeriſti, &c. that is, And thou Valerian, for ſo much as thou haſt exerciſed the ſame cruelty in murthering of the Subjects of God, therefore haſt proved unto us the righteous judgment of God, in that thy ſelf haſt been bound in Chains, and carried away for a Captive Slave with thy gorgeous Purple, and thy imperial Attire, and at length alſo, being commanded of Sapores, King of the Perſians to be ſlain and powdered with ſalt, haſt ſet up unto all men a perpetual Monument of thine own wretchedneſs, &c. Euſeb.

The like ſeverity of God his terrible judgment is alſo to be noted in Claudius his Preſident and Miniſter of his Perſecutions. Of which Claudius Hemricus de Erfordia thus writeth, that he was poſſeſſed and vexed of the Devil, in ſuch ſort, that he biting off his own Tongue in many ſmall pieces, ſo ended his life. Erford.

The puniſhment of God upon Claudius, Preſident to the Emperor.

Neither did Galienus the Son of Valerian, after the Captivity of his Father, utterly eſcape the righteous hand of God: for beſide the miſerable captivity of his Father, whom he could not reſcue, ſuch portents ſtrange and out of the courſe of nature, ſuch Earth-quakes did happen; alſo ſuch Tumults, Commotions and Rebellions did follow, that Trebellio doth reckon up to the number of thirty together, which in ſundry places all at one time took upon them to be Tyrants and Emperors over the Monarchy of Rome, by the means whereof he was not able to ſuccour his Father, though he would. Notwithſtanding, the ſaid Galienus, being (as is thought) terrified by the example of his Father, did remove, at leaſt did moderate the Perſecution ſtirred up by the Edicts of Valerian his Father, directing forth his Emperial Proclamation, the tenor whereof proceedeth after this effect, as is to be ſeen in Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 13. Emperor and Cæſar, Publius Licinius, Galienus, Pius, Fortunatus, Auguſtus, unto Dionyſius, to Pinna, and to Demetrian, and to all other the like Biſhops. The bountiful benignity of my gift I have willed and commanded to be proclaimed through the whole World, to the intent that ſuch, which are detained in baniſhment for diſcipline ſake, may ſafely return home again from whence they came, and for the ſame cauſe I have here ſent to you the example of my reſcript for you to peruſe and to enjoy; ſo that no man be ſo hardy to vex or moleſt you; and this, which you may now lawfully enjoy, hath been long ſince by me granted. And therefore for your more warrant in the ſame, I have committed the examplar hereof to the cuſtody of Aurelianus Cirenius my chief Steward, where you may fetch the Copy to ſee at your pleaſure.

Peace granted to the Church.

This Mandate above prefixed did Galienus ſend to Dionyſius Alexandrinus, and other Biſhops, as is premiſed. Another grant of Galienus unto the Chriſtian Biſhops. {Anno 263.}

By this it may appear that ſome peace was granted then under this Galienus to the Church of Chriſt: albeit not ſo, but that ſome there were which ſuffered, of whom was one Marinus mentioned in Euſebius, lib. 7. This Marinus, being a Warrior and a Nobleman in Cæſarea, ſtood for the dignity of a certain order, which by all order of courſe was next to fall upon him by right, had not the envious ambition of him, that ſhould follow next after him, ſupplanted him both of office and life; for he accuſed him to be a Chriſtian, and therefore ſaid that he was not to be admitted unto their offices, which was againſt their Religion. Whereupon Achæus, then being Judge, examined him of his Faith; who finding him to be a Chriſtian indeed, and conſtantly to ſtand to his Profeſſion, gave him three hours to deliberate and adviſe with himſelf. There was the ſame time in Cæſarea a Biſhop named Theotecnus, otherwiſe called Theodiſius, who perceiving him to ſtand in doubtful deliberation and perplexity in himſelf, took him by the hand and brought him into the Houſe or Church of the Chriſtians, laying before him a Sword (which he had under his Cloke for the ſame purpoſe) and a Book of the New Teſtament, and ſo willed him to take his free choice which of them both he would prefer. The Souldier immediately without delay ran to the Book of the Goſpel, taking that before the Sword. And thus, he being animated by the Biſhop, preſented himſelf boldly before the Judge, by whoſe Sentence he was beheaded, and died a Martyr. Euſebius ibidem.

Aſyrius a rich Senator and Conſular.

Of

Of which Aſyrius the ſaid Author writeth moreover this ſtory, How that in the foreſaid City of Cæſarea, the Gentiles uſed thereof an ancient cuſtom to offer up a certain Sacrifice by a Fountain ſide, the which Sacrifice by the working of the Devil was wont ſuddenly to vaniſh out of their eyes, to the great admiration of the Inhabiters by. Aſyrius ſeeing this, and pittying the miſerable error of the ſimple people, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, made his prayer to Almighty God in the name of Chriſt, that the people might not be ſeduced of the Devil any longer: by the vertue of whoſe prayer the Sacrifice was ſeen to ſwim in the water of the Fountain; and ſo the ſtrange wonder of that ſight was taken away, and no ſuch matter could be there wrought any more. Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 17.

And becauſe mention is made here of Cæſarea, there followeth in the next Chapter of the ſame Author a ſtrange Miracle if it be true, which he there reporteth; how that out of the ſame City was the woman which in the Goſpel came to our Saviour, and was healed of her bloody iſſue, her houſe being in the City of Cæſarea. Before the door thereof was ſet up a certain pillar of ſtone, and upon the Pillar an Image was made of braſs, of a woman meekly kneeling on her knees, and holding up her hands as one that had ſome ſuit. Againſt the which there was another Image alſo of a man proportioned of the ſame metal, cunningly engraven in a ſhort ſeemly Veſture, and ſtretching forth his hand to the woman. At the foot of which Pillar grew up a certain herb of a ſtrange kind, for of a more ſtrange operation, which growing up to the hem of his Veſture, and once touching the ſame, is ſaid to have ſuch vertue, that it was able to cure all manner of Diſeaſes. This picture of the man (they ſay) repreſented the Image of Chriſt. The Hiſtory is written in Euſebius, as is ſaid; the credit whereof I refer to the Reader, whether he will think it true or falſe. If he think it falſe, yet I have ſhewed him mine Author: if he think it true, then muſt he think withall that this miraculous operation of the herb proceeded neither by the vertue of the Picture, nor by the prayer of the other, being both dumb Pictures, and ingraven no doubt at that time by the hand of Infidels; but to be wrought by ſome ſecret permiſſion of God his wiſdom, either to reduce the Infidels at that time to the belief of the ſtory, or to admoniſh the Chriſtians to confider with themſelves what ſtrength and health was to be looked for only of Chriſt and no other Advocate; ſeeing the dumb Picture, ingraven in braſs, gave his efficacy to a poor herb to cure ſo many Diſeaſes. This Picture (ſaith Euſebius) remained alſo to his time, which was under Conſtantinus the Great.

As touching the line and order of the Roman Biſhops hitherto intermitted; after the Martyrdom of Xiſtus above ſpecified, the government of that Church was committed next to one Dionyſius, about the year of our Lord two hundred ſixty and ſix: Who continued in the ſame the ſpace of nine years, as Euſebius ſaith; as Damaſus recordeth, but only ſix years and two months. Of his decretal Epiſtles, becauſe ſufficient hath been ſaid before concerning that matter, I omit to ſpeak. After whom ſucceeded Felix in the firſt year of Probus the Emperor, about the year of our Lord two hundred and eighty, who governed that Church five years, and died, as Platina ſaith, a martyr. After him followed Eutychianus, and then Gaius, both Martyrs, as the Hiſtories of ſome do record.

Thus Galienus the forefaid Emperor reigned, as is declared, with his Father Valerian ſeven years, after whoſe Captivity he ruled the Monarchy alone about nine years, with ſome peace and quietneſs granted to the Church.

Euſeb. lib.

The days of this Galienus being expired, followed Claudius a quiet Emperor, as moſt ſtories do record. Although Vincentius affirmeth that he was a mover of Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, and maketh mention of two hundred ſixty and two Martyrs, which in his time did ſuffer; but becauſe no ſuch Record remaineth to be found in Euſebius, who would not have omitted ſome memorial thereof, if it had been true, therefore I refer the ſame to the free judgment of the Reader, to find ſuch credit as it may. This Claudius reigned but two years, after whom came Quintilianus his Brother, next Emperor, and a quiet Prince, who continued but only ſeventeen days, and had to his Succeſſor Aurelianus; under whom Oroſius in his ſeventh Book doth number the ninth Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians.

Quintilianus Emperor.

The ninth Perſecution.

The ninth perſecution. Aurelianus Emperor.

Hitherto from the Captivity of Valerian, the Church of Chriſt was in ſome quietneſs till the death of Quintilianus, as hath been declared; after whom Aurelianus the next Succeſſor poſſeſſed the Crown; who in the firſt beginning of his Reign (after the common manner of all Princes) ſhewed himſelf a Prince moderate and diſcreet, much worthy of commendation, if his good beginning had continued in a conſtant courſe agreeing to the ſame. Of nature he was ſevere, and rigorous in correcting, diſſolute in manners; inſomuch as it was ſaid of him in a vulgar Proverb, That he was a good Phyſician, ſaving that he gave too bitter Medicines. This Emperor being ſick, never ſent for Phyſician, but cured himſelf with abſtinence; and as his beginning was not unfruitful to the Commonwealth, ſo neither was he any great Diſturber of the Chriſtians, whom he did not only tolerate in their Religion, but alſo their Councils; and they being the time time aſſembled at Antioch, he ſeemed not to be againſt them. Notwithſtanding in continuance of time, through ſiniſter motion and inſtigation of certain about him, (as commonly ſuch are never abſent in all places from the ears of Princes) his nature, ſomewhat inclinable to ſeverity, was altered to a plain tyranny; which tyranny firſt he ſhewed, beginning with the death of his own Siſters Son, as witneſſeth Eutropius. After that he proceeded either to move, or at leaſt to purpoſe Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians; albeit that wicked purpoſe of the Emperor the merciful working of God his hand did ſoon overthrow. For as the Edict or Proclamation ſhould have been denounced for the perſecuting of the Chriſtians, and the Emperor now ready to ſubſcribe the Edict with his hand, the mighty ſtroke of the hand of the Lord ſuddenly from above did ſtop his purpoſe, binding, (as a man might ſay) the Emperors hands behind him, declaring (as Euſebius ſaith) to all men, how there is no power to work any violence againſt the Servants of God, unleſs his permiſſion do ſuffer them, and give them leave. Euſeb. lib. 7. cap. 30. Eutropius and Vopiſcus affirm, that as the ſaid Aurelianus was purſuing to raiſe Perſecution againſt us, he was ſuddenly terrified with Lightning, and ſo ſtopped from his wicked tyranny. Not long after, about the fifth or ſixth year of his Reign, he was ſlain between Biſance and Heraclea, in the way of our Lord two hundred ſeventy and eight. Thus Aurelianus rather intended than moved perſecution. Neither is there any more than this found concerning this Perſecution in ancient Hiſtories and Records of the Church: wherefore I marvail the more that Vincentius, collecting out of the Martyrologies, hath comprehended ſuch a great Catalogue of ſo many Martyrs, which in France and in Italy (ſaith he) ſuffered death and torments under this Emperor Aurelianus; whereunto Oroſius alſo ſeemeth to agree in numbring this to be the ninth Perſecution under the faid Aurelian.

Next after Aurelianus the ſucceſſion of the Empire fell to Publius Annius Tacitus, who reigned but ſix months; him ſucceeded his Brother Florianus, who reigned but three-ſcore days; and after him followed Marcus Aurelius, ſirnamed Probus. Of whom more hereafter (God willing) ſhall appear.

Eutropius, Tacitus Emperor. Florianus Emperor.

In the mean time, within the compaſs of theſe Emperors falleth in a ſtory recorded of Euſebius, and not unworthy here to be noted, whereby to underſtand the faithful diligence of good Miniſters, what good it may do in a Common-wealth.

Mention is made before of Euſebius the Deacon of Dionyſius, whom God ſtirred up to viſit and comfort the Saints that were in priſon and bands, and to bury the bodies of the bleſſed Martyrs departed, not without great peril of his own life, who after was made Biſhop (as is ſaid) of Laodicea. But before he came to Laodicea to be Biſhop there, it chanced, the ſaid Euſebius remaining as yet at Alexandria, the City to be beſieged of the Romans, Pyrrochius being their Capitain. In which ſiege half of the City

City did hold with the Romans, the other half withstood them. In that part which went with the Roman Captain was Eusebius, being also in great favour with the Captain for his worthy fidelity and service shewed: with the other half that resisted the Romans was Anatholius Governor or Moderator then of the School of Alexandria, who also was Bishop, after the said Eusebius, of Laodicea. This Anatholius, perceiving the Citizens to be in miserable distress of Famine and Destruction, by reason of penury and lack of sustenance, sendeth to Eusebius being then with the Romans, and certifieth him of the lamentable penury and peril of the City, instructing him moreover what to do in the matter: Eusebius, understanding the case, repaireth to the Captain, desiring of him so much favour, that so many as would fly out of the City from their Enemies, might be licensed to escape and freely to pass, which was to him effoons granted. As Eusebius was thus labouring with the Captain; on the other side Anatholius for his part laboured with the Citizens, moving them to assemble together, and perswading them to give themselves over, in yielding to the force and might of the Romans. But when the Citizens could not abide the hearing thereof; Yet (said Anatholius) with this I truth you will be contented if I shall counsel you in this miserable lack of things to avoid out of your City all such superfluities and unnecessary Impediments unto you, as old Women, young Children, aged Men, with such other as be feeble and impotent, and not suffer them here to perish with famine, whose presence can do no stead to you if they die, and less if they live, for spending the Victuals which otherwise might serve them that be more able to defend the City. The Senate hearing this Sentence, and understanding moreover the grant of the Captain promising them their safety, were well consenting thereunto. Then Anatholius having a special care to them that belonged to the Church of Christ, calleth them together with the rest of the multitude, and perswading them what they should do, and what had been obtained for them, caused them to void the City, and not only them, but also a great number of other more; who perswaded by him under that pretence, changing themselves in women Apparel, or faining some impotency, so escaped out of the City. At whose coming out, Eusebius on the other side was ready to receive them, and refreshed their hungry and pined bodies, whereby not only they, but the whole City of Alexandria was preserved from destruction. Eusebius The piety of Anatholius and Eusebius to their County.

By this little History of Eusebius and Anatholius, described in the seventh Book of Eusebius, cap. 32. and briefly here set forth to thee (gentle Reader) thou mayst partly understand the practise of the Prelates, what it was in those days in the Church, which was then only employed in saving of life, and succouring the Common weals wherein they lived, as by these two godly persons Eusebius and Anatholius may well appear. Unto the which practise if we compare the practice of our later Prelates of the Church of Rome, I suppose no little difference will appear.

Marcus Aurelius Probus Emperor.

The next Emperor to Florianus (as is said) was Marcus Aurelius Probus, a Prince both wise and vertuous, and no less valiant in martial Affairs, than fortunate in the successe of the same. During his time we read of no Persecution greatly stirring in the Church, but much quietness as well in matters of Religion, as also in the Commonwealth. Insomuch that, after his great and many Victories, such peace insued, that his saying was, There needed no more Souldiers, seeing there were no more Enemies to the Common-wealth to fight against. It was his saying also, That his Souldiers need not to spend Corn and Victual, except they laboured to serve the Common-wealth. And for the same cause he caused his Souldiers to be set a work about certain Mountains in Smyrna and in Messia to be planted with Vines, and not so much as in Winter suffered them to be at rest; therefore by them at length he was slain, after he had reigned the space of six years and four months, in the year of our Lord two hundred eighty and four, Europ.

The saying of Marcus Aurelius.

Souldiers brought up in idleness can abide no labour. Marcus Aurelius slain.

An. 284. Carus with his two sons Carinus and Numerianus Emperors. Carus Emperor slain with lightning.

Carus, with his two Sons Carinus and Numerianus, succeeded next after Probus in the Empire: the Reign of which Emperors continued in all but three years. Of the which Three first Carus, warring against the Persians, was slain with Lightning. Of Numerianus his Son, being with his Father in his Wars against the Persians, we find much Commendation in Eutropius, Vopiscus, and other Writers, which testified him to be a valiant Warrior, and an eloquent Orator, as appeared by his Declamations and Writings sent to the Senate; thirdly, to be an excellent Poet. This Numerianus, sorrowing and lamenting for the death of his Father, through immoderate weeping fell into a great soreness of his eyes; by reason whereof he keeping close was slain not long after of his Father in law, named Aper; who, traytorously aspiring to the Empire, dissembled his death with a false excuse to the people asking for him, saying, For the pain of his eyes he kept in from the wind and weather, till at length by the stinch of his body being carried about, his death was uttered.

In the life this Emperor Carus aforesaid, written by Eutropius in the later Edition set forth, by Frobenius, I find (which in other Editions of Eutropius doth not appear) that Numerianus, the Son of this Carus, was he that slew Babylas the holy Martyr, whose History before we have comprehended. But that seemeth not to be like, both by the Narration of Chrysostome, and also for that Urspergensis declaring the same History, and in the same words, as it is in Eutropius, saith that it was Cyrillus whom Numerianus killed, the Story whereof is this: What time Carus the Emperor, in his Journey going toward the Persians, remained at Antioch, Numerianus his Son would enter into the Church of the Christians, to view and behold their Mysteries. But Cyrillus their Bishop would in no wise suffer him to enter into the Church, saying, That it was not lawful for him to see the Mysteries of God, who was polluted with Sacrifices of Idols. Numerianus full of indignation at the hearing of these words, not suffering that repulse at the hands of Cyrillus, in his fury did slay the godly Martyr. And therefore justly (as it seemed) was he himself slain afterward by the hands of Aper.

Corruption through much peace and prosperity crept into the Church.

Cyrillus Bishop of Antioch slain.

Thus Carus with his Son Numerianus being slain in the East parts, as is declared, Carinus the other Son reigned alone in Italy; where he overcame Sabinus striving for the Empire, and reigned there with much wickedness, till the returning home of the Army again from the Persians, who then set up Diocletian to be Emperor; by whom the foresaid Carinus for the wickedness of his life, being forsaken of his Host, was overcome, and at length slain with the hand of the Tribune, whose wife before he had defloured. Thus Carus with his two Sons, Numerinus and Carinus, ended their lives, whose Reign continued not above three years.

Carinus Emperor slain. Carinus Adultery punished.

All this mean space we read of no great Persecution stirring in the Church of Christ, but it was in mean quiet state and tranquility, unto the nineteenth year of the Reign of Diocletian; so that in counting the time from the latter end of Valerian unto this aforesaid year of Diocletian, the peace of the Church, which God gave to his people, seemeth to continue above four and forty years. During the which time of peace and tranquility, the Church of the Lord did mightily increase and flourish, so that the more bodies it lost by Persecution, the more honour and reverence it won daily among the Gentiles in all quarters, both Greeks and barbarous; insomuch that (as Eusebius in his seventh Book describeth) amongst the Emperors themselves, divers there were which not only bare singular good will and favour to them of our Profession, but also did commit unto them Offices and Regiments over Countries and Nations, so well were they affected to the Christine, that they priviledged the same with liberty and indemnity. What needeth to speak of them which not only lived under the Emperors in liberty; but also were familiar in the Court with the Princes themselves, intertained with great honour and special favour beyond the other Servitors of the Court? As was Dorotheus, with his Wife, Children, and whole Family, highly accepted and advanced in the Palace of the Emperor; also Gorgonius in like manner with divers others more, who, for their Doctrine and Learning which they professed, were with their Princes in great estimation. In like reverence also were the Bishops of Cities and Dioceses with the Presidents and Rulers where they lived: who not only suffered them to live in peace, but also had them in great price and regard, so long as they kept themselves upright, and continued in God his favour. Who is able to number at that time the mighty and innumerable multitudes and Congregations assembling together in every City, and the notable concourses of such as daily flocked to the common Oratories to pray? For the which cause they, being not able to be contained in their old houses, had large and great Churches, new builded from the foundation, for them to frequent together. In such increasement (saith Eusebius) by process of time did the Church of Christ grow and shoot up daily more and more, profiting and spreading through all quarters, which neither envy of men could infringe, nor any devil could enchant, neither the crafty policy of mans wit could supplant, so long as the protection of God his heavenly arm went with his people, keeping them in good order, according to the rule of Christian life.

But as commonly the nature of all men, being of it self unruly and untoward, always seeketh and desireth prosperity, and yet can never well use prosperity; always would have peace, and yet having peace always abuseth the same: so here likewise it happned with these men, which through this so great liberty and prosperity of life began to degenerate and languish unto idleness and delicacy, and one to work spite and contumely against another, striving and contending amongst themselves, for every occasion, with railing words after most despiteful manner; Bishops against Bishops, and people against people, moving hatred and sedition one against another, besides also cursed hypocrisie and simulation with all extremity increasing more and more. By reason whereof the judgment of God after his wonted manner (whilst yet the congregation began to multiply) began by a little and a little to visit our men with Persecution, falling first upon our Brethren, which were abroad in warfare; but when that touch the other nothing or very little, neither did they seek to appease Gods wrath and call for his mercy; but wickedly thinking with our selves, that God neither regarded nor would visit our transgressions, we heaped our iniquities daily more and more one upon another; and they which seemed to be our Pastors, refusing the rule of piety, were inflamed with mutual contentions one against another. And thus whilst they were given only to the study of contentions, threatnings, emulations, mutual hatred and discord, every man seeking his own ambition, and persecuting one another after the manner of tyranny: then, then, I say, the Lord according to the voice of Jeremy, took away the beauty of the Daughter of Sion, and the glory of Israel fell down from Heaven, neither did he remember the footstool of his feet in the day of his wrath. And the Lord overturned all the comely ornaments of Israel, and destroyed all her gorgeous buildings, and according to the saying of the Psalm, subverted and extinguished the Testament of his servant, and prophaned his Sanctuary in destruction of his Churches, and in laying waste the buildings thereof, so that all passengers spoiling the multitude of the people, they were made an obloquie to all the dwellers about. For he exalted the strength of his enemies, and turned away the help of his sword from her, nor aided her in the battel, but ceased from the purging of her and her seat. He stroke down to the ground, and diminished her days, and over all this poured upon her confusion. All these things were fulfilled upon us, when we saw the Temples raced from the top to the ground, and the Sacred Scriptures to be burnt in the open market-place, and the Pastors of the Church to hide themselves, some here, some there; some other, taken prisoners with great shame, were mocked of their enemies, when also according to the saying of the Prophet in another place, Contempt was poured out upon the Princes, and they caused to go out of the way, and not to keep the straight path.

Hatred and division among the Churchmen.

Christians persecuting one another

The Tenth Persecution.

The Tenth Persecution.

Diocletian Emperor. Ran. Vigil.

BY reason whereof (the wrath of God being kindled against his Church) ensued the Tenth and last Persecution against the Christians, so horrible and grievous, that it maketh the Pen almost to tremble to write upon it; so tedious that never was any Persecution before or since comparable to it for the time it continued, lasting the space of ten years together. This Persecution although it passed through the hands of divers Tyrants and workers more than one or two, yet principally it beareth the name of Diocletian, who was Emperour, as is above noted, next after Carus and Numerianus. This Diocletian, ever having an ambitious mind, aspired greatly to be Emperour. To whom Dryas his Concubine said, That first he should kill fesc't at these words, used much with hands to kill wild Boars: but seeing no success to come thereof, he used this Proverb, Ego apros occido, alius pulpamenta fruitur, that is, I kill the Boars, but others do eat the flesh. At length the said Diocletian being nominated to be Emperour, and seeing Aper (who had killed Numerianus the Emperour) standing thereby, sware to the Souldiers that Numerianus was wrongfully killed, and forthwith running upon Aper with his sword slew him: Vopisc. After this, he being stablished in the Empire, and seeing on every side divers and sundry commotions rising up against him, which he was not well able himself to sustain, in the first beginning of his reign he choseth for his Colleague Maximianus, Surnamed Herculius, Father of Maxentius. Which two Emperours, because of divers Wars that rose in many Provinces, chose to them two other Noblemen, Galerius and Constantius, whom they called Cesars. Of whom Galerius was sent into the East parts against the Persians. Constantius was sent over to Britain, to this our Country of England, to recover the tribute, where he took to Wife Helena the Daughter of King Coill, which was a Maiden excelling in beauty, and no less famously brought up in the study of learning, of whom was born Constantinus the Great.

An. 290. Maximianus Herculius, fellow Emperor with Diocletian.

Galerius Constantius, Cesars, under Diocletian and Maximian.

Helena Daughter of Coil, married to Constantius.

All this while hitherto no Persecution was yet stirred of these four Princes against the Church of Christ, but quietly and moderately they governed the Commonwealth; wherefore accordingly God prospered their doings and affairs, and gave them great Victories: Diocletian in Egypt, Maximian in Africk, and in France, Galerius in Persia, Constantius in England, and in France also. By reason of which Victories, Diocletian and Maximian puft up in pride, ordained a solemn Triumph at Rome, after which Triumph Diocletian gave commandment that he should be worshipped as God, saying, that he was brother to the Sun and Moon, and adorning his shoos with gold and precious stones, commanded the people to kiss his feet.

Pride in the Diocletian.

And not long after by the judgment of God, for certain enormities used in the Church, above touched, began the great and grievous Persecution of the Christians, moved by the outrageous cruelty of Diocletian, which was about the Nineteenth year of his reign, who in the Month of March, when the Feast of Easter was nigh at hand, commanded all the Churches of the Christians to be spoiled and cast to the earth, and the Books of holy Scripture to be burned.

An. 302. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 2. Persecutions against the Christians.

Cruelty following upon.

Thus most violent Edicts and Proclamations were set forth, for the overthrowing, as is said, of the Christians Temples throughout all the Roman Empire. Neither did there want in the Officers any cruel execution of the same Proclamations. For their Temples were defaced even when they celebrated the Feast of Easter, Euseb. Lib. 8. Cap. 2. And this was the first Edict given out by Diocletian. The next Proclamation that came forth, was for the burning of the Books of the Holy Scripture; which thing was done in the open Market-place as before: then next unto that were Edicts given forth for the displacing of such as were Magistrates, and that with great ignominy, and all other whosoever bear any office, imprisoning such as were of the common sort, if they would not abjure Christianity, and subscribe to the Heathen Religion: Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 4. Zonaras also in his second Tome. And these were the beginning of the Christians evils.

Christian Temples destroyed. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 2.

Books of the Scriptures burned.

Christian Magistrates displaced. Christian subjects imprisoned. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & Nicephor. lib. 7. cap. 4. Zonaras Tom. 2.

It was not long after but that new Edicts were sent forth, nothing for their cruelty inferior to the first: for the casting of the Elders and Bishops into prison, and then constraining them with sundry kinds of punishments to offer unto their Idols. By reason whereof ensued a great persecution amongst the Governours of the Church, amongst whom many stood manfully, passing through many exceeding bitter torments, neither were overcome therewith, being tormented and examined divers of them diversly, some scourged all their bodies over with whips and scourges, some with sacks and rasings of the flesh intolerable were cruciated, some one way, some another way put to death. Some again violently were drawn to the unpure sacrifice, and as though they had sacrificed, when indeed they did not, were let go. Other some neither coming at all to their Altars, nor touching any piece of their sacrifices, yet were born in hand of them that flood by, that they had sacrificed, and so suffering that false infamation of their enemies quietly went away. Other, as dead men, were carried and cast away being but half dead. Some they cast down upon the Pavement, and trailing them a great space by the legs, made the people believe that they had sacrificed. Furthermore, other there were which stoutly withstood them, affirming with a loud voice that they had done no such sacrifice. Of whom some said they were Christians, and gloried in the profession of that name: some cried, saying, that neither they had nor would ever be partakers of that Idolatry: and those, being buffeted on the face and mouth with the hands of the Souldiers, were made to hold their peace, and so thrust out with violence. And if the Saints did seem never so little to do what the enemies would have them, they were made much of: albeit all this purpose of the adverfary did nothing prevail against the holy and constant fervants of Christ. Notwithstanding, of the weak fort innumerable there were, which for fear and infirmity fell and gave over, even at the first brunt.

The noble courage and constancy of a christian Martyr.

At the first coming down of these Edicts into Nicomedia, there chanced a deed to be done much worthy of memory, of a Christian, being a noble man born; which moved by the zeal of God, after the Proclamation made at Nicomedia was set up, by and by ran and took down the fame, and openly tare and rent it in pieces, not fearing the presence of the two Emperors, then being in the City. For which act he was put to a most bitter death, which death he with great faith and constancy endured even to the last gasp. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & 5.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3, 4.

After this the furious rage of the malignant Emperors, being let loose against the Saints of Christ, proceeded more and more, making havock of Gods people throughout all quarters of the world. First, Diocletian (which had purposed with himself to subvert the whole Christian Religion) executed his Tyranny in the East, and Maximianus in the West. But wily Diocletian began very subtilly; for he put the matter first in practise in his own Camp, among whom the Marshal of the field (as Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 4. affirmeth) put the Christian Souldiers to this choise, whether they would obey the Emperors commandment in that manner of sacrifice he commanded, and so both to keep their offices, and lead their bands, or else to lay away from them their armour and weapons. Whereunto the Christian men couragiously answered, that they were not only ready to lay away their armour and weapons, but also to suffer death, if it should with tyranny be enforced upon them, rather than they would obey the wicked decrees and commandments of the Emperor.

Perfecution first begining in the Emperors Camp.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 4.

A notable Religion and faith in Souldiers.

There might a man have seen very many which were desirous to live a simple and poor life, and which regarded no estimation and honour in comparison of true piety and godliness. And this was no more but a subtil and wily flattery in the beginning, to offer them to be at their own liberty, whether they would willingly abjure their profession or not; as also this was another, that in the beginning of the Persecution, there were but a few tormented with punishment, but afterward by little and little he began more manifestly to burst out into persecution. It can hardly be expressed with words what number of Martyrs, and what blood was shed throughout all Cities and Regions for the name of Christ. Eusebius in his Eighth Book, and seventh Chapter saith, that he himself knew the worthy Martyrs that were in Palestina. But in Tyre of Phenicia he declareth, in the fame, a marvellous Martyrdom made, where certain Christians being given to most cruel wild Beasts, were preserved without hurt of them, to the great admiration of the beholders; and those Lions, Bears, and Leopards (kept hungry for that purpose) had no desire to devour them: which notwithstanding most vehemently raged against those by whom they were brought into the Stage, who standing as they thought without danger of them, were first devoured. But the Christian Martyrs, because they could not be hurt of the Beasts, being slain with the sword, were afterward thrown into the Sea. At that time was martyred the Bishop of Sidon. But Sylvanus the Bishop of Gaza, with nine and thirty others were slain in the Metal-mines of Phenicia. Pamphilus the Elder of Cæsarea, being the glory of that Congregation, died a most worthy Martyr; whose both life and most commendable Martyrdom, Eusebius oftentimes declareth in his Eighth Book, and thirteenth Chapter, inforuach that he hath written the same in a Book by it self. In Syria all the chief Teachers of the Congregation were first committed to prison, as a most heavy and cruel spectacle to behold; as also the Bishops, Elders, and Deacons, which all were efteemed as men-killers, and perpetrators of most wicked facts. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 6. After that we read of another whose name was Tirannion, which was made meat for the Fishes of the Sea, and of Zenobius which was a very good Physician, which also was slain with Brickbats in the same place. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 7.

Furthermore, he maketh mention in the same place of others which were not tormented to death, but every day terrified and feared without ceasing: of some others that were brought to the sacrifices, and commanded to do sacrifice, which would rather thrust their right hand into the fire, than touch the prophane or wicked sacrifice; also of some others, that before they were apprehended, would cast down themselves from steep places, left that being taken they should commit any thing against their profession. Also of two Virgins very fair and proper, with their Mother also, which had studiously brought them up, even from their infancy in all godliness, being long fought for, and at the last found, and strictly kept by their Keepers; who, whilst they made their excuse to do that which nature required, threw themselves down headlong into a River: also of other two young Maidens being Sisters, and of a worthipful flock, indued with many goodly vertues, which were caft of Perfecutors into the Sea; and these things were done at Antioch, as Eusebius in his eighth Book, and thirteenth Chapter affirmeth. But Sylvanus the Bishop of Emissa, the notable Martyr together with certain others was thrown to the Wild Beasts, Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Divers and sundry torments were the Christians in Mesopotamia molested with; where they were hanged up by the feet, and their heads downwards, and with the smoke of a small fire strangled; and allo in Cappadocia, where the Martyrs had their legs broken: Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 12.

Martyred Theotecnus, Thonas, Probus, Andronicus, Martyrs. Martyrs of Pontus.

Henricus de Erfordia maketh mention of the Martyrs of Tharsus in Cilicia, as Tharatus, Probus and Andronicus: but yet the Martyrs in the Region of Pontus suffered far more passing and sharper torments, whereof I will hereafter make mention, Eusebius ibid. So outragious was the beginning of the Persecution which the Emperor made in Nicomedia in Bithinia, as before is said, that he refrained not from the slaughter of the Children of Emperors, neither yet from the slaughter of the most chief Princes of his Court, whom a little before he made as much of, as if they had been his own Children. Such another was Peter, which among divers and sundry torments (among whom he being naked, was lifted up, his whole body being fo beaten with Whips and torn, that a man might see the bare bones; and after they had mingled Vinegar and Salt together, they poured it upon the most tender parts of his body, and lastly, roasted him at a soft fire, as a man would roast flesh to eat) as a victorious Martyr ended his life. Dorotheus and Gorgonius, being in a great Authority and Office under the Emperor, after divers torments were strangled with a Halter: both which being of the Privy Chamber to him, when they saw and beheld the grievous punishment of Peter their houthold companion, Wherefore (say they) O Emperor, do you punish in Peter that opinion which is in all us? Why is this accounted in him an offence, that we all confess? We are of that faith, religion, and judgment that he is of. Therefore he commanded them to be brought forth, and almoft with like pains to be tormented as Peter was, and afterwards hanged. Euseb. Ruffin. lib. 8. cap. 6. After whom Anthimus the Bishop of Nicomedia, after he had made a notable Confession, bringing with him a great company of Martyrs, was beheaded. These men being thus dispatched, the Emperor vainly thought that he might cause the reft to do whatever him lifted. To this end came Lucianus the Elder of the Congregation of Antioch, and was martyred, after he had made his Apology before the Emperor. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Religion: so much did the rage of Perfecution utterly forget all natural affects. Other Martyrs of Nicomedia doth Nicephorus in his Seventh Book, and fourteenth Chapter recite, as Eutropius and Eulampius. Agape, Irene, Chionia, and Anathasia, who under Hyerius, chief Officer, were bound hand and foot to a post and burnt. Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 66. and also Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 6. mentioneth such another like matter full of horror and grief. There assembled together in their Temple many Christian men to celebrate the memory of the Nativity of Christ, of every age and fort some. There Maximianus thinking to have been given a very fit occasion to execute his tyranny upon the poor Christians, sent thither such as should burn the Temple; the doors being thut and closed round about, thither come they with fire, but first they commanded the Cryer with a loud voice to cry, That whosoever would have life should come out of the Temple, and do sacrifice upon the next altar of Jupiter; they came to; and unless they would do this they should all be burnt with the Temple. Then one stepping up in the Temple, answered in the name of all the reft with great courage and boldness of mind, that they were all Christians, and believed that Christ was their only God and King, and that they would do sacrifice to him, with his Father, and the Holy Ghost; and that they were now all ready to offer unto him. With these words the fire was kindled and compassed about the Temple, and there were burnt of men, women and children, certain thousands. There were also in Arabia very many Martyrs slain with axes, as Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 12. There was in Phrygia a City, unto which the Emperor sent his Edicts, that they should do sacrifice to the Gods, and worship Idols; all which Citizens, the Mayor himself, the Questor, and chief Captain, confessed that they were all Christians. The City upon this was belieged and set on fire, and all the people. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 11. In Melitina a Region of Armenia, the Bishops and Elders were cast in prison. Euseb. eodem cap. 6. In Arabrace a Region near adjoyning to Armenia, Eustratius was martyred, as Nicephorus declareth, Lib. 7. cap. 14. This Eustratius was that Countryman born, and very skilful in the Greek Tongue executing by the Emperors commandment the Sheriffs Office at Licia in the East, which also did execution there upon the Christians, and was a Scribe of great eftimation, called Ordinis Ducalis. This man beholding the marvellous constancy of the Martyrs, thirsted with the desire of Martyrdom, for that he had privily learned the Christian Religion. Therefore he not abiding for other accusers, detected himself, and worthily profested that he was a Christian, openly execrating the madness and vanity of the wicked Ethnicks. He therefore being carried away, was tyed up, being first most bitterly beaten. After that he was parched with fire being put unto his bowels, and then bafted with falt and vinegar, and lastly fo scorched and brangled with the shards of sharp and cutting shels, that his whole body seemed to be all one continual wound; howbeit, by Gods great goodness, afterward it was reftored to the first integrity. After this he was carried away to Sebastia, where with his companion Orestes he was burnt. At that time also suffered Eugenius, Aurentius, Mardarius. Nicephib. 7. cap. 14. And in no less wife raged this perfecution throughout all Egypt, where Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13. maketh mention of Peleus and Nilus Martyrs and Bishops in Egypt. But at Alexandria especially were declared most notable conflicts of Christian and true confirmed Martyrs that suffered; which Phileas the Bishop of Thumitan doth describeth, as after (God willing) shall be declared. In this Perfecution of Alexandria, the principal that then suffered was Peter the Bishop of Alexandria, with the Elders of the same, most worthy Martyrs: as Faustus, Didius, and Ammonius, also Phileas, Hesichius, Pachimius, and Theodorius; which all were Bishops of the Congregations within Egypt, and besides them many other both famous and singular men. The whole Legion of Christian Souldiers, which lay at Thebes in Egypt, under the Christian Captain Mauritius, when they would not obey the Emperors commandment touching the worshipping of Images, were tythed to death once, and then again: and at last, through the exhortation of Maurititius, died all together like constant Martyrs. Vincentius in Speculo, lib. 13. cap. 2. Likewise at Antino divers Christian Souldiers, notwithstanding they were seriously diftwaded, suffered death together, among whom were Asela, Philemon, and Apollonius, Ibidem cap. 50. And also in the other parts of Africa, and Mauritania, was great Perfecution, as Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 6. Also in Sammnium, of which place Chronicon maketh mention, and Sicilia, where were seventy nine Martyrs slain for the profession of Christ. Elenc. de Lerfordia.

The Perfecution in Europe, Eupheme, Martyr.

Now let us come unto Europe: Nicephorus in his Seventh Book, and fourteenth Chapter saith, that at Nicopolis in Thracia, the Martyrs were in most miserable and pitiful wife handled, where Lisias had the execution thereof. In Chalcedon suffered Euphemia under Briseus the Proconful. Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 77.

Henricus de Erfordia faith, that at Rome, Joannes and Crispus being Priests, had the execution of Martyrs. And at Bohemia, Agricola and Vitalis. Vincent lib. 12. cap. 49. And at Aquileia the Emperor commanded every man to kill the Christians. Vincent. lib. eodem cap. 58. And among those Martyrs he maketh mention of Felices and Fortunatus. Regimus also writeth that in other places of Italy the Perfecution became great, as at Florentia, Pergamus, Naples, Campania, Benevventus, at Venusi in Apulia, and in Thuscie. Henricus de Erfordia faith, also at Verona. In France doubtless Rectinarus appointed to that office, played the cruel Hellhound, of whole great cruelty against the Christians many Hiftories are full. At Medicolanum suffered Victor. And at Massilia, Maximianus set forth his Decree, that either they should all do sacrifice unto the Gods of the Gentiles, or else be all slain with divers kinds of torments. Therefore many Martyrs there died for the glory of Christ. Antoninus & Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 2. In Belsacia suffered Lucian.

Vincentius and Regimus write of many places in Spain, where was great Perfecution, as at Emerita, where suffered Eulalius, of whom more followeth hereafter; and Adula, where also suffered Vincentius, Sabina, and Christina. At Toletum suffered Leucadia the Virginal Cesarea Augusta, where were put to death eighteen, besides a great number of other Martyrs which suffered under Decianus the Governour, which afflicted with Perfecution all the Coasts of Spain, as faith Vincent. lib. 13. cap. 123, 124, 128, 130, 134. The forefaid Rectinarus made fuch Perfecution at Trevers near the river of Mofella, that the Blood of the Christian men that were flain ran like fmall Brooks, and coloured great and main rivers. Neither yet did this fuffice him, but from thence he fent certain Horfemen with his Letters, commanding them to ride into every place, and charge all fuch as had taken and apprehended any Christians, that they fhould immediately put them to death. Vincentius lib. 13. cap. 136.

Agrippina, Augusta, Martyrs.

The Perfecution of Britonny, or England.

Beda also faith, that this Perfecution reached even unto the Britans, in his Book, De ratione temporum. And the Chronicle of Martinus, and the Nofegay of Time do declare, that all the Christians in Britany were utterly destroyed. Furthermore, that the kinds of death and punishment were fo great and horrible, as no mans tongue is able to express. In the beginning, when the Emperor by his subtility and wiliness rather dallied than fhewed his rigor, he threatned them with bands and imprifonment; but within a while, when he began to work the matter in good earneft, he devifed innumerable forts of torments and punishments, as whippings, and fcourgings, rackings, horrible fcrapings, fword, fire and fhipboats, wherein a great number being put were funk and drowned in the bottom of the Sea. Euf. l. 8. c. 6. & 7. Alfo hanging, them upon Groffes, binding them to the bodies of dead Trees, with their heads downward, hanging them by the middles upon Gallows, till they died for hunger; throwing them alive to fuch kind of wild Beafts as would devour them; as Lions, Bears, Leopards, and wild Bulls. Euf. l. 8. c. 8. Pricking and thrufting them in with bodkins and talents of Beafts till they were almoft dead; lifting them up on high with their heads downward, even as in Thebaide they did unto the women being naked and unclothed, one of their feet tyed and lifted on high, and fo hanging down with their bodies, which thing fo fee was very pitiful; with other devifed forts of punishments moft tragical, or rather tyrannical and pitiful to defcribe: As firft, the binding of them to Trees, and to the boughs thereof; the pulling and tearing afunder of their

But in Pontus, other horrible puniſhments; and fearful to be heard, did the Martyrs of Chriſt ſuffer ; of which ſome had their fingers ends under the nails thruſt in with ſharp bodkins ; ſome all to beſprinkled with boiling lead, having their moſt neceſſary members cut from them ; ſome other ſuffering moſt filthy, intolerable, and undurable torments and pains in their bowels and privy members. Euſeb. eodem cap. 12.

Perſecution in Pontus.

Perſecution in Alexandria.

To conclude, how great the outrage of the Perſecution which reigned in Alexandria was,and with how many and ſundry kinds of new deviſed puniſhments the Martyrs were afflicted,Phileas the Biſhop of the Thumitani, a man ſingularly well learned,hath deſcribed in his Epiſtle to the Thumitans,the Copy whereof,*Euſeb.*hath,l.8. c.10. out of the which we mean here briefly to recite ſomewhat. Becauſe (ſaith he) every man might torment the holy Martyrs as they liſted themſelves, ſome beat them with cudgels, ſome with rods, ſome with whips, ſome with thongs, and ſome with cords ; and this example of beating was in ſundriwiſe executed, and with much cruelty. For ſome of them having their hands bound behind their backs,were lifted up upon timber logs,and with certain inſtruments their members and ſomts were ſtretched forth,whereupon their whole bodies hanging were ſubject to the will of the tormentors, who were commanded to afflict them with all manner of torments, and not on their ſides only (like as homicides were) but upon their belliers,thighs and legs, they ſcratched them with the talons and claws of wild beaſts. Some others were ſeen to hang by one hand upon the Engin, whereby they might feel the more grievous pulling out of the reſt of their joints and members. Some others were in ſuch ſort bound unto pillars with their faces turned to the wall, having no ſtay under their feet,and were violently weighed down with the poiſe of their bodies.,that by reaſon of their ſtrict binding,they being drawn out might be more grievouſly tormented. And this ſuffered they, not only during the time of their examination, and while the Sheriff had to do with them,but alſo the whole day long. And whilſt the Judge went thus from one to another, he by his authority appointed certain Officers to attend upon thoſe he left, that they might not be let down, until either through the intolerableneſs of the pain, or by the extremity of cold, they being near the point of death ſhould be let down,and ſo were they haled upon the ground. And further they were commanded that they ſhould ſhew not ſo much as one ſpark of mercy or compaſſion upon us, but ſo extremely and furiouſly did they deal with us,as though our ſouls and bodies ſhould have died together. And therefore yet another torment our adverſaries deviſed, to augment our former plagues. After that they had moſt lamentably beaten them, they deviſed moreover a new kind of rack, wherein they being upright were ſtretched by both the feet above the fourth ſtep or hole with ſharp feels or ſhares ſtrewed under them, after a ſtrange kind of Engin to us here unknown. Otherſome were caſt down upon the pavement, where they were oppreſſed ſo thick, and ſo grievouſly with torments, that it is not almoſt to be thought what afflictions they ſuffered.

Euſeb. lib.8. cap.10.

Strange kinds of torments.

Thus they lying in pains and torments,ſome died therewith not a little ſhaming and confounding their enemies by their ſingular patience. Some half dead and half alive, were thruſt into priſon, where ſhortly after by pains and wounds of their bodies they ended their bitter life. Some again being cured of their wounds by their endurance in priſon,were more confirmed, who being put to the choice whether they would come to their curſed ſacrifice,and enjoy their wicked liberty, or elſe ſuſtain the ſentence of death, did willingly and without delay abide the extremity, remembring with themſelves what is written in the Scriptures : He that ſacrificeth (ſaith he) to ſtrange gods, ſhall be exterminated, &c. Item, Thou ſhalt have no ſtrange gods beſides me, &c. Thus much wrote Phileas to the Congregation where he was Biſhop,before he received the ſentence of death,being yet in bands ; and in the ſame he exhorteth his brethren conſtantly to perſiſt after his death, in the truth of Chriſt profeſſed. Euſeb.lib. 8. *cap.*10.

Sabellicus in his Seventh Enead, and Eighth Book: ſaith that that Chriſtened man which tore and pulled down the wicked Edict of the Emperor in Nicomedia, being ſtript and beaten that the bones appeared, and after waſhed in ſalt and vinegar, was then ſlain with this cruel kind of torment. But Platina writeth that Dorotheus and Gorgonius exhorted him to die ſo conſtantly.

An holy Martyr of Nicomedia tormented.

But as all their torments were for their horribleneſs marvellous and notable, and therewithal ſo ſtudiouſly deviſed, and no leſs grievous and ſharp ; ſo notwithſtanding, there, with were theſe Martyrs neither diſmaid nor overcome, but rather thereby confirmed and ſtrengthened ; ſo merrily and joyfully ſuſtained they whatſoever was put unto them. Euſebius faith, that he himſelf beheld and ſaw the huge and great Perſecution that was done in Thebaide ; inſomuch that the very ſwords of the Hangmen and Perſecutors being blunt with the great and often ſlaughter, they themſelves for wearineſs ſat down to reſt them, and others were fain to take their places. And yet all this notwithſtanding the murthered Chriſtians ſhewed their marvellous readineſs, willingneſs and divine fortitude, which they were endued with ; with ſtout courage, joy, and ſmiling, receiving the ſentence of death pronounced upon them, and ſing even unto the laſt gaſp, Hymns and Pſalms to God. So did alſo the Martyrs of Alexandria, as witneſſeth Phileas above mentioned. The holy Martyrs (ſaith he) keeping Chriſt in their minds, being led with the love of better rewards, ſtained not only at one time whatſoever labour and deviſed puniſhments they had to lay upon them ; but now alſo the ſecond time have done the ſame, and have born all the menaces of the cruel Souldiers, not only in words wherewith they threatned them, but alſo whatſoever in deed and work they could deviſe to their deſtruction, and that with moſt manly ſtomacks, excluding all fear, with the perfection of their unſpeakable love towards Chriſt, whoſe great ſtrength and fortitude cannot by words be expreſſed. And Sulpitius faith in the Second Book of his Sacred Hiſtory, that then the Chriſtians with more greedy deſire, preſſed and fought for Martyrdom, than now they do deſire Biſhopricks.

Euſebius & beholders and a vaſt multitude of them ſuffering.

The ſeverie blunt, and the ſlaughtmen exaſperated with ſlaughter.

The marvelous conſtancy of the Martyrs of God in perſecution, and at the time of death.

Although ſome there were alſo, as I have ſaid, that with fear and threatnings, and by their own infirmities were overcome and went back, *Euſeb.lib.*8. *cap.*4. among whom Serotas nameth Miletius, *Lib.*1. *cap.*6. and Athanaſius in his ſecond Apology, nameth the Biſhop of Licus, a City in little Egypt, whom Peter the Biſhop of Alexandria Excommunicated, for that in this Perſecution he ſacrificed unto the Gentiles gods. Of the faſt of Marcellinus, the Biſhop of Rome, I will ſpeak afterwards ; for he being perſwaded by others, and eſpecially of the Emperor Dioclefian himſelf, did ſacrifice, whereupon he was Excommunicated ; but afterwards he repenting the ſame, was again received into the Congregation, and made Martyr, as Platina, and the compiler of the Book of the General Councils affirm. The number of the Martyrs increaſed daily, ſometimes ten, ſometimes twenty were ſlain at once ; ſome whiles thirty, and oftentimes threeſcore, and other whiles a hundred in one day, men, women, and children, by divers kinds of death. *Euſeb. lib.*8. cap. 9. Alſo Damaſus, Beda, Oroſius, Honorius, and others do witneſs, that there were ſlain in this Perſecution by the names of Martyrs, within the ſpace of thirty days, ſeventeen thouſand perſons, beſides another great number and multitude that were condemned to the Metal-mines and Quarries with like cruelty.

Martyrdom more deſired in the old time than Biſhopricks be now.

Chriſtians that denied in this Perſecution, returning to Chriſt's Faith,and Excommunicated. Marcellinus the Biſhop revolted, and cometh again to the Faith,and is Martyred.

At Alexandria with Peter the Biſhop, of whom I have made mention before, were ſlain with axes three hundred and above, as Sabellicus declareth, Gereon was beheaded at Colonia Agrippina, with three hundred of his fellows, as ſaith Henricus de Erfordia, Mauritius the Captain of Chriſtian Religion, with his fellows, ſix thouſand ſix hundred ſixty and ſix. Victor in the City of Troy, now called Xanthus, with his fellows three hundred and threeſcore were ſlain, as ſaith Otto Phriſingenſis, *lib.*2. *cap.*45. Regimus receiveth the names of many other Martyrs, to the number of one hundred and twenty.

Mauritius

The Hiſtory of Mauritius Captain of the Theban Souldiers.

Mauritius came out of Syria into France and Italy, being Captain of the band of the Theban Souldiers, to the number of Six thouſand ſix hundred and threeſcore, being ſent for of Maximianus, to go againſt the rebellious Bangandes ; but rather, as it ſhould ſeem, by the reaſon of the Tyrant, which thought he might better in theſe quarters uſe his tyranny upon the Chriſtians, than in the Eaſt part. Theſe Thebans, with Mauritius the Captain, after that they had entred into Rome, were there of Marcellus the bleſſed Biſhop, confirmed in the faith, promiſing by Oath, that they would rather be ſlain of their enemies, than forſake that faith which they had received ; who followed the Emperors Hoſt through the Alps even into France. At that time the Ceſareans were encamped not far from the Town called Octodor, where Maximianus offered ſacrifice to his Devils, and called all the Souldiers both of the Eaſt and Weſt to the ſame, ſtrictly charging them by the Altars of his gods, that they would fight againſt thoſe rebels the Bangandes, and perſecute the Chriſtian enemies of the Emperors gods : which his commandment was ſhewed to the Thebans hoſt, which were alſo encamped about the river of Rode, and in a place that was named Agaune ; but to Octodor they would in no wiſe come, for that every man did certainly appoint and perſwade with themſelves, rather in that place to die, than either to ſacrifice to the gods, or bear armour againſt the Chriſtians. Which thing indeed, very ſtoutly and valiantly they affirmed, upon their Oath before taken to Maximianus, when he ſent for them. Wherewith the Tyrant, being wrathful and all moved, commanded every tenth man of that whole band to be put to the ſword, whereto ſtrivingly and with great rejoycing they committed their necks. To which notable thing and great force of faith, Mauritius himſelf was a great encourager, who by and by with a moſt grave Oration, exhorted and animated his Souldiers both to fortitude and conſtancy. Which, being again called of the Emperor, anſwered in this wiſe, ſaying, We are, O Emperor, your Souldiers, but yet alſo, to ſpeak freely, the ſervants of God. We owe to thee ſervice of war, to him innocency : of thee we receive for our travel, wages : of him the begynning of life. But in this we may in no wiſe obey thee, O Emperor, to deny God our Author and Lord, and not only ours, but you Lord likewiſe, will ye, nill ye. If we be not ſo extremely enforced that we offend him, doubtleſs, as we have hitherto before, we will yet obey you : but otherwiſe we will rather obey him than you. We offer here our hands againſt any other enemies : but to defile our hands with the blood of innocents, that we may not do. Theſe right hands of ours have ſkill to fight againſt the wicked and true enemies : but to ſpoil and murther the Godly and Citizens, they have no skill at all. We have in remembrance how we took armour in hand, for the defence of the Citizens, and not againſt them. We fought always for juſtice, piety, and for the health of innocents. Theſe have been always the rewards of our perils and travel. We have fought in the quarrel of faith,which in no wiſe we can keep to you, if we do not ſhew the ſame to our God. We firſt ſware upon the Sacraments of our God, then afterward to the King : and do you think the ſecond will avail us, if we break the firſt ? By us you would plague the Chriſtians, to do which feat we are only commanded by you. We are here ready to confeſs God the Author of all things, and believe in his Son Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. We ſee before our eyes our fellows,and partakers of our labours and travels, to be put to the ſword, and we ſprinkled with their blood : of which our moſt bleſſed companions and brethren the end and death we have not bewailed nor mourned, but rather have been glad, and have rejoyced thereat, for that they have been counted worthy to ſuffer for the Lord their God. The extreme neceſſity of death cannot move us againſt your Majeſty, neither yet any deſperation, O Emperor, which is wont in ventrous affairs to do much, ſhall arm us againſt you. Behold here we caſt down our weapons, and reſiſt not, for that we had rather to be killed, than kill, and guiltleſs to die, than guilty to live. Whatſoever more ye will command, appoint and enjoyn us, we are here ready to ſuffer, yea, both fire and ſword, and whatſoever other torments. We confeſs our ſelves to be Chriſtians,we cannot perſecute Chriſtians, nor will do ſacrifice to your Deviliſh Idols.

The Conſtancy of the Souldiers to the Emperor.

With which their anſwer, the King being altogether incenſed and moved, commanded the ſecond time the tenth man of them that were left to be in like caſe murthered. That cruelty alſo being accompliſhed, at length, when the Chriſtian Souldiers would in no wiſe condeſcend unto his mind, he ſet upon them with his whole hoſt, both footmen and alſo horſemen, and charged them to kill them all. Who with all force ſet upon them ; they making no reſiſtance,but throwing down their armour,yielded their lives to the perſecutors, and offered to them their naked bodies.

Mauritius and his Company martyred.

Victor at the ſame time was not of that band, nor yet then any Souldier ; but being an old Souldier, was diſmiſſed for his age. At which time he coming ſuddenly upon them as they were banqueting and making merry with the ſpoils of the holy Martyrs, was bidden to ſit down with them : who firſt asking the cauſe of that their ſo great rejoycing, and underſtanding the truth thereof, deteſted the guefts, and refuſed to eat with them. And then being demanded of them whether happily he were a Chriſtian or no ? openly confeſſed and denied not but that he was a Chriſtian, and ever would be. And thereupon they ruſhing upon him, killed him, and made him partner of the like martyrdom and honour.

The coſtliant bolde ſneſs of Victor in refuſing to eat with the cruel perſecutors, for the which, he was ſlain.

Victor Martyr.

Beda in his Hiſtory writeth, that this perſecution, being under Dioclefian, endured unto the ſeventh year of Conſtantius. And Euſeb. lib. cap. 6. ſaith, that it laſted until the tenth year of Conſtantinus. It was not yet one year from the day in which Dioclefian and Maximinian, joyning themſelves together, began their perſecution, when that they ſaw the number of the Chriſtians rather to increaſe than to diminiſh, notwithſtanding all the cruelty that ever they could ſhew, and now were out of all hope for the utter rooting out of them. Which thing was the cauſe of their firſt enterpriſe ; and having now even their fill of blood, and loathing, as it were, the ſtedding thereof, they ceaſed at the laſt of their own accord to put any more Chriſtians to death. But yet of a great multitude they did thruſt out their right eyes, and maimed their left legs at the ham with a fearing Iron,condemning them to the mines of metals, not ſo much for the uſe of their labour, as for the deſire of afflicting them. And this was the clemency and releaſe of the cruelty of thoſe Princes, which ſaid that it was not meet that the Cities ſhould be deſiled with the blood of Citizens, and to make the Emperors Highneſs to be ſtayned with the name of cruelty, but to ſhew his Princely beneficence and liberality to all men, Euſebius, lib. 8. cap. 10.

The number of the Chriſtians encreaſed for all this perſecution.

Dioclefian and Maximinian, weary tired with perſecution, and gave up their Kingdoms.

Euſeb. lib.8. cap. 10.

When Dioclefian and Maximinian had reigned together Emperors one and twenty years (Nicephorus ſaith, two and twenty years) at length Dioclefian put himſelf from his Imperial dignity at Nicomedia, and lived at Salona ; Maximinian at Mediolanum ; and led both of them a private life in the three hundred and ninth year after Chriſt. This ſtrange and marvellous alteration gave occaſion (and ſo it came to paſs) that within ſhort ſpace after, there were in the Roman Commonwealth many Emperors at one time. } Ann 309.

The ſtrife of the Tyrants. Dioclefian and Maximinian Emperors depoſed. Galerius, Maximianus, Conſtantius, Emperors.

In the beginning of this perſecution, you heard how Dioclefian being made Emperor took to him Maximinian. Alſo how theſe two,governing as Emperors together, choſe out other two Cæſars under them, to wit, Galerius Maximinus, and Conſtantius the father of Conſtantine the Great. Thus then Dioclefian reigning with Maximinian, in the nineteenth year of his reign began his furious perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, whoſe reign after the ſame continued not long. For ſo it pleaſed God to put ſuch a ſnaffle in the Tyrants mouth, that within two years after, he cauſed both him and Maximinian (for what cauſe he knoweth) to give over their Imperial function, and ſo to remain not as Emperors any more, but as private perſons. So that they being now diſplaced and diſpoſſeſſed, the Imperial Dominion remained with Conſtantius and Galerius Maximinus, which two divided the whole Monarchy between them ; ſo that Maximinus ſhould govern the Eaſt Countries, and Conſtantius the Weſt parts. But Conſtantius as a modeſt Prince, only contented with the Imperial title, refuſed Italy and Africk, contenting himſelf only with France, Spain, and Britain. Wherefore Galerius Maximinus choſe to him his two Sons, Maximus and Severus. Likewiſe Conſtantius took Conſtantius his Son Ceſar under him. In the mean time while Maximinus with his two Cesars were in Asia, the Roman Souliders fet up for their Emperor Maxentius the fon of Maximinian, who had before depofed himfelf. Againft whom Maximinus the Emperor of the Eaft fent his fon Severus, which Severus was flain in the fame Voyage of Maxentius, in whofe place then Maximinus took Licinius. And thefe were the Emperors and Cefars, which fucceeding after Diocleftan and Maximinian, profecuted the reft of that perfecution, which Diocleftan and Maximinian before begun, during near the fpace of feven or eight years, which was to the year of our Lord three hundred and eighteen; fave only that Conftantius, with his fon Conftantinus was no great doer therein, but rather a maintainer and a fupporter of the Chriftians. Which Conftantius, furnamed Clorus for his paleneſs, was the fon of Eutropius, a man of great nobility of the Roman nation, as Letus affirmeth. He came of the line of Eneas and Claudia the daughter of Claudius Auguſtus. This man had not the defire of great and mighty dominions, and therefore parted he the Empire with Galerius, and would rule but in France, Britain and Spain, refuſing the other Kingdoms for the troubleſome and difficult government of the fame. Otherwife he was a Prince, as Eutropius maketh defcription of him, very excellent, civil, meek, gentle, liberal, and defirous to do good unto thofe that had any private authority under him. And as Cyrus once ſaid, that he got treaſure enough, when he made his friends rich: Even ſo it is faid that Conſtantius would oftentimes fay, that it were better that his ſubjects had treaſure, than he to have it in his treaſure Houſe. Alſo he was by nature ſufficed with a little, in ſo much that he uſed to eat and drink in earthen veſſels (which thing was counted in Agathocles the Sicilian a great commendation) and if at any time cauſe required to garniſh his table, he would fend for plate and other furniture to his friends. To theſe vertues he added yet a more worthy ornament, that is, devotion, love, and affection towards the Word of God, as Euſebius in his eighth Book and thirteenth Chapter affirmeth: After which vertues enſued great peace and tranquility in all his Provinces. By which word he being guided, neither levied any wars contrary to piety and Chriſtian Religion, neither aided he any other that did the ſame, neither deſtroyed he the Churches, but commanded that the Chriſtians ſhould be preſerved and defended, and kept them ſafe from all contumelious injuries. And when that in the other jurifdictions of the Empire the Congregations were troubled with perſecution, as Sozomenus declareth in his firſt Book and ſixth Chapter, he only gave licence unto the Chriſtians to live after their acuſtomed manner. This wonderful act of his following, beſides others, do ſhew that he was a fincere Worſhipper, and of the Chriſtian Religion.

Maxentius Emperor. Licinius Cefar.

Anno 318. The commendation of Conſtantius.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

Sozomenus, lib. 1. cap. 6.

Thoſe which bare the chief offices amongſt the Ethnikes drave out of the Emperors Court all the Godly Chriſtians: Whereupon this enſued, that the Emperors themſelves, at the laſt, were diſtitute of help, when ſuch were driven away, which dwelling in their courts, and living a Godly life, poured out their prayers unto God for their proſperous eſtate and health both of the Empire and Emperor. Conſtantius therefore, minding at a certain time to try what fincere and good Chriſtians he had yet in his Court, called together all his officers and ſervants in the ſame, fayning himſelf to chuſe out ſuch as would do ſacrifice to Devils, and that thoſe only ſhould dwell there and keep their offices, and that thoſe which would refuſe to do the ſame, ſhould be thruſt out and baniſhed the Court. At this appointment, all the Courtiers divided themſelves into companies: The Emperor marked which were the conſtanteſt and godlieſt from the reſt. And when ſome ſaid they would willingly do ſacrifice, other ſome openly and boldly denied to do the ſame; then the Emperor ſharply rebuked thoſe which were ſo ready to do ſacrifice, and judged them as falſe Traytors unto God, accounting them unworthy to be in his Court, which were ſuch Traytors to God; and forthwith commanded that they only ſhould be baniſhed the ſame. But greatly he commended them which refuſed to do ſacrifice, and confeſſed God; affirming that they only were worthy to be about a Prince; forthwith commanding that thenceforth they ſhould be the truſty Counſellors and defenders both of his Perſon and Kingdom; ſaying thus much more, that they only were worthy to be in office, whom he might make account of as his aſſured friends, and that he meant to have them in more eſtimation, than the ſubſtance he had in his treaſury. Euſebius maketh mention hereof in his firſt Book of the like of Conſtantinus, and alſo Sozomenus in his firſt Book and ſixth Chapter.

Conſtantius proveth who were true Chriſtians in his Court, and who were not. Ex Euſeb. de vita Conſtant. l. 1. & Sozomen. lib. 1. cap. 6.

False Chriſtians diſcovered from true.

With this Conſtantius was joyned (as hath been aforeſaid) Galerius Maximinus, a man, as Eutropius affirmeth, very civil and a paſſing good ſouldier: Furthermore, a favourer of wiſe and learned men, of quiet diſpoſition, not rigorous, but his Drunkenneſs, whereof he would ſoon after repent him, as Veſtor writeth; whether he meaneth Maximinus the Father or Maximinus his Son, it is uncertain. But Euſebius far otherwiſe deſcribeth the conditions of him in his eighth Book and firſt Chapter. For he ſaith he was of a Tyrannical diſpoſition; the fearfulleſt man that might be, and curious in all magical ſuperſtition; in ſo much that without the Divinations and anſwers of Divels, he durſt do nothing at all, and therefore he gave great offices and dignities to inchanters. Furthermore, that he was an exactor and extortioner of the Citizens, liberal to thoſe that were flatterers, given to ſurfeiting and riot, a great drinker of wine, and in his furious Drunkenneſs moſt like a mad-man, a ribaud, and adulterer, which came to no Citty, but he ravifhed virgins, and defiled mens Wives. To conclude, he was ſo great an Idolater, that he built up Temples in every City, and repaired thoſe that were fallen in great decay: And he choſe out the moſt worthy of his political Magiſtrates to be the Idols Prieſts, and deviſed that they ſhould execute that their office with great authority and dignity, and alſo with warlike pomp. But unto Chriſtian piety and Religion, he was moſt inceniſive, and in the Eaſt Churches exerciſed cruel perſecution, and uſed as executioners of the ſame, Pencetius, Quintianus, and Theoteknus, beſides others.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 13. Conſtantius gracious to the Chriſtians.

Maximinus an Enemy to the Chriſtians.

The wicked deeds of Maximinus deſcribed.

Notwithſtanding he was at length revoked from his cruelty by the juſt Judgment and Puniſhment of God. For he was ſuddenly vexed with a fatal diſeaſe moſt filthy and deſperate, which diſeaſe to deſcribe was very ſtrange, taking the firſt beginning in his fleſh outwardly, from thence it proceeded more and more to the inward parts of his body. For in the privy members of his body, there happened unto him a fudden putrefaction, and after in the bottom of the ſame a botchy corrupt bile, with a Fiſtula conſuming and eating up his intrails, out of the which came ſwarming forth an innumerable multitude of lice, with ſuch a peſtiferous ſtink, that no man could abide him; and ſo much more, for that all the groſſneſs of his body by abundance of meat before he fell ſick, was turned alſo into fat; which fat now putrified and ſtinking, was ſo ugſome and horrible, that none that came to him could abide the ſight thereof. By reaſon whereof, the Phyſitians which had him in cure, not able to abid the intolerable ſtink, ſome of them were commanded to be ſlain. Other ſome, becauſe they could not heal him, being ſo ſwoln and paſt hope of cure, were alſo cruelly put to death. At length, being put in remembrance that this diſeaſe was ſent of God, he began to forethink the wickedneſs that he had done againſt the Saints of God, and ſo coming again to himſelf, firſt confeſſeth to God all his offences, then calling them unto him which were about him, forthwith commanded all men to ceaſe from the perſecutions of the Chriſtians: Requiring moreover that they ſhould ſet up his Emperial proclamations, for the reſtoring and reedifying of their Temples, and that they would obtain of the Chriſtians in their aſſemblies (which without all fear and doubt they might be bold to make) that they would devoutly pray to their God for the Emperor. Then forthwith was the perſecution ſtayed, and the Emperial Proclamations in every City were ſet up, containing the retraction or countermand of thoſe things which againſt the Chriſtians were before decreed, the copy whereof enſueth.

A terrible plague ſent by God on Maximinus.

Maximinus killeth his own Phyſitians.

Amongſt other things, which for the benefit and commodity of the commonweal we eſtabliſhed, we commanded to reform all things according to the ancient Laws and publick Diſcipline of the Romans, and alſo to uſe this policy, that the Chriſtians, which had forſaken the Religion of their forefathers, ſhould be brought again to the right right way. For ſuch phantaſtical ſingularity was amongſt them, that thoſe things which their Elders had received and allowed, they rejected and diſallowed, deviſing every man ſuch Laws as they thought good, and obſerved the ſame, aſſembling in divers places great multitudes of People.

Maximinus his countermand in the behalf of the Chriſtians.

Therefore, when our foreſaid decree was proclaimed, many there were that felt the penalty thereof, and many being troubled therefore, ſuffered many kinds of death. And becauſe we ſee yet that there be many which perſeverein the ſame, which neither give due worſhip unto the celeſtial Gods, neither receive the God of the Chriſtians, we have vouchſafed to our acuſtomed benignity, wherewith we are wont to ſhew favour unto all men, think good in this caſe alſo to extend our clemency, that the Chriſtians may be again tolerated, and appoint them places where again they may meet together, ſo that they do nothing contrary to the publick order diſciplin. By another Epiſtle we mean to preſcribe unto the Judges, what ſhall be convenient for them to do. Wherefore according as this our bountiful clemency deſerveth, let them make interceſſion to God for our health, commonweal, and for themſelves; that in all places the ſtate of the commonweal may be preſerved, and that they themſelves may be able ſafely to live within their bounds.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. ult.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. ult.

But one of his inferior officers, whoſe name was alſo Maximinus, was not well pleaſed, when this countermand was publiſhed throughout all Aſia, and the Provinces where he had to do. Yet he being qualified by this example, that it was not convenient for him to repugne the pleaſure of thoſe Princes which had the chief authority, as Conſtantinus and Maximinus, ſet forth of himſelf no edict touching the ſame; but commanded his officers in the preſence of others, that they ſhould ſomewhat ſtay from the perſecution of the Chriſtians: Of which commandment of the inferior Maximinus, each of them gave intelligence unto their fellowes by their letters. But Sabinus, which then amongſt them all had the chiefeſt office and dignity, to the ſubſtitutes of every Country wrote by his letter, the Emperors pleaſure in this wiſe.

Sabinus in the favour of the Chriſtians publiſheth the decree.

The Majeſty of our moſt gracious and ſoveraign Lords the Emperors, hath lately decreed with ſpecial diligence and devotion, to induce all men to an uniform life, ſo that they, which ſeemed to diſſent from the Roman cuſtom by a ſtrang manner of living, ſhould exhibit to the immortal Gods their due and proper worſhip; but the wilful and obſtinate mind of divers ſo much and ſo continually reſiſted the ſame, that by no lawful means they might be revoked from their purpoſe, neither made afraid by any terror or puniſhment. Becauſe therefore it ſo came to paſſ, that by this means many put themſelves in peril and jeopardy: The Majeſty of our ſoveraign Lords the Emperors, according to their Noble piety, conſidering that it was far from the meaning of their Princely Majeſties that ſuch things ſhould be, whereby ſo many men and much people ſhould be deſtroyed, gave me in charge, that with diligence I ſhould write unto you, that, if any of the Chriſtians from henceforth fortune to be taken in the exerciſe of their Religion, in no wiſe ye moleſt the ſame, neither for that cauſe you do judge any man worthy of Puniſhment; for that in all this time it hath evidently appeared, that by no means they might be allured from ſuch wilfulneſs. It is therefore requiſite that your wiſdom write unto the Queſtors, Captains, and Conſtables of every City and villege, that they may know it not to be lawful for them, or any of them, to do contrary to the preſcript of this commandment, neither that they preſume to attempt the ſame. Euſeb. lib. 9. cap. 1.

Euſeb. lib. 9. cap. 1.

Perſecution ceaſeth for 3 years.

The Governors therefore of every Province, ſuppoſing this is to be the determinate pleaſure (and not fained) of the Emperor, did firſt adverſife thereof the ruſtical and pagan multitude: After that they releaſed and ſet at liberty, all ſuch priſoners as were condemned to the metal mines, and to perpetual impriſonment for their faith, thinking thereby (where indeed they were deceived) that the doing thereof would pleaſe the Emperor. This therefore ſeemed to them as unlooked for, and as light to Travellers in a dark night. They gather themſelves together in every City, they call their Synods and Councels, and much marvel at the ſudden change and alteration. The infidels themſelves extol the only and true God of the Chriſtians. The Chriſtians receive again all their former liberties; and ſuch as fell away before in the time of perſecution repent themſelves, and after penance done, they returned again to the Congregation. Now the Chriſtians rejoyced in every City, praiſing God with Hymns and Pſalms: Euſebius thinketh, ſo. This was a marvellous ſudden alteration of the Church, from a moſt unhappy ſtate into a better: But ſcarce ſuffered Maximinus the Tyrant the ſame ſix monthes unviolated to continue. For whatſoever ſeemed to make for the ſubverſion of the ſame peace (yet ſcarcely hatched) that did he only meditate. And firſt of all he took from the Chriſtians all liberty and leave for them to aſſemble and Congiregate in Churchyards under a certain colour. After that he ſent certain miſcreants unto the Athenians, to ſollicit them againſt the Chriſtians, and to provoke them to aſk of him, as a recompence and great reward, that he would not ſuffer any Chriſtian to inhabit in their country: And amongſt them was one Theotechnus, a moſt wicked miſcreant, and inchanter, and a moſt deadly Enemy againſt the Chriſtians. He firſt made the way whereby the Chriſtians were put out of credit and accuſed to the Emperor; to which fraud alſo he erected a certain Idol of Jupiter to be worſhipped of the inchanters and conjurers, and mingled the ſame worſhip with ceremonies, full of deceiveable witchcraft. Laſtly, he cauſed the ſame Idol to give this found out of his mouth, that is: Jupiter commandeth the Chriſtians to be baniſhed out of the City and ſuburbs of the ſame, as Enemies unto him. And the ſame ſentence did the reſt of the Governors of the Provinces publiſh againſt the Chriſtians, and thus at length perſecution began to kindle againſt them. Maximinus appointed and inſtituted high Prieſts and Biſhops in every City to offer ſacrifice unto Idols, and inveigled all thoſe that were in great offices under him, that they ſhould not only ceaſe to pleaſure them and to do for them, but alſo that they ſhould with new deviſed accuſations againſt them, at their pleaſure, put as many to death as by any means they might. They alſo did counterfeit certain practiſes of Pilate againſt our Saviour Chriſt full of blaſphemy, and ſent the ſame into all the Empire of Maximinus by their letters, commanding that the ſame ſhould be publiſhed and ſet up in every City and ſuburbs of the ſame, and that they ſhould be delivered to the School-maſters, to cauſe their Scholars to learn by rote the ſame.

The diſtoliſh practiſes of Theotechnus.

The vain practiſes of the brethren againſt Chriſt and his Religion.

After that, one named Præfectus caſtrorum, whom the Romans do call Captain, allured certain light women, partly by fear, and partly by puniſhment, dwelling at Damaſcus and Phenicia, and taken out of the Court where in they were accuſed, that they ſhould openly ſay in writing, that they were once Chriſtians, and that they knew what wicked and laſcivious acts the Chriſtians were wont to execute amongſt themſelves upon the ſundays, and what other things they thought good to make more of their own head, to the ſlander of the Chriſtians. The Captain ſhewed unto the Emperor their words, as though it had been ſo indeed: And the Emperor by and by commanded the ſame to be publiſhed throughout every City. Furthermore, they did hang in the middeſt of every City (which was never done before) the Emperors edicts againſt the Chriſtians, graven in tables of Braſs. And the Children in the Schools with great noiſe and clapping of hands, did every day reſound the contumelious Blaſphemies of Pilate unto Jeſus, and what other things foever were deviſed of the Magiſtrates, after a moſt deſpiteful manner.

And to be ſaſtened to the Pillers, fraught with all arrogant and inſolent hate againſt God and Chriſt.

The copy of the recountermand made againſt the Chriſtians.

The weak and imbecil rebellion of mans mind (all obſcurity and blindneſs of ignorance ſet apart, which hitherto hath wrapped the minds of impious and miſerable men, in the pernicious darkneſs of Ignorance) is now at the length able to diſcern, that the ſame is governed, as alſo corroborated by the providence of the immortal Gods, the lovers of vertue: Which thing, how acceptable it is to us, how pleaſant and grateful, and how much proof the ſame hath declared of your well diſpoſed willing minds, is incredible to be told: Although this was not unknown before, with what diligence and devotion ye ſerved the immortal Gods, whoſe wonderful and conſtant faith is not known by bare and naked words, but by your worthy and notable deeds. Wherefore worthily is your City called the Habita-

Habitation and Seat of the immortal gods, and by many examples it appeareth that the same flourisheth, and prospereth by the presence of the celestial gods. For behold, your City not regarding your private businesses, nor esteeming that which should have been for the special Commodity thereof, when it perceived that cursed vanity to begin again to creep, and as a fire negligently quenched, when the dead brandes thereof began to kindle and make a great flame: by and by without delay yed having recourse unto our Piety, as unto the Metropolitan of all Divine Worship and Religion, craved remedy and help; which wholsome mind, for your Pieties sake, it is most manifest that the gods have indued you with. Therefore he, even that most mighty Jupiter, I say, which preserveth your most famous City, to that intent he might deliver and make free your Country-gods, your Wives and Children, your Houshold gods and houses, from all detestable Corruption, hath inspired you with this wholsome and willing mind, shewing and declaring how worthy, notable, and healthful a thing it is, to Worship and to Sacrifice to the immortal gods. For who is so void of reason and understanding that knoweth not that this thing happeneth unto us by the careful study of the goodness of our gods, that the ground denieth not to give her timely increase, nor maketh frustrate the Husbandmans hope, nor that wicked War dare shew her face upon the Earth, nor that the Corruption of the Air is now cause of Pestilence; neither that the Sea swelleth with immoderate Winds, neither that sudden Storms are cause of hurtful Tempest: to conclude, that the Ground, which is as the Nurse and Mother of all things, is not swallowed up of her deep chaps and gapings, by terrible Earthquakes; neither that the Hills, made level with the Earth, are not with gaping clifts devoured; all which Evils, and greater than these, before this time to have happened, every man knoweth. And all these mischiefs came upon us for the pernitious Errors sake of the extreams folly of those wicked men the Christians, when filthiness it self (as I may call it) so occupied their minds and over-ran the World. Let them behold the Fields now all about full of Corn, and overflown, as it were, with Wave of Corn. Let them view the pleasant Meadows clothed with Flowers, and moystened with Showers from Heaven, and also the pleasant and temperate Weather. Therefore let all men rejoyce, that by your Piety, Sacrifices and Worshipping, the majesty of the most stern god of Battel, Mars, is appeased, and that therefore we enjoy pleasant and firm peace. And how many soever have left that blind Error and straying of the Christians unfainedly, and be of a better mind, let them specially rejoyce, as men delivered out of a sudden great Tempest, and from a grievous Disease, and have afterward obtained a delectable and pleasant life. For doubtless if they had remained in that execrable vanity, far off had they been chased from your City and Suburbs of the same (according to your desire) that your City by that means, according to your commendable diligence, cleansed from all Impurity and Impiety, may offer Sacrifices according to the meaning of the same; with due reverence of the immortal gods. And that you may perceive in how good part your Supplication was unto us (yea unasked and undesired) we are most willing and ready to further your honest Endeavours, and grant unto you for your Devotion, whatsoever ye ask of our Magnificence. And that this thing may be accomplished, forthwith ask and have. And this thing with all speed endeavour you to obtain, which shall be a perpetual Testimony of Piety exhibited of your City to the immortal gods, and shall be a President to your Children and Posterity, and withall you shall obtain of us, for this your willing desire of Reformation, condigne and worthy Rewards, Eusebius lib. 9. cap. 7.

Eusеb. lib 9. cap. 7.

Persecution renued afresh.

Thus came it to pass that at the length Persecution was as great as ever it was, and the Magistrates of every Province were very diligentful against the Christians, which condemned some to death, and some to exile. Among whom they condemned three Christians at Emisa in Phenicia, with whom Sylvanus the Bishop, a very old man, being forty years in the Ecclesiastical Function. was condemned to death. At Nicomedia Lucianus the elder of Antioch, brought thither, after he had exhibited to the Emperor his Apology concerning the Doctrine of the Christians, was cast in Prison, and after put to death. In Amasea a City of Cappadocia, Bringes, the Lieutenant of Maximinus, had at that time the executing of that Persecution. At Alexandria, Petrus a most worthy Bishop, was beheaded, with whom many other Egyptian Bishops also died, Eusebius lib. 9. cap. 7. Niceph. lib. 7. cap. 44. Quirinus the Bishop of Sescianum, having a Hand-Mill tied about his Neck, was thrown headlong from the Bridge into the Flood, and there a long while floted above the water, and when he opened his mouth to speak to the Lookers on, that they should not be dismaid with that his punishment, was with much ado drowned, Chron. Euseb. At Rome died Marcellus the Bishop, as saith Platina, also Timotheus the elder, with many other Bishops and Priests were martyred. To conclude, many in sundry places every where were martyred, whose names the Book, Intituled, Fasciculus temporum declareth, as Victorianus, Symphorianus, Castorius with his wife, Castulus, Cesarius, Memnas, Nabilis, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, Petrus, and other innumerable Martyrs, Erasmus, Bonifacius, Julianus, Cosmas, Damianus, Basilissus, Felicianus, Philemon, Hirenеus, Januarius, Felix, Desiderius, Gregorius, Spoletanus, Agapes, Chionia, Hirenea, Theodora, and two hundred threescore and ten other Martyrs. Florianus, Primus and Felicianus, Vitus and Modestus, Crescentia, Albinius, Rogatianus, Donatianus, Pancratius, Catharina, Margarета, Lucia the Virgin, and Antheus the King, with many thousand Martyrs more. Simplicius, Faustinus, Beatrix, Pantbaleon, Georgius, Justus, Leocadia, Ambonia, and other more (to an infinite number) suffered Martyrdom in this Persecution, whose names God hath written in the Book of Life. Also Felix, Victor with his Parents, Lucia the widow, Gemenianus, with threescore and nineteen others. Sabinus, Anastasia, Chrysogonus, Felix and Audactus, Adrianus, Nathalia, Eugenia. Agnes also, when she was but thirteen years old, was martyred. Eusebius in his eighth Book and fifteenth Chapter, rehearseth these kinds of Torments and Punishments: that is to say, Fire, wild Beasts, the Sword, Crucifyings, the bottom of the Sea, the cutting and burning of Members, the thrusting out of Eyes, dismembring of the whole Body, Hunger, Imprisonment, and whatsoever other cruelty the Magistrates could devise. All which notwithstanding, the godly ones, rather than that they would do Sacrifice, as they were bid, manfully endured. Neither were the women any thing at all behind them. For they, being enticed to the filthy use of their Bodies, rather suffered banishment, or willingly killed themselves. Neither yet could the Christians live safely in the Wilderness, but were fetched even from thence to death and torments, insomuch that this was a more grievous Persecution under Maximinus the Tyrant, than was the former cruel Persecution under Maximianus the Prince, Eusеb. lib. 9. cap. 6.

Several kinds of torments. Eusеb. lib. 8. cap. 15.

The clarity of the Christians to the Gentiles. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven.

Eusеb. lib 9 cap. 6. In the rule of God is foretold the foresaid edict.

And for so much as ye have heard the cruel Edict of Maximinus proclaimed against the Christians, graven in brass, which he thought perpetually should indure to the abolishing of Christ and his Religion: now mark again the great handy work of God, which immediately fell upon the same, checking the proud presumption of the Tyrant, proving all to be false and contrary that in the brazen Proclamation was contained. For where the foresaid Edict boasted so much of the Prosperity and Plenty of all things in the same time of this Persecution of the Christians, suddenly befel such unseasonable Drought, with Famine and Pestilence among the people, besides also the Wars with the Armenians, that all was found untrue that he had bragged so much of before. By reason of which Famine and Pestilence the people were greatly consumed, insomuch that one measure of Wheat was sold for two thousand and five hundred pieces of money of Athens Coin, by reason whereof innumerable died in the Cities, but many more in the Country and Villages, so that most part of the Husbandmen and Countrymen died up with the famine and

The proud and blasphemous presumption of the Emperor provoked God and caused him to send Famine and Pestilence.

Eusеb. lib 9 cap. 8.

Pestilence

Pestilence. Divers there were which bringing out their best Treasure, were glad to give it for any kind of sustenance, were it never so little. Others selling away their Possessions, fell by reason thereof to extream poverty and beggery. Certain eating Grass, and feeding on other unwholsome Herbs, were fain to relieve themselves with such food as did hurt and poyson their bodies. Also a number of women in the Cities, being brought to extream misery and penury, were constrained to depart the City, and fall to begging thorow the Country. Some others were weak and faint (as Images without breath) wandring up and down, and not able to stand for feebleness, fell down in the middle of the streets, and holding up their hands most pitiful, cried for some scraps or fragments of bread to be given them, and being at the last gaspe, ready to give up the ghost, and not able to utter any other words, yet cried out that they were hungry. Of the richer sort divers there were, who being weary with the number of beggers and askers, after they had bestowed largely upon them, became hard-hearted, fearing lest they should fall into the same misery themselves, as they which begged. By reason whereof, the Market-place, Streets, Lanes, and Alleys lay full of dead and naked bodies, being cast out and unburied, to the pitiful and grievous beholding of them that saw them, wherefore many were eaten of Dogs, for which cause they that lived fell to the killing of Dogs, lest they running mad, should fall upon them, and kill them.

A horrible hunger among the Heathen persecuters described.

Pestilence among the persecutors.

In like manner the Pestilence scattering through all houses and ages of men, did no less consume them, especially those which through plenty of Victuals escaped Famine. Wherefore the rich Princes and Presidents, and other innumerable of the Magistrates, being the more apt to receive the Infection, by reason of their plenty, were quickly dispatched, and turned up their heels. Thus the miserable multitude being consumed with Famine and with Pestilence, all places were full of Mourning, neither was there any thing else to be seen, but wailing and weeping in every corner. So that death, what for Famine and Pestilence, in short time brake up and consumed whole Housholds, two or three dead bodies being born out together from one house to one funeral.

Ex fastis Ecclesiæ.

Cyprian, Dionysius, Julius, with other Martyrs.

Two hundred threescore and ten Martyrs.

Generations with their sorts and Nations Martyrs.

These were the rewards of the vain braggs of Maximinus and his Edicts, which he did publish in all Towns and Cities against us, when it was evident to all men, how diligent and charitable the Christians were to them all in this their miserable extremity. For they only in all this time of distress, shewing compassion upon them, travelled every day, some in curing the sick, and some in burying the dead, which otherwise of their own fort were forsaken. Othersome of the Christians calling and gathering the multitude together, which were in jeopardy of Famine, distributed Bread unto them, whereby they ministred occasion to all men to glorifie the God of the Christians, and to confess them to be the true Worshippers of God, as appeared by their works. By the means and reason hereof, the great God and Defender of the Christians, who before had shewed his anger and indignation against all men, for their wrongful afflicting of us, opened again unto us the comfortable light of his Providence, so that by means thereof peace fell unto us, as light unto them that sit in darkness, to the great admiration of all men, which easily perceive God himself to be a perpetual Director of our doings, who many times chasteneth his people with Calamities for a time to exercise them, but after sufficient correction again sheweth himself merciful and favourable to them which with trust call upon him.

By the Narration of these things heretofore premised, taken out of the story of Eusebius, like as it is manifest to see, so it is wonderful to mark and note, how those counsels and rages of the Gentiles atchieved against Christ and his Christians, when they seemed most sure against them, were most against themselves. And whereby they thought most to confound the Church and Religion of Christ, the same turned most to their own confusion, and to the profit and praise of the Christians (God of his marvelous Wisdom so ordering and disposing the end of things.) For where the brazen Edict of the Emperor promised temperate weather, God sent drought: where it promised plenty, God immediately sent upon them Famine and pestilence: where it promised health, God strook them even upon the same, with grievous Pestilence, and with other more Calamities, in such sort that the most relief they had, was chiefly by the Christians, to the great praise both of them, and to the honour of our God.

The wisdom and policy of man overthrown in his own turn.

Qui comprehendit sapientes in astutia.

Thus most plainly and evidently was then verified the true Promise of Christ to his Church, affirming and affirming us, That the Gates of Hell shall not prevail against his Church builded upon his Faith: as sufficiently may appear by these ten Persecutions above specified and described. Wherein as no man can deny, but that Satan and his malignant World have assayed the uttermost of their power and might to overthrow the Church of Jesus: so must all men needs grant, that read these stories, that when Satan and the gates of Hell have done their worst, yet have they not prevailed against this Mount of Sion, nor ever shall. For else what was here to be thought, where so many Emperors and Tyrants together, Diocletian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maximinus, Severus, Maximinus, Licinius, with their Captains and Officers, were let loose, like so many Lions, upon a scattered and unarmed flock of sheep, intending nothing else but the utter subversion of all Christianity, and especially who when Laws were set up in brass against the Christians, as a thing perpetually to stand: what was here to be looked for, but a final desolation of the Name and Religion of Christians? But what followed, partly ye have heard, partly more is to be marked, as in the story followeth.

The promise of Christ verified. Matth. 16. The gates of hell shall not prevail against the Church: builded upon the Faith of Christ.

I shewed before how Maximinian, and the Son of Maximinian, was set up at Rome by the Pretorian Souldiers to be Emperor. Whereunto the Senate, although they were not consenting, yet for fear they were not resisting. Maximinian his Father, who had before deprived himself with Diocletian, hearing of this, took heart again to him, to resume his dignity, and so laboured to perswade Diocletian also to do the same: but when he could not move him thereunto, he repaireth to Rome, thinking to wrest the Empire out of his Sons hands. But when the Souldiers would not suffer that, of a crafty purpose he flieth to Constantinus in France, under pretence to complain of Maxentius his Son, but in very deed to kill Constantinus. Notwithstanding that Conspiracy being detected by Fausta the Daughter of Maximinian, whom Constantinus had married, so was Constantinus through the grace of God preserved, and Maximinian retired back. In the which his flight by the way he was apprehended, and so put to death. And this is the end of Maximinian.

The death of Maximinian.

Now let us return to Maxentius again, who all this while reigned at Rome with tyranny and wickedness intolerable, much like to another Pharaoh or Nero. For he slew the most part of his Noble men, and took from them their goods. And sometime in his rage he would destroy great multitudes of the people of Rome by his Souldiers, as Eusebius declareth, lib. 8. cap. 14. Also he left no mischievous nor lascivious act unattempted, but was the utter-enemy of all womenly chastity, which used to fend the honest wives, whom he had adulterated, with shame and dishonesty unto their Husbands (being worthy Senators) after that he had ravished them. He abstained from no Adulterous act, but was inflamed with the unquenchable lust of deflowring of women. Letus declareth that he, being that time far in love with a noble and chaste Gentlewoman of Rome, sent unto her such Courtiers of his, as were meet for that purpose, whom also he had in greater estimation than any others, and with such was wont to consult about matters for the Common weal. These first fell upon her Husband and murthered him within his own house; then when they could by no means neither with fear of the Tyrant, or with threatning of death pull her away from him: at length she being a Christian desired leave of them to go into her Chamber, and after her prayers she would accomplish that which they requested. And when she had gotten into her Chamber, under this pretence, she killed her self. But the Courtiers when they saw that the woman tarried so long, they being displeased therewith, brake open the doors, and found her there lying dead. Then returned they and declared this matter to the Emperor, who was so far past shame, that in stead of Repentance he was the more set on fire in attempting the like.

The wicked-ness of Maxentius described. Eusеb. lib. 8. cap. 14.

A shameful act of incontinency.

A Christian Matron slayeth her self to hold the rule of Modesty.

He

A Monster in the likelihood of an Emperor.

He was also much addict to the Art Magical, which to execute, he was more fit than for the Imperial Dignity. Also sometime he would rip women when they were in labour, and would search the place where the infant lay, being born a little before. Often he would invocate Devils in a secret manner, and by the answers of them he sought to break the Wars, which he knew Constantinus and Licinius prepared against him. And to the end he might the rather perpetrate his mischievous and wicked attempts, which in his ungracious mind he had conceived, according to his purpose, in the beginning of his Reign he feigned himself to be a favourer of the Christians. In which thing doing, thinking to make the People of Rome his friends, he commanded that they should cease from persecuting the Christians. And he himself in the mean season abstained from no contumelious vexation of them, till that he began at the last to shew himself an open persecuter of them: at which time as Zonaras writeth, he most cruelly raged against the Christians thereabouts, vexing them with all manner of injuries. Which thing he in no less wise did, than Maximinus, as Eusebius in his eighth Book and fifteenth Chapter thereto to affirm. And Platina declareth in the life of Marcellus the Bishop, that he banished a certain Noble Woman of Rome, because she gave her goods to the Church.

A lively pattern of an Hypocrite.

Eusseb. lib. 8. cap. 15.

Thus by the grievous tyranny and unspeakable wickedness of this Maxentius, the Citizens and Senators of Rome, being much grieved and oppressed, sent their complaints with Letters unto Constantinus, with much sute and most hearty petitions, desiring him to help and release their Country and City of Rome: who hearing and understanding their miserable and pitiful state, and grieved therewith not a little, first sendeth by Letters to Maxentius, desiring and exhorting him to refrain his corrupt doings, and great cruelty. But when no Letters nor exhortations would prevail, at the length pitying the woful case of the Romans, gathered together his power and Army in Britain and France, therewith to repress the violent rage of that Tyrant: thus Constantinus sufficiently appointed with strength of Men, but especially with strength of God, entred his journey coming towards Italy, which was about the last year of the Persecution, three hundred and eighteen. Maxentius understanding of the coming of Constantinus, and trusting more to his devilish Art of Magick, than to the good will of his Subjects, which he little deserved, durst not shew himself out of the City, nor encounter with him in the open field, but with privy Garrisons laid in wait for him by the way, in sundry straits as he should come. With whom Constantinus had divers skirmishes, and by the power of the Lord did ever vanquish them and put them to flight. Notwithstanding Constantinus yet was in no great comfort, but in great care and dread in his mind (approaching now near unto Rome) for the Magical Charms and Sorceries of Maxentius, wherewith he had vanquished before Severus sent by Galerius against him, as hath been declared, which made also Constantinus the more afraid. Wherefore being in great doubt and perplexity in himself, and revolving many things in his mind, what help he might have against the operations of his charming, which used to cut Women great with Child, to take his devilish Charms by the intrails of the Infants, with such other like feats of devillishness which he practised: these things (I say) Constantinus doubting and revolving in his mind, in his journey drawing toward the City, and casting up his eyes many times to Heaven, in the South part, about the going down of the Sun, saw a great brightness in Heaven, appearing in the similitude of a Cross, with certain Stars of equal bigness, giving this Inscription like Latine Letters, IN HOC VINCE, that is, In this overcome. Eusebius de vita Constant. lib. 2. Niceph. lib. 7. cap. 29. Eutrop. lib. 11. Sozom. lib. 1. cap. 3. Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 2. Ursperg. Chronic. Paul. Diacon. lib. 11. This miraculous Vision to be true, for the more credit, Eusebius Pamphilus in his first Book De vita Constantini, doth witness moreover, that he had heard the said Constantinus himself oftentimes report, and also to swear this to be true and certain, which he did see with his own eyes in Heaven, and also his Souldiers about him. At the light whereof when he was greatly astonied, and consulting with his Men upon the meaning thereof, behold in the Night season in his sleep, Christ appeared to him with the sign of the same Cross which he had seen before, bidding him to make the figuration thereof, and to carry it in his Wars before him, and so should he have the Victory.

This Vision reported and testified by Constantine himself to be true.

An admiration concerning the material Cross not to be worshipped, but to be a memorial to bring to remembrance him which was crucified.

¶ Wherein is to be noted (good Reader) that this sign of the Cross, and these Letters added withal, In hoc vince: was given to him of God, not to induce any superstitious worship or opinion of the Cross, as though the Cross it self had any such power or strength in it, to obtain Victory: but only to bear the meaning of another thing, that is to be an admonition to him, to seek and aspire to the knowledge and faith of him, which was crucified upon the Cross for the salvation of him, and of all the World, and so to set forth the glory of his Name, as afterwards it came to pass. This by the way. Now to the matter.

Eusseb. lib. 8. cap. 5.

The next day following after this Nights Vision, Constantinus caused a Cross after the same figuration to be made of Gold and precious stone, and to be borne before him instead of his Standard, and so with much hope of victory, and great confidence, as one armed from Heaven, speedeth himself toward his enemy. Against whom Maxentius being constrained perforce to issue out of the City, sendeth all his power to joyn with him in the field beyond the River of Tyber, where Maxentius craftily breaking down the Bridge called Pons Milvius, caused another deceitful Bridge to be made of Boats and Whirries, being joyned together, and covered over with Boards and Planks, in manner of a Bridge, thinking therewith to take Constantine as in a trap. But here it came to pass which in the seventh Psalm is written, He digged a pit, and fell therein himself: let his working return upon his own head, and his unrighteousness upon his own pate. Which here in this Maxentius was rightly verified. For after the two Hosts did meet, he being not able to sustain the force of Constantine fighting under the Cross of Christ against him, was put to such a flight, and driven to such an exigent, that in retiring back, for haste thinking to get the City, upon the same Bridge which he did lay for Constantine, was overturned by the fall of his Horse into the bottom of the flood, and there with the weight of his Armour, he with a great part of his beaten men, were drowned. Representing unto us the like example of Pharaoh and his Host drowned in the Red Sea, who not unaptly seemeth to bear a Prophetical figuration of this Maxentius. For as the Children of Israel were in long thraldome and Persecution in Egypt under Tyrants there, till the drowning of this Pharaoh their last Persecuter: so was this Maxentius and Maximinus and Licinius the last Persecuter in the Roman Monarchy of the Christians, whom this Constantinus, fighting under the Cross of Christ did vanquish and set the Christians at liberty, who before had bin persecuted now three hundred years in Rome, as hath been hitherto in this History declared.

Wherefore as the Israelites with their Moses at the drowning of their Pharaoh, sung gloriously unto the Lord, who miraculously had cast down the Horse and the Horsemen into the Sea, so no less rejoycing and exceeding gladness was here, to see the glorious hand of the Lord Christ fighting with his People, and vanquishing his Enemies and Persecuters.

Exo. 15. The like form of the Old Testament verified in the new.

In Histories we read of many Victories and great Conquests gotten: yet we never read, nor ever shall, of any Victory so wholsome, so commodious, so opportune to Mankind as this was, which made an end of so much bloodshed, and obtained so much liberty and life to the Posterity of so many generations. For albeit that some Persecution was yet stirring in the East Countrys by Maximinus and Licinius, as shall be declared; yet in Rome, and in all the West parts, no Martyr died after this heavenly Victory gotten. And also in the East parts the said Constantinus with the said Cross borne before him, consequently upon the same, so vanquished the Tyrants, and so established the peace of the Church, that for the space of a just thousand years after that, we read of no set Persecution against the Christians, unto the time of John Wickliffe, when the Bishops of Rome began with fire to persecute the true Members of Christ, as in further processe of this History (Christ granting) shall appear. So happy, so glorious (as I said) was this Victory of Constantine, [illegible] named

For the joy and gladness whereof, the Citizens who had sent for him before, with exceeding triumph brought him into the City of Rome, where he with the Cross was most honourably received, and celebrated the space of seven days together, having moreover in the Market-place, his image set up, holding in his right hand the sign of the Cross, with this Inscription: Hoc salutari signo, veraci fortitudini indicio civitatem nostram jugo tyranni ereptam liberavi: that is, With this wholesome sign, the true token of fortitude, I have rescued and delivered our City from the yoke of the Tyrant.

Eusseb. lib. 9. cap. 9.

Eusebius, ibid.

By this heavenly Victory of Constantinus, and by the death of Maxentius no little tranquility came unto the Church of Christ. Although notwithstanding in the East together quieted, but that some tail thereof in those parts remained for the space of two or three years. But of this we mind to speak (Christ willing) hereafter. In the mean season to return again to the West parts here in Europe, where Constantinus then had most to do, great tranquility followed, and long continued in the Church without any open slaughter for a thousand years together (to the time of John Wickliff and Waldenses, as is before touched) by the means of the godly beginning of good Constantine, who with his fellow Licinius, being now established in their dominion, effsoons set forth their general Proclamation or Edict, not constraining therein any man to any Religion, but giving liberty to all men, both for the Christians to persist in their profession without any danger, and for other men freely to adjoyn with them, whosoever pleased. Which thing was very well taken, and highly allowed of the Romans, and all wise men. The Copy of the Edict or Constitution here ensueth.

The Copy of the Emperial Constitution of Constantinus and Licin. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

NOr long agone We weighing with Our Selves, that the liberty and freedom of Religion ought not in any case to be prohibited, but that free leave ought to be given to every man to do therein according to his will and mind, We have given Commandment to all men to qualifie matters of Religion as they themselves thought good, and that also the Christians should keep the Opinions and Faith of their Religion: but because that many and sundry Opinions by the same our first licence, strange and increase through such liberty granted, We thought good manifestly to add thereunto, and make plain such things whereby perchance some of them in time to come, may from such their observance be let or hindred. When therefore by prosperous success, I Constantinus Augustus, and I Licinius Augustus came to Mediolanum, and there sate in Council upon such things as served for the utility and profit of the Commonweal, these things amongst others We thought would be beneficial to all men, yea and before all other things We purposed to establish those things wherein the true reverence and worship of God is comprehended; that is, to give unto the Christians free choice to follow what Religion they think good, and whereby the same sincerity and celestial grace, which is in every place received, may also be imbraced and accepted of all Our loving Subjects. According therefore unto this our pleasure upon good advisement and sound judgment We have Decreed, that no man so hardly be denied to choose and follow the Christian Observance or Religion: but that this liberty be given to every man, that he may apply his mind to what Religion he thinketh meet himself, whereby God may perform upon us all his accustomed care and goodness. To the intent therefore you might know that this is Our pleasure, We thought it necessary this to write unto you, whereby all such errors and opinions being removed, which in Our former Letters (being sent unto you in the behalf of the Christians) are contained, and which seem very undiscreet and contrary to our clemency, may be made frustrate and annihilate. Now therefore firmly and freely We will and command, that every man have a free liberty to observe the Christian Religion, and that without any grief or molestation he may be suffered to do the same. These things have we thought good to signifie unto you by as plain words as we may, that we have given to the Christians free and absolute power to keep and use their Religion. And for so much as this liberty is absolutely given of us unto them, to use and exercise their former observance, if any be disposed, it is manifest that the same behoveth much to establish the publick tranquility of our time, every man to have licence and liberty to use and choose what Kind of worshipping he list himself. And this is done of us only for the intent, that We would have no man to be enforced to one Religion more than another. And this thing also among st others We have provided for the Christians, that they may have again the possession of their places, in which heretofore they have been accustomed to make their Assemblies: so that if any have bought or purchased the same either of us, or of any other, the same places without either money or other recompence, forthwith and without delay We will to be restored again unto the said Christians. And if any man have obtained the same by gift from Us, and shall require any recompence to be made to them in their behalf, then let the Christians repair to the President (being the Judge appointed for that place) that consideration may be had of those men by Our benignity: All which things We will and command, that you see to be given and restored freely, and with diligence, unto the society of the Christians, all delay set apart. And because the Christians themselves are understood to have had not only those places wherein they were accustomed to resort together, but certain other peculiar places also, not being private to any one man, but belonging to the rights of their Congregation and Society: you shall see also all those to be restored unto the Christians, that is to say, to every fellowship and company of them, according to the Decree, whereof We have made mention, all delay set apart, Provided that the Order We have taken in the mean time be observed, that if any (taking no recompence) shall restore the same Lands and Possessions, they shall not misdoubt, but be sure to be saved harmless by Us. In all these things sit shall be your part to imploy your diligence in the behalf of the foresaid company of the Christians, whereby this our Commandment may speedily be accomplished, and also in this case by Our Clemency the common and publick peace may be preserved. For undoubtedly by this means, as before We have said, the good will and favour of God towards Us (whereof in many cases We have had good experience) shall always continue with us. And to the intent that this Our Constitution may be notified to all men, it shall be requisite that the Copy of these Our Letters be set up in all places, that Men may read and know the same, lest any should be ignorant thereof.

By these Histories I doubt not (good Reader) but thou dost right well consider and behold with thy self the marvellous working of Gods mighty power; to see so many Emperors at one time conspired and confederate together against the Lord and Christ his anointed, whose Names before we have recited, as Diocletian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maximius, Maximinus, Severus, Licinius, who having the subjection of the whole World under their Dominion, did bend and extend their whole might and devices, to extirpate the Name of Christ, and of all Christians. Wherein if the power of Man could have prevailed, what could they not do? or what could they do more than they did? If policy or devices could have served, what policy was there lacking? If torments or pains of death could have helped, what cruelty of torment by man could be invented, which was not attempted? If Laws, Edicts, Proclamations, written not only in Tables, but ingraven in brass, could have flood, all this was practised against the weak Christians. And yet notwithstanding, to see how no counsel can stand against the Lord, note here how all these be gone, and yet Christ and his Church doth stand. First, of the taking away of Maximinian you have heard, also of the death of Severus, of the drowning moreover of Maxentius, enough hath been said. What a terrible Plague was upon Galerius, consuming his Privy Members with Lice, hath been also described. How Diocletian the the Quondam being at Salona, hearing of the proceedings of Conſtantinus, and this Edict, either for ſorrow died, or as ſome ſay, did poyſon himſelf. Only Maximinus now in the Eaſt parts remained alive, who bare a deadly hatred againſt the Chriſtians, and no leſs expreſſed the ſame with mortal Perſecution, to whom Conſtantine and Licinius cauſed this Conſtitution of theirs to be delivered. At the ſight whereof although he was ſomewhat appaled, and defeated of his purpoſe: yet for ſo much as he ſaw himſelf too weak to reſiſt the authority of Conſtantinus and Licinius the ſuperiour Princes, he diſſembled his counterfeit piety, as though he himſelf had tendered the quiet of the Chriſtians, directing down a certain Decree in the behalf of the Chriſtians, wherein he pretendeth to write to Sabinus aforementioned, firſt repeating unto him the former Decree of Dioceſian and Maximinian in few words, with the commandment therein contained touching the Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians. After that, he reciteth the Decree which he himſelf made againſt them, which came firſt to the Emperial Dignity in the Eaſt part joyned with Conſtantinus. Then the countermand of another Decree of his again, for the reſcuing of the Chriſtians, with ſuch feigned and pretenſed cauſes, as is in the ſame to be ſeen. After that, he declareth how he coming to Nicomedia, at the ſuit and ſupplication of the Citizens (which he alſo feigned, as may appear before) he applying to their ſuit, revoked that his former Edict, and granted them that no Chriſtian ſhould dwell within their City or Territories. Upon which Sabinus alſo had given forth his Letters, rehearſing withal the general countermand ſent forth by him, for the Perſecution again of the Chriſtians. Laſt of all now he ſendeth down again another ſurrecountermand, with the cauſes therein contained, touching the ſafety of the Chriſtians, and tranquility of them: commanding Sabinus to publiſh the ſame. Which Edict of his is at large ſet forth of Euſebius lib.9. cap.9. But this ſurrecountermand he then diſſembled, as he had done in the other before. Howbeit ſhortly after, he making Wars, and fighting a Battel with Licinius, wherein he loſt the Victory, coming home again, took great indignation againſt the Prieſts and Prophets of his Gods, whom before that time he had great regard unto, and honoured: upon whoſe anſwers he truſting, and depending upon their inchantments, began his War againſt Licinius. But after that he perceived himſelf to be deceived by them, as by wicked inchanters and deceivers, and ſuch as had betrayed his ſafety and perſon, he killed and put them to death. And he ſhortly after, oppreſſed with a certain diſeaſe, glorified the God of the Chriſtians, and made a moſt abſolute law for the ſafety and preſervation of them, with franchiſe and liberty: the Copy whereof enſueth:

IMperator Cæſar, Gaius, Valerius, Maximinus, Germanicus, Pius, Fortunatus, Auguſtus, It is neceſſary that We always carefully provide and ſee unto the benefit and commodity of ſuch as be Our Subjects, and to exhibite ſuch things unto them, whereby they may beſt obtain the ſame. But we ſuppoſe that there are none of you ſo ignorant, but know and underſtand what things make beſt for the proſit and commodity of the Commonweal, and beſt pleaſe every mans diſpoſition. But it is meet and convenient that every man have recourſe to that which they have ſeen done before their eyes, and that all ſorts of men conſider the ſame, and bear it in their minds. When therefore, and that before this time, it came to our knowledge, upon the occaſion that Dioclesianus, and Maximinianus, our progenitors of famous memory, commanded the Aſſemblies and Meetings of the Chriſtians to be cut off, there were many of them ſpoiled and robbed of our Officials; which thing we alſo perceive is now put in practice againſt our Subjects, that they in like caſe may be ſpoyled of their Goods and Subſtance, which thing chiefly to prevent is our only endeavour. By our Letters ſent to the Governors of our Provinces the year paſt, we ordained, that if any man were diſpoſed to lean unto the Chriſtian Religion, he might without any injury done unto him, accompliſh his deſire, neither to be of any man either let or moleſted, and that he might without any fear or ſuſpicion, do whatſoever he therein thought good. But now alſo we underſtand that there be certain Judges which have neglected our commandment, and have put Our Subjects in doubt, whether that hath been Our pleaſure or not; which thing they did, that ſuch men might be the better adviſed, how they entred into ſuch Religion: wherein they followed their own phantaſie. To the intent therefore, that after this, all ſuſpicion, doubt and fear may be taken away: We have thought good to publiſh this our Edict, whereby it may be made manifeſt to every man, that it ſhall be lawful for all ſuch as will follow that Religion, by the benefit of this Our Grant and Letters Patents, to uſe what Religion they like beſt: And alſo hereby we grant A large Grant of Maximinus to the Chriſtians. to them licence to build them Oratories or Temples. And furthermore, that this Our Grant may more amply extend unto them, We vouchſafe to Appoint and Ordain, That whatſoever Lands and Subſtance before belonging and appertaining to the Chriſtians, and by the commandment of our Predeceſſor were tranſpoſed to our Revenue and Exchequer, or elſe in the poſſeſſion of any City, by means of the franchiſes of the ſame, or elſe otherwiſe ſold or given to any man: All and every parcel thereof We command ſhall be reſtored unto the proper uſe of the Chriſtians again, whereby they may all have in this matter more experience of our godly devotion and providence. Euſeb.lib.9. cap. 10.

Maximinus then being conquered of Licinius, and alſo plagued with an incurable Diſeaſe in the Guts, ſent by the hand of God, was compelled by torments and adverſity to confeſs the true God, whom before he regarded not, and to write this Edict in the favour of thoſe Chriſtians whom before he did perſecute. Thus the Lord doth make many times his enemies, be they never ſo ſtern and ſtout, at length to ſtoop, and mauger their hearts to confeſs him, as this Maximinus here did, who not long after, by the vehemency of his Diſeaſe ended his life. Whereby no more Tyrants now were left alive, to trouble the Church, but only Licinius. Of which Licinius and of his Perſecutions ſtirred up in the Eaſt parts againſt the Saints of God, now remaineth in order of ſtory to proſecute.

The end and death of Maximinus.

This Licinius being a Dane born, and made firſt Ceſar by Galerius, as is above ſpecified, was afterwards joyned with Conſtantinus in government of the Empire, and in ſetting forth the Edicts, which before we have deſcribed: although it ſeemeth all this to be done of him with a diſſembling mind. For ſo is he in all Hiſtorys deſcribed, to be a man paſſing all others in deſire of inſatiable riches, given to lechery, haſty, ſtubborn and furious. To Learning he was ſuch an enemy, that he named the ſame a poyſon and a common peſtilence, and eſpecially the knowledge of the Laws. He thought no Vice worſe became a Prince than Learning, becauſe he himſelf was unlearned. Eutropius, Lætius, Ignatius, Euſeb.lib.8. cap.13.

Euſeb.lib.8. cap.13.

There was between him and Conſtantinus in the beginning great familiarity, and ſuch agreement, that Conſtantinus gave unto him his Siſter Conſtantia in Matrimony, as Aurelius Victor writeth. Neither would any man have thought him to have been any other Religion than Conſtantinus was of, he ſeemed in all things ſo well to agree with him. Whereupon he made a Decree with Conſtantinus, in the behalf of the Chriſtians, as we have ſhewed: Euſebius lib. 9. cap. 9. And ſuch was Licinius in the beginning; but after arming himſelf with Tyranny, began to conſpire againſt the perſon of Conſtantinus, of whom he had received ſo great benefits; neither favourable to the law of Nature, nor mindful of his Oaths, his Blood, nor promiſes. But when he conſidered that in his Conſpiracies he nothing prevailed, for that he ſaw Conſtantinus was preſerved and ſafely defended of God: and partly being puffed up with the Victory againſt Maximinus, he began vehemently to hate him, and not only to reject the Chriſtian Religion, but alſo deadly to hate the ſame. He faid he would become an enemy to the Chriſtians, for that in their Aſſemblies and Meetings they prayed not for him, but for Conſtantinus. Therefore firſt by little and little, and that ſecretly, he went about to wrong and hurt the Chriſtians, and baniſhed them his Court, which never were by any means prejudicial to his Kingdom. Then he commanded that all thoſe ſhould be deprived which were Knights of the honourable Order, unleſs they would do

Firſt, that for no cauſe the Biſhops ſhould in any matter communicate together: neither that any man ſhould come at the Churches next unto them, or to call any aſſemblies, and conſult for the neceſſary matters and utility of the Church.

After, that the Men and Women together ſhould not come in companies to pray, nor that the Women ſhould come in thoſe places where they uſed to preach and read the Word of God, neither that they ſhould be after that inſtructed any more of the Biſhop, but ſhould chooſe out ſuch Women amongſt them as ſhould inſtruct them. The third moſt cruel and wickedeſt of all was, that none ſhould help and ſuccour thoſe that were caſt in priſon, nor ſhould beſtow any Alms or Charity upon them, though they ſhould die for hunger; and they which ſhewed any compaſſion upon thoſe that were condemned to death, ſhould be as greatly puniſhed, as they to whom they ſhewed the ſame ſhould be. Euſebius libro primo de vita Conſtantini. Theſe were the moſt horrible Conſtitutions of Licinius, which went beyond and paſſed the bounds of nature.

After this he uſed violence againſt the Biſhops, but yet not openly, for fear of Conſtantinus, but privily and by conſpiracy, by which means he ſlew thoſe that were the worthieſt men amongſt the Doctors and Prelates. And about Amaſea and other Cities of Pontus, he raced the Churches even with the ground. Otherſome he ſhut up, that no man ſhould come after their accuſtomed manner to pray and worſhip God; and therefore, as we ſaid before, his Conſcience accuſing him, all this he did, for that he ſuſpected they prayed for Conſtantinus, and not at all for him. And from this place in the Eaſt parts to the Lybians, which bordered upon the Egyptians, the Chriſtians durſt not aſſemble and come together for the diſpleaſure of Licinius: which he had conceived againſt them. Sozomenus lib. 1. cap. 2.

Furthermore, the flattering Officers that were under him, thinking by this means to pleaſe him, ſlew and made out of the way many Biſhops, and without any cauſe put them to death, as though they had been homicides and hainous offenders; and ſuch rigorouſneſs uſed they towards ſome of them, that they cut their bodies into gobbets and ſmall pieces in manner of a Butcher, and after that threw them into the Sea to feed the Fiſhes, Euſebius lib. 10. cap.8. What ſtall we ſpeak of the exiles and confiſcations of good and vertuous Men? For he took by violence every mans ſubſtance, and cared not by what means he came by the ſame; but threatned them with death, unleſs they would forgo the ſame. He baniſhed thoſe which had committed none evil at all. He commanded that both Gentlemen and Men of Honour ſhould be made out of the way; neither yet herewith content, but gave their daughters that were unmarried to Varlets and wicked ones to be defloured. And Licinius himſelf (although that by reaſon of his years his body was ſpent) yet ſhamefully did he vitiate many Women, Mens Wives and Maids. Euſeb. lib. 1. de vita Conſtantini. Which cruel outrage of him cauſed many godly men of their own accord to forſake their houſes; and it was alſo ſeen, that the Woods, Fields, deſert places and Mountains were faign to be the habitations and reſting-places of the poor and miſerable Chriſtians. Euſeb. lib. 10. cap.14. Of thoſe worthy men and famous Martyrs which in this Perſecution found the way to Heaven, Nicephorus lib.7. cap.10. firſt ſpeaketh of Theodorus, who firſt being hanged upon the Croſs, had Nails thruſt into his Arm-pits, and after that, his head ſtricken off. Beſides theſe were in the City of Sebaſtia forty worthy men, and Chriſtian Soldiers in the vehement cold time of Winter ſowſed and drowned in a Horſe-Pond, when Locias as yet, of whom we ſpoke before, and Agricolaus executing the Sheriffs office under Licinius in the Eaſt parts, were alive, and were in great eſtimation, for inventing of new and ſtrange torments againſt the Chriſtians. Theſe things writeth Nicephorus. Alſo Sozomenus in his ninth Book and ſecond Chapter maketh mention of the ſame Martyrs. And Baſilius in a certain Oration ſeemeth to intreat of their Hiſtory, ſaying that in the circumſtances he ſomewhat varieth. And ſurely Licinius was determined, for that the firſt face of this Perſecution fell out according to his deſire, to have overrun all the Chriſtians, to which thing neither counſel, nor good will, nor yet opportunity perchance wanted, unleſs God had brought Conſtantinus into thoſe parts where he governed; where, in the Wars which he himſelf began (knowing right well that Conſtantinus had intelligence of his Conſpiracy and Treaſon) joyning Battel with him he was overcome.

Divers Battels between them were fought, the firſt fought in Hungary, where Licinius was overthrown; then he fled into Macedonia, and repairing his Army was again diſcomfited. Finally, being vanquiſhed both by Sea and Land, he laſtly, at Nicomedia yielded himſelf to Conſtantine, and was commanded to live a private life in Theſſalia, where at length he was ſlain by the Souldiers.

Licinius ſi-vercome by Battel by Conſtantine.

Thus have ye heard the end and concluſion of all the ſeven Tyrants which were the authors and workers of this tenth and laſt Perſecution againſt the true People of God. The chief Captain and incentor of which Perſecution was Dioceſian, who died at Salena, as ſome ſay, by his own poyſon, in the year of our Lord three hundred and nineteen. The next was Maximinian, who (as is ſaid) was hanged of Conſtantine at Maſilia, about the year of our Lord three hundred and ten. Then died Galerius, plagued with an horrible Diſeaſe ſent of God. Severus was ſlain by Maximinian, father of Maxentius the wicked Tyrant, who was overcome and vanquiſhed of Conſtantine, in the year of our Lord three hundred and eighteen. Maximinus the ſixth Tyrant not long after, who being overcome by Licinius, died about the year of our Lord three hundred and twenty. Laſtly, how this Licinius was overcome by Conſtantine and ſlain, in the year of our Lord, Three hundred twenty and four, is before declared. Only Conſtantius the Father of Conſtantine being a good and a godly Emperor, died in the third year of the Perſecution, in the year of our Lord Three hundred and ten, and was buried at York. After whom ſucceeded after his godly Father Conſtantinus, as a ſecond Moſes ſent and ſet up of God to deliver his people out of this ſo miſerable captivity, into liberty moſt joyful.

The end & death of the Tyrants which were the authors of this Tenth perſecution.

Here remaineth after the end of theſe Perſecutors thus deſcribed, to gather up the names and ſtories of certain particular Martyrs, which now are to be ſet forth worthy of ſpecial memory, for their ſingular conſtancy and fortitude, ſhewed in their ſufferings and cruel torments. The names of all which that ſuffered in this foreſaid tenth Perſecution, being in number infinite, in vertue moſt excellent, it is impoſſible here to comprehend; but the moſt notable, and in moſt approved Authors expreſſed, we thought here to inſert, for the more edification of other Chriſtians, which may and ought to look upon their examples, firſt beginning with Albanus, the firſt Martyr that ever in England ſuffered death for the name of Chriſt.

A brief ſtory of the moſt notable Martyrs of this Tenth Perſecution.

Albanus Martyr.

At what time Dioceſian and Maximinian the Pagan Emperors had directed out their Letters with all ſeverity for the perſecuting of the Chriſtians; Alban being then an Infidel, received into his houſe a certain Clerk, flying from the Perſecutors hands, whom when Alban beheld, continually both day and night to perſevere in watching and prayer, ſuddenly by the great mercy of God, he began to imitate the example of his faith and vertuous life; whereupon by little and little he being inſtructed by his wholeſome exhortation, and leaving the blindneſs of his Idolatry, became at length a perfect Chriſtian. And when the forenamed Clerk had lodged with him a certain time, it was informed the wicked Prince, that this good man and Confeſſor of Chriſt (not yet condemned to death) was harbour'd in Albans houſe, or very near unto him. Whereupon immediately he gave in charge to the Souldiers to make moſt diligent inquiſition of the matter. Who as ſoon as they came to the houſe of Alban the Martyr, he by and by putting on the apparel wherewith his gueſt and maſter was appa-relled (that is, a garment at that time used, named Caracalla) offered himself in the stead of the other to the soldiers; who binding him, brought him forthwith to the Judge. It fortuned that at that instant when blessed Alban was brought unto the Judge, they found the same Judge at the Altars offering sacrifice unto Devils, who as soon as he saw Alban, was straight ways in a great rage, for that he would presume of his own voluntary will, to offer himself to peril, and give himself a Prisoner to the Soldiers, for safeguard of his guest whom he harboured, and commanded him to be brought before the images of the Devils whom he worshipped having, For that thou hadst rather hide and convey away a Rebel, than to deliver him to the Officers, and that (as a contemner of our Gods) he should not suffer punishment and merit of his blasphemy; look what punishment he should have had, thou for him shalt suffer the same, if I perceive thee any whit to revolt from our manner of worshipping. But blessed Alban, who of his own accord had bewrayed to the Persecutors that he was a Christian, feared not at all the menaces of the Prince, but being armed with the spiritual armour, openly pronounced that he would not obey his commandment. Then said the Judge, Of what stock or kindred art thou come? Alban answered, What is that to you? of what stock soever I came of, if you desire to hear the verity of my Religion, I do ye to wit, that I am a Christian, and apply my self altogether to that calling. Then said the Judge, I would know thy name, and see thou tell me the same without delay. Then said he, My Parents named me Alban, and I worship the true and living God, which hath created all the World. Then said the Judge, fraught with fury, If thou wilt enjoy the felicity of this present life, do sacrifice (and that out of hand) to these mighty Gods: Alban replieth, These Sacrifices which ye offer unto Devils, can neither help them that offer the same, neither yet can they accomplish the desires and prayers of their suppliants; but rather shall they, whatsoever they be, that offer Sacrifice to these Idols, receive for their meed everlasting pains of Hell fire. The Judge when he heard these words, was passing angry, and commanded the tormentors to whip this holy Confessor of God, endeavouring to overcome the constancy of his heart with stripes, which had prevailed nothing with words. And when he was cruelly beaten, yet suffered he the same patiently, nay, rather joyfully for the Lords sake. Then when the Judge saw that he would not with torments be overcome, nor be reduced from the worship of Christian Religion, he commanded him to be beheaded.

The words of the Judge to Alban.

The constancy and zeal of Alban.

The confession of Alban.

The suffering and Martyrdom of Alban.

The rest that followeth of this story in the narration of Beda, as of drying up the River, as Alban went to the place of his execution; then of making a Well-spring in the top of the Hill, and of the falling out of the eyes of him that did behead him (with such other prodigious Miracles mentioned in his story) because they seem more Legend-like than Truth-like; again, because I see no great profit nor necessity in the relation thereof, I leave them to the free judgment of the Reader, to think of them as cause shall move him.

Superfluous Miracles in his story written by Beda omitted.

The like estimation I have of the long story, wherein is written at large, a fabulous discourse of all the doings and Miracles of St. Alban, taken out of the Library of St. Albans, compiled (as there is said) by a certain Pagan, who (as he saith) afterward went to Rome, there to be baptised. But because in the beginning or Prologue of the Book, the said Writer maketh mention of the ruinous Walls of the Town of Verolamium, containing five miles of Albanus, and of his bitter punishments; which Walls were then falling down for age, at the writing of the said Book, as he saith; thereby it seemeth this story to be written a great while after the Martyrdom of Alban, either by a Britain, or by an English man. If he were a Britain, how then did the Latine Translation take it out of the English Tongue, as in the Prologue he himself doth testifie: If he were an English man, how then did he go up to Rome for Baptism, being a Pagan, when he might have been baptised among the Christian Britains more near at home.

The legend of St. Alban disproved.

But among all other evidences and declarations sufficient to disprove this Legendary Story of Saint Alban, nothing maketh more against it, than the very story it self: as where he bringeth in the head of the holy Martyr to speak unto the people after it was smitten off from the body. Also where he bringeth in the Angels going up, and coming down in a Pillar of Fire, and singing all the night long. Item, in the River which he saith St. Alban made dry, sixth as were drowned in the same before in the bottom were found alive. With other such like Monkish-Miracles and gross fables, wherewith these Abby-Monks were wont in times past to deceive the Church of God, and to beguile the whole World for their own advantage. Notwithstanding this I write not to any derogation of the blessed and faithful Martyr of God, who was the first that I did ever find in this Realm, to suffer Martyrdom for the testimony of Christ. And worthy no doubt of condign condemnation, especially of us here in this Land; whose Christian Faith in the Lord, and Charity towards his neighbour, I pray God all we may follow. As also I wish moreover, that the stories both of him, and of all other Christian Martyrs might have been delivered to us simple as they were, without the admixture of all these Abbey-like additions of Monkish-Miracles, wherewith they were wont to paint out the glory of such Saints to the most, by whose offerings they were accustomed to receive most advantage.

St. Alban the first Martyr in this Realm of England.

The Clergy as baldrich of Romanes.

The furie of the Saints enraged with him.

As touching the name of the Clerk mentioned in this story, whom Alban received into his house, I find in the English stories to be Amphibalus, although the Latine Authors name him not, who the same time flying into Wales, was also fetcht from thence again to the same Town of Verolamium, otherwise called Verlancaster, where he was Martyred, having his belly opened, and made to run about a stake, while all his bowels were drawn out, then thrust in with swords and daggers; and at last was stoned to death, as the forefaid Legend declareth.

Amphibalus Martyred. Fiens hift.

The Martyrdom of Amphibalus.

Moreover the same time with Alban suffered also two Citizens of the aforesaid City of Verlancaster, whose names were Aaron and Julius; beside others, whereof a great number the same time no doubt, did suffer, although our Chronicles of their names do make no rehearsal.

Aaron, Julius Martyrs.

The time of Martyrdom of this blessed Alban and the other, seemeth to be about the second or third year of this Tenth Persecution, under the Tyranny of Diocletian, and Maximinianus Herculius, bearing then the rule in England, about the year of our Lord three hundred and one, before the coming of Constantius to his Government. Where, by the way is to be noted, that this Realm of Britain being so christened before, yet never was touched with any other of the Nine Persecutions, before this Tenth Persecution of Diocletian and Maximinian. In which Persecution our stories and Polychronicon do record, that all Christianity almost in the whole Iland was destroyed, the Churches subverted, all Books of the Scripture burned, many of the faithful, both Men and Women were slain; among whom the first and chief Ring-leader (as hath been said) was Albanus. And thus much touching the Martyrs of Britain. Now from England to return again unto other Countries, where this Persecution did more vehemently rage; we will add hereunto (the Lord willing) the stories of others, although not of all that suffered in this Persecution, (which were impossible) but of certain moft principal, whose singular constancy in their strong torments are chiefly renowned in later Histories; beginning first with Romanus the notable and admirable Souldier and true Servant of Christ, whose History set forth in Prudentius, doth thus proceed; so lamentably by him described, that it will be hard for any man almost with dry cheeks to hear it.

Persecution in the Realm of Britain.

Pitiless Galerius with his grand Captain Asclepiades violently invaded the City of Antioch, intending by force of Arms to drive all Christians to renounce utterly their pure Religion. The Christians, as God would, were at that time congregated together, to whom Romanus hastily ran, declaring that the Wolves were at hand which would devour the Christian Flock: But fear not, faid he, neither let this imminent peril disturb you my brethren. Brought was it to pass, by the great grace of God working in Romanus, that old Men and Matrons, Fathers and Mothers, young Men and Maidens were all of one will and mind, moft ready to shed ther blood in defence of their Christian profession. Word was brought unto the Captain, that the band of armed souldiers was not able to wreft the staff of faith out of the hand of the armed congregation, and all by reason reason that one Romanus so mightily did incourage them, that they ftick not to offer their naked throats, wishing gloriously to die for the name of their Christ. Seek out that Rebel (quoth the Captain) and bring him to me that he may answer for the whole Sect. Apprehended he was, and bound as a Sheep appointed to the Slaughter-house, was presented to the Emperor, who with wrathful countenance beholding him, faid, What? Art thou the Author of this Sedition? Art thou the cause why so many shall lose their lives? By the Gods I swear thou shalt smart for it, and first in thy flesh shalt thou suffer the paines, wherewnto thou hast incouraged the hearts of thy fellows. Romanus answered, Thy sentence, O Emperor, I joyfully embrace, I refuse not to be sacrificed for my brethren and that by as cruel means as thou mayst invent: and whereas thy Souldiers were repelled from the Christian Congregation, that so hapned, because it lay not in Idolaters and worshippers of Devils, to enter into the holy house of God, and to pollute the place of true prayer. Then Asclepiades, wholly inflamed with this stout answer, commanded him to be truffed up, and his bowels drawn out. The Executioners themselves more pitiful in heart than the Captain, faid, Nor so, Sir, this man is of Noble Parentage, unlawful is it for us a Nobleman to so unnoble a deatb. Scourge him then with Whips (quoth the Captain) with knaps of lead at the ends. Instead of tears, sighs and groans, Romanus fung Pfalms all the time of his whipping, requiring them not to favour him for Nobility sake; Not the blood of my Progenitors (faid he) but Christian Profession maketh me Noble. Then with great power of Spirit he inveighed against the Captain, laughing to scorn the false Gods of the Heathen, with the idolatrous worshipping of them, affirming the God of the Christians to be the true God that created Heaven and Earth, before whose Judicial Seat all Nations shall appear. But the wholesome words of the Martyr were as oyl to the fire of the Captains fury. The more the Martyr spake, the madder was he, insomuch that he commanded the Martyrs sides to be lanced with Knives, until the bones appeared white again. Sorry am I, O Captain, (quoth the Martyr) not for that my flesh shall be thus cut and mangled, but for thy cause am I sorrowful, who being corrupted with damnable errors, seducest others. The second time he preached at large the living God, and the Lord Jesus Christ his welbeloved Son, eternal life through faith in his blood, expressing therewith the abomination of Idolatry, with a vehement exhortation to worship and adore the living God. At these words Asclepiades commanded the tormentors to strike Romanus on the mouth, that his teeth being stricken out, his pronunciation at least wise might be impaired. The commandment was obeyed, his face buffeted, his Eye-lids torn with their Nails, his Cheeks scotched with Knives, the Skin of his Beard was plucked by little and little from the flesh; finally, his seemly Face was wholly defaced. The meek Martyr faid, I thank thee O Captain, that thou hast opened unto me many mouths, wherein I may preach my Lord and Saviour Christ. Look how many Wounds I have, so many Mouths I have lauding and praising God. The Captain astonished with this singular constancy, commanded them to cease from the tortures. He threatneth cruel fire, he reviileth the noble Martyr, he blaspheneth God, saying, Thy crucified Christ is but a yesterdays God, the Gods of the Gentiles are of most antiquity.

Antiquity alledged of the Pagans.

Here again Romanus taking good occasion, made a long Oration of the Eternity of Christ, of his Humane Nature, of the Death and Satisfaction of Christ for all Mankind. Which done, he faid, Give me a Child, O Captain, but seven years of age, which age is free from malice and other vices, wherewith riper age is commonly infected, and thou shalt hear what he will say. His request was granted. A pretty boy was called out of the multitude, and fet before him. Tell me my babe (quoth the Martyr) whether thou think it reason that we worship one Christ, and in Christ one Father, or else that we worship infinite Gods? Unto whom the Babe answered, That certainly, whatsoever it be that Men affirm to be God, must needs be one; which with one, is one and the same; and in as much as this one is Christ of necessity Christ must be the true God; for that there be many Gods, we children cannot believe. The Captain hereat clean amazed, faid,

The confession of a child against Idolatry.

Thou young Villain and Traitor, where, and of whom learnedst thou this lesson? Of my mother (quoth the child) with whose milk I sucked in this Lesson, that I must believe in Christ. The mother was called, and she gladly appeared. The Captain commanded the Child to be horled up and scourged. The pitiful beholders of this pitiless act, could not temper themselves from tears; the joyful and glad mother alone flood by with dry cheeks: yea she rebuked her sweet Babe for craving a draught of cold water, she charged him to thirst after the Cup that the infants of Bethlehem once drank of, forgetting their Mothers Milk and Paps; she willed him to remember little Isaac, who beholding the Sword wherewith, and the Altar whereon he should be sacrificed, willingly proffered his tender Neck to the dint of his Fathers Sword. Whilst this counsel was in giving, the butcherly tormentor plucket the skin from the Crown of his head hair and all. The Mother cried, Suffer my child, anon thou shalt paft to him that will adorn thy naked head with a Crown of eternal glory. The mother counselleth, the child is counselled; the mother incourageth, the babe is incouraged, and received the stripes with smiling countenance. The Captain perceiving the Child invincible, and himself vanquished, committeth the filly foul, the blessed babe, the child unchenilled, to the ftinking Prison, commanding the torments of Romanus to be renewed and increased, as chief author of this evil.

Thus was Romanus brought forth again to new ftripes, the punishments to be renewed and received upon his old fores, in so much as the bare bones appeared, the flesh all torn away; wherein no pity was shewed, but the raging Tyrant puffing out of his blasphemous mouth, like a mad-man these words, cried out to the tormentors, saying:

Where is (quoth the Captain) Where is your might? What? are ye not able one body to spill? Scant meet it, so weak is it, stand upright: And yet in spite of us, shall it live still?

The cruel words of the Tyrant.

The Griph with Talen, the Dog with his Tooth, Could soon, ye daftards, this corps rent and tear: He scorneth our Gods in all that he doth, Cut, prick and pounce him, no longer forbear.

Yea, no longer could the Tyrant forbear, but needs he must draw nearer to the sentence of death. Is it painful to thee (faith he) to tarry so long alive? A flaming fire, doubt thou not, shall be prepared for thee by and by, wherein thou and that boy, thy fellow of Rebellion shall be consumed into ashes. Romanus and the Babe were led to the place of execution. As they laid hands on Romanus, he looked back, saying, I appeal from this thy Tyranny, O Judge unjuft, unto the righteous Throne of Christ that supreme Judge; not because I fear thy cruel torments and mercileft handlings, but that thy judgments may be known to be cruel and bloody. Now when they were come to the place, the tormentors required the child of the mother, for she had taken it up in her Arms; and she only kissing it, delivered the Babe; Farewel, she faid, my sweet child. And as the Hangman applied his Sword to the babes neck, she sang on this manner:

The Clergies cruelty against Christ.

All laud and praise with heart and voice,
O Lord we yield to thee:
To whom the death of all thy Saints,
We know moft dear to be.

Nature overcome of Religion.

The innocents head being cut off, the mother wrapped it up in her garment, and laid it on her breast. On the other side a mighty fire was made, whereinto Romanus was cast, who said that he should not burn: wherewith a great storm arose (if it be true) and quenched the fire. The Captain gave in commandment that his Tongue should be cut out. Out was it plucked by the hard roots and cut off: nevertheless he spake, saying, He that speaketh Christ, shall never want a tongue; think not that the voice that uttereth Christ, hath need of the tongue to be the Minister. The Captain at this, built out of his Wit, bare in hand that the Hang-man deceived the fight of the People by some subtil sleight and crafty conveyance. Not so (quoth the Hangman) if you suffer't my deed, open his mouth, and diligently search the roots of his tongue. The Captain at length being confounded with the fortitude and courage of the Martyr, straitly commanded him to be brought back into the prison, and there to be strangled. Where his forrowful life and pains being ended, he now enjoyeth quiet rest in the Lord, with perpetual hope of his miserable body to be reftored again, with his soul, into a better life, where no Tyrant shall have any power: Prudentius in hymnis de coronis Martyrum.

Gordius was a Citizen of Cæsarea, a worthy Souldier, and Captain of an hundred men. He in the time of extream Persecution, refusing any longer to execute his charge, did chooſe of his own accord willing exile, and lived in the desert many years a religious and a solitary life. But upon a certain day, when a solemn Feast of Mars was celebrated in the City of Cæsarea, and much People were assembled in the Theater to behold the Games, he left the desert, and got him up into the chief place of the Theater, and with a loud voice uttered this saying of the Apostle, Behold I am found of them which sought me not, and to those which asked not for me have I openly appeared. By which words he let it to be understood, that of his own accord he came unto those Games. At this noise, the multitude little regarding the fights, looked about to see who it was that made such exclamation. As soon as it was known to be Gordius, and that the Crier had commanded silence, he was brought unto the Sheriff, who at that instant was present, and ordained the Games. When he was asked the question who he was, from whence, and for what occasion he came thither, he telleth the truth of every thing as it was; I am come, saith he, to publish, that I set nothing by your Decrees against the Christian Religion, but that I profeſs Jeſus Chriſt to be my hope and safety; and when I understood with what cruelty he handled other men, I took this as a fit time to accompliſh my desire. The Sheriff with these words was greatly moved, and revengeth all his displeasure upon poor Gordius, commanding the executioners to be brought out with scourges, while Gibbet, and whatsoever torments else might be deviſed. Whereunto Gordius answered, saying, that it should be to him an hinderance and damage, if he could not suffer and endure divers torments and punishments for Chriſt his cause. The Sheriff being more offended with his boldneſs, commanded him to feel as many kind of torments as there were. With all which, Gordius, notwithstanding, could not be mastered or overcome; but lifting up his eyes unto Heaven, fingeth this saying out of the Psalms, The Lord is my helper, I will not fear the thing that man can do to me: and also this saying, I will fear none evil, because thou Lord art with me.

Gordius of his own accord uttered himself to be a Christian.

Gordius brought to examination The confession of Gordius.

After this, he against himself provoketh the extremity of the tormentors, and blameth them if they favour him any thing at all. When the Sheriff saw that hereby he could win but little, he goeth about by gentleneſs and inticing words, to turn the ſtout and valiant mind of Gordius. He promiſeth to him great and large offers if he will deny Chriſt; as to make him a Captain of as many men as any other is, to give him riches, treasure, and what other thing soever he desireth. But in vain (as the Proverb is) pipeth the Minstrel to him that hath no ears to hear, for he deriding the foolish madneſs of the Magistrate saith, that it lieth not in him to place any in authority, which he worthy to have a place in Heaven. The Magistrate with these words throughly angred and vexed, prepared himself to his condemnation. Whom after that he had condemned, he caused to be had out of the City to be burnt. There run out of the City great multitudes by heaps to see him put to execution, some take him in their arms, and lovingly kiſs him, perſwading him to take a better way, and save himself, and that with weeping tears. To whom Gordius answered, Weep not I pray you for me, but rather for the enemies of God which always make War against the Christians; weep, I say, for them which prepare for us a fire, purchasing Hell fire for themselves in the day of vengeance; and ceaſe off further, I pray you, to moleſt and disquiet my setled mind. Truly (saith he) I am ready for the name of Chriſt, to suffer and endure a thousand deaths if need were. Some other came unto him, which perſwaded him to deny Chriſt with his mouth, and to keep his Conſcience to himself, My tongue (saith he) which by the goodneſs of God I have, cannot be brought to deny the author and giver of the same; for with the heart we believe unto righteousneſs, and with the tongue we confeſs unto salvation. Many more ſuch like words he ſpake; but eſpecially uttering to them ſuch matter, whereby he might perſwade the beholders to death, and to the deſire of Martyrdom. After all which, with a merry and glad countenance, never changing ſo much as his colour, he willingly gave himſelf to be burnt. Basilius in sermone in Gordium militem Cæsariensem.

None ought to deny Chriſt with his mouth, and confeſs him with his heart.

Not much unlike to the ſtory of Gordius is the ſtory alſo of Menas an Egyptian, who being likewiſe a Souldier by his profeſſion, in this Perſecution of Dioclesian forſook all, and went into the deſert, where a long time he gave himſelf to abſtinence, watching and meditation of the Scriptures. At length returning again to the City Cotus, there in the open Theater, as the people were occupied upon their Spectacles or Paſtimes, he with a loud voice openly proclaimed himſelf to be a Chriſtian, and upon the ſame was brought to Pyrrhus the Preſident; of whom he being demanded of his faith, made this anſwer, Convenient it is that I ſhould (ſaith he) confeſs God, in whom is light and no darkneſs, forſmuch as Paul doth teach that with heart we believe to righteouſneſs, with Mouth confeſſion is given to ſalvation. After this the innocent Martyr was moſt painfully pinched and cruciat with ſundry puniſhments. In all which notwithſtanding he declared a conſtant heart, and faith invincible, having theſe words in his mouth being in the midſt of his torments: There is nothing in my mind that can be compared to the Kingdom of Heaven; neither is all the World, if it were weighed in ballance, able to be conferred with the price of one ſoul; and ſaid, who is able to ſeparate us from the love of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord? ſhall affliction or anguiſh? And moreover, (ſaid he) I have thus learned of my Lord and my King, not to fear them which kill the body and have no power to kill the ſoul, but to fear him rather, who hath power to deſtroy both body and ſoul in Hell fire. To make the ſtory ſhort, after manifold torments born of him, and ſuffered, when the laſt ſentence of death was upon him pronounced, which was to be beheaded; Menas being then had to the place of Execution, ſaid, I give thee thanks my Lord God, which haſt ſo accepted me to be found a partaker of thy precious death, and haſt not given me to be devoured of my fierce enemies, but haſt made me to remain conſtant in thy pure faith unto this my later end. And ſo this bleſſed Souldier fighting valiantly under the Banner of Chriſt, loſt his head, and won his ſoul. Simeon Metaphraſt. tom. 5. Menas Martyred.

Simeon Metaphrast. tom. 5.

Basilius in a certain Sermon of forty Martyrs reherseth this Story, not unworthy to be noted. There came (ſaith he) into a certain place (of which place he maketh no mention) the Emperors Marſhal or Officer, with the Edict which the Emperor had ſet out againſt the Chriſtians, that whoſoever confeſſed Chriſt, ſhould after many torments ſuffer death. And firſt they did privily ſuborn certain which ſhould detect and accuſe the Chriſtians whom they had found out, or had laid wait for. Upon this the Sword, the Gibbet, the Wheel, and the Whips were brought forth; at the terrible ſight whereof, the hearts of all the beholders did ſhake and tremble. Some for fear did flie, ſome did ſtand in doubt what to do; certain were ſo terrified at the beholding of theſe Engines, and tormenting inſtruments, that they denied their faith. Some others began the Game, and for a time did abide the conflict and agony of Martyrdom, but vanquiſhed at length, by the intolerable pain of their torments, made ſhipwrack of their conſciences, and loſt the glory of their confeſſion. Among others, forty there were at that time, young Gentlemen, all Souldiers, which after the Marſhal had ſhewed the Emperors Edict, and required of all men the obedience of the ſame, freely and boldly of their own accord confeſſed themſelves to be Chriſtians, and declared to him their names. The Marſhal ſomewhat amazed at this their boldneſs of ſpeech, ſtandeth in doubt what was beſt to do. Yet forthwith he goeth about to win them with fair words, advertiſing them to conſider their youth, neither that they ſhould change a ſweet and pleaſant life, for a cruel and untimely death: after after that he promiſeth them Money and honourable Offices in the Emperors name. But they little eſteeming all theſe things, brake forth into a long and bold Oration, affirming that they did neither deſire life, dignity, nor money, but only the Celeſtial Kingdom of Chriſt, ſaying further, that they are ready for the love and faith they have in God, to endure the affliction of the Wheel, the Croſs and the Fire. The rude Marſhal being herewith offended, deviſed a new kind of puniſhment. He ſpied out in the middle of the City a certain great Pond, which lay full upon the cold Northern Wind, for it was in the Winter-time, wherein he cauſed them to be put all that Night; but they being merry, and comforting one another, received this their appointed puniſhment, and ſaid, as they were putting off their Cloaths: We put off (ſaid they) now not our Cloaths, but we put off the old man, corrupt with the deceit of Concupiſcence; We give thee thanks (O Lord) that with this our apparel we may alſo put off by thy grace, the ſinful man; for by means of the Serpent we once put him on, and by the means of Jeſus Chriſt we now put him off. When they had thus ſaid, they were brought naked into the place where they leſt moſt vehement cold; inſomuch that all the parts of their bodies were ſtark and ſtiff therewith. Aſſoon as it was day, they yet having breath, were brought into the fire, where in they were conſumed, and their aſhes thrown into the flood. By chance there was one of the company more lively, and not ſo near dead as the reſt, of whom the Executioners taking pity, ſaid unto his Mother ſtanding by, that they would ſave his life. But ſhe, with her own hands taking up her Son, brought him to the Pile of Wood, where the reſidue of his fellows (crooked for cold) did lie ready to be burnt, and admoniſhed him to accompliſh the bleſſed journey he had taken in hand with his companions. Basil.

A good mother caring more for the ſoul, than for the body of her ſon. Ex Basil. in hom. de 40 martyribus.

In this fellowſhip and company of Martyrs cannot be left out and forgot the ſtory of Cyrus. This Cyrus was a Phyſician born in Alexandria, which flying into Egypt, in the Perſecution of Dioclesian and Maximian, led a ſolitary life in Arabia, being much ſpoken of for his Learning and Miracles, unto whoſe company after a certain time did Joannes born in the City of Edeſſa, beyond the River Euphrates, joyn himſelf, leaving the ſouldiers life which before that time he had exerciſed. But whilſt as yet the ſame Perſecution raged in a City in Egypt called Canope, there was caſt into Priſon for the confeſſion of their faith, a certain godly Chriſtian woman, called Athanaſia, and her three daughters, Theoktiſte, Theodora and Eudoxia; with whom Cyrus was well acquainted: at whoſe infirmities he much fearing, accompanied with his brother John, came and viſited them for their better confirmation; at which time Lirianus was chief Captain and Lieutenant of Egypt, of whoſe wickedneſs and cruelty, eſpecially againſt Women and Maidens, Athanaſius maketh mention in his Apologies, and in his Epiſtle to thoſe that lead a ſolitary life. This Cyrus therefore and Joannes, being accuſed and apprehended of the Heathen Men, asby whoſe perſwations the Maidens and Daughters of Athanaſia contumeliouſly deſpiſed the Gods and the Emperors Religion, and could by no means be brought to do ſacrifice, were after the publication of their conſtant confeſſion put to death by the ſword: Athanaſia alſo and her three daughters being condemned to death. Basilius in another Sermon alſo maketh mention of one Barlaam, being a noble and famous Martyr, which abode all the torments of the Executioners even to the point of death; which thing when the Tormentors ſaw, they brought him and laid him upon the Altar, where they did uſe to offer ſacrifices to their Idols, and put fire and ſtanke incenſe into his right hand, wherein he had yet ſome ſtrength, thinking that the ſame his right hand, by the heat and force of the fire, would have ſcattered the burning Incenſe upon the Altar, and ſo have ſacrificed. But of that their hope, the peſtiferous tormentors were diſappointed: for the flame ran round about his hand, and the ſame endured as though it had been covered with hot Embers, when as Barlaam recited out of the Pſalms this ſaying: Bleſſed is the Lord my God, which teacheth my hands to fight.

Basilius in sermone in Barlaam martyrem.

To this Narration of Baſilius, touching the Martyrdom of Barlaam, we will annex conſequently another ſtory of Ambroſe. He making a certain exhortation to certain Virgins, in the ſame Oration commendeth the Martyrdoms of Agricola and Vitalis, who ſuffered alſo in the ſame Perſecution under Dioclesian and Maximinian (as they affirm) at Bononny. This Vitalis was ſervant to Agricola, who both together betwen themſelves had made a compact to give their lives with other Martyrs for the Name of Chriſt. Whereupon Vitalis being ſent before of his Maſter, to offer himſelf to Martyrdom, fell firſt into the hands of Perſecuters, who laboured about him by all means to cauſe him to deny Chriſt. Which when he would in no caſe do, but ſtoutly perſiſted in the Confeſſion of his Faith, they began to exerciſe him with all kind of torments, ſo unmercifully, that there was no whole skin left on all his body. So Vitalis, in the midſt of the agony and painful torments, after he had in a ſhort prayer commended himſelf to God, gave up his life. After him, the tormentors ſet upon Agricola his Maſter, whoſe vertuous manners and gentle conditions, becauſe they were ſingularly well liked, and known to the enemies, his ſuffering therefore was the longer deferred. But Agricola not abiding the long delay and driving off, and provoking moreover the adverſaries to quicken ſpeed, at length was faſtened unto the Croſs, and ſo finiſhed his Martyrdom, which he ſo long deſired. Ambro. in exhortatione ad Virgines.

No leſs worthy of commemoration is the lamentable Martyrdom of Vincentius, whoſe Hiſtory here followeth: This Vincentius was a Spaniard, and a Levite moſt godly and vertuous, who at this time ſuffered Martyrdom at Valence under Dacianus the Preſident, as we may gather by Prudentius in his Hymn. Bergomenſis in his ſupplement reciteth theſe words concerning his Martyrdom, out of a certain Sermon of St. Auguſtine. Our heart conceived not a vain and fruitleſs ſight (as it were in beholding of lamentable tragedies) but certainly a great ſight and marvellous, and there with ſingular pleaſure received it, when the painful paſſion of victorious Vincentius was read unto us. Is there any ſo heavy hearted, that will not be moved in the contemplation of this immoveable Martyr, ſo manly, or rather ſo godly, fighting againſt the craft and ſubtilty of that Serpent, againſt the Tyranny of Dacianus, againſt the horrors of death, and by the mighty Spirit of his God conquering all? But let us in few words rehearſe the degrees of his torments, though the pains thereof in many words cannot be expreſſed. Firſt, Dacianus cauſed the Martyr to be laid upon the torture, and all the joynts of his body to be diſtended and racked out, until they crackt again. This being done in moſt extreme and cruel manner, all the members of his painful and pitiful body were grievouſly indented with deadly wounds. Thirdly, (that his dolours and griefs might be augmented) they miſerably vexed his fleſh with Iron Combs ſharply filed. And to the end the Tormentors might vomit out all their vengeance on the meek and mild Martyrs fleſh, the tormentors themſelves alſo were vilely ſcourged at the Preſidents commandment. And leſt his paſſion through want of pains might ſeem imperfect or elſe too eaſie, they laid his body, being all out of joynt, on a grate of iron, which when they had opened with iron hooks, they ſeared it with fiery Plates, with hot burning Salt, ſprinkling the ſame. Laſt of all, into a vile Dungeon was this mighty Martyr drawn, the floor whereof firſt was thick ſpread with the ſharpeſt ſhells that might be gotten, his feet then being faſt locked in the ſtocks, there was he left alone without all worldly comfort: but the Lord his God was with him, the Holy Spirit of God (whoſe office is to comfort the godly afflicted) fulfilled his heart with joy and gladneſs. Haſt thou prepared a terrible Rack (O cruel tyrant, O devouring Lion) for the Martyrs bed? the Lord ſhall make that bed ſoft and ſweet unto him. Racked thou his bones and joynts all aſunder? His bones, his joynts, his hairs are all numbred. Tormenteſt thou his fleſh with mortal wounds? the Lord ſhall pour abundantly into all his ſores of his cyl of gladneſs. Thy ſcraping combs, thy ſharp fleſhhooks, thine hot fearing irons, thy parched ſalt, thy ſtinking priſon, thy cutting ſhells, thy pinching ſtocks ſhall turn to this patient Martyr to the beſt. All together ſhall work contrary to thine expectation, great plenty of joy ſhall he reap into the Barn of his ſoul, out of this mighty harveſt of pains that thou haſt brought him into. Yea, thou ſhalt prove him Vincentius indeed; that is, a vanquiſher, a triumpher, a conqueror, ſubduing thy madneſs by his meekneſs, thy tyranny by his patience, thy manifold means of tortures by the manifold graces of God, wherewith he is plentifully inriched.

The comfort of the Lord upon his ſaints.

In this catalogue or company of ſuch holy Martyrs, as ſuffered in this foreſaid tenth Perſecution, many more, and almoſt innumerable, there be expreſſed in Authors, beſide them whom we have hitherto comprehended, as Philoromus, a man of noble birth, and great poſſeſſions in Alexandria, who being perſwaded by his friends to favour himſelf, to reſpect his Wife, to conſider his Children and Family, did not only reject the counſels of them, but alſo neglected the threats and torments of the Judge, to keep the confeſſion of Chriſt inviolate unto the death, and loſing of his head: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 9. Nicephl. lib. 7. cap. 9. of whom Euſebius beareth witneſs that he was there preſent himſelf.

Philoromus Martyr.

Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 9. the confeſſion and martyrdom of Philoromus.

Of like eſtate and dignity was alſo Procopius in Palæſtina, who after his converſion brake his images of Silver and Gold, and diſtributed the ſame to the poor, and after all kind of torments, of racking, of cording, of tearing his fleſh, of goring and ſtabbing in, of firing, at length had his head alſo ſmitten off, as witneſſeth Nicephl. lib. 8. cap. 15.

The torments and conſtancy of Procopius to death. Nicephl. lib. 8 cap. 15.

To this may be joyned alſo Georgius a young man of Cappadocia, who ſtoutly inveighing againſt the impious idolatry of the Emperors, was apprehended and caſt into Priſon, then torn with hooked irons, burnt with hot lime, ſtretched with cords, after that his hands and feet with other members of his body being cut off, at laſt with a ſword had his head cut off. Nicephadid.

With theſe aforenamed, add alſo Sergius and Bacchius, Pamphelem a Phyſician in Nicomedia, mentioned in ſuperiora. lib. 8. Theodorus of the City of Amaſia in Helleſponto, mentioned of Vincentius lib. 3. Fauſtus a Martyr of Egypt, mentioned of Niceph. lib. 8. cap. 5. Gereon, with three hundred and eighteen fellow Martyrs, which ſuffered about Colour, Petr. de nat. lib. 9. cap. 49. Hermogenes the Preſident of Athens, who being converted by the conſtancy of one Menas, and Eugraphus in their torments, ſuffered alſo for the like faith. Item, Samonas Gurias and Abibus, mentioned in Simeon Metaphraſt. Hieron alſo, with certain of his Conſeſſors, under Maximinus, mentioned in Metaphraſtes, Judes and Domnas, who ſuffered with many other Martyrs above mentioned at Nicomedia, as recorded Metaphraſtes. Eucolaſius, Maximinus, the Emperors officers, whom Fauſta the Virgin in her torments converted. Alſo Thirſus, Lucius, Callinicius, Apollonius, Philemon, Aſilas, Lemides, with Arrianus, Preſident of Thebaide. Cyprianus likewiſe, a Citizen of Antioch, who after he had continued a long time a filthy Magician or Sorcerer, at length was converted and made a Deacon, then a Prieſt, and at laſt the Biſhop of Antioch, Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 120. of whom partly we touched ſomewhat before. This Cyprian with Juſtina a Virgin ſuffered among the Martyrs. Item Glicerios at Nicomedia, Felix a Miniſter, Fortunatus, Achilleus, Deacons in the City of Valent. Arthemius of Rome, Ciriacus Deacon to Marcellus the Biſhop, Carpophorus Prieſt at Thuſcia, with Abundus his Deacon. Item, Claudius Sirinus Antoninus which ſuffered with Marcellinus the Biſhop, Sabel. Emead. lib. 8. Cucuſatus in the City of Barcinona. Felix Biſhop of Apulia, with Adauctus and Januarius his Prieſt, Fortunatus and Septimus his Readers: who ſuffered in the City Venuſina under Dioclesian, Bergom. lib. 8.

Sergius, Bacchius, Pamphalem, Theodorus, Fauſtus, Gereon with 318 fellows.

Hermogenes, Menas a man of Athens. Eugraphus, Samonas, Gurias, Abibus, Hieron with his fellows Judes, Domnas.

Euolaſius, Maximinus, Thirſus, Lucius, &c. as in the text.

It were too long a travel or trouble to recite all and ſingular names of them particularly, whom this Perſecution of Dioclesian did conſume. The number of whom being almoſt infinite, is not to be collected or expreſſed. One hundry yet remaineth not to be forgotten of Caſſianus, whoſe pitiful ſtory being deſcribed of Prudentius we have here interted, rendring Meter for Meter, as followeth.

The ſtory of Caſſianus martyr. Prudent. de Paſſion.

THrough Forum, as in Italy, I paſſed once to Rome,
Into a Church by chance came I, and ſtood faſt by a Tomb;
Which Church ſometime a place had been, where cauſes great in law
Were ſcand and tried, and judgment given, to keep bruit men in awe.
Thus place Sylla Cornelius, firſt built, he rais'd the frame,
And call'd the ſame Forum, and thus that City took the name.
In prayer ſervent as I ſtood, cauſing mine eyes be aſide,
A picture in full piteous mood (imbrued) by chance I ſpi'd;
A thorſand wounded marks full bad, all mangled rent and torn;
The ſkin appear'd as though it had been jagg'd and prickt with horn.
A ſcull of pictured boys did band, about that loathſome ſight,
That with their ſharpened gads in hand, his members thus had dight.
Theſe gads were but their pens, wherewith their Tables written were,
And ſuch as Scholars often ſith, unto the Schools do bear.
Whom thou ſeeſt here thus pictur'd ſit, and firmly doſt behold,
No fable it, I do thee wit, unakt a Prelate told
That walks there by; but doth declare, the Hiſtory of one,
Which written, would good record bear, what faith was long agone,
A skilful Schoolmaſter this was, that here ſometime did teach;
The Biſhop once of Brixia was, and Chriſt full plain did preach.
He knew well how to comprehend, long talk in a few lines,
And is at length how to amend, by order and by times.
His ſharp precepts and his ſtern looks, his beardleſs boys did fear,
When bate in heart (yet for their books) full deadly they did bear.
The child that learns, I do ye weet, terms aye his Tutor cru'l;
No diſcipline in youth ſeems ſweet, count this a common rule.
Behold the raging time now here, oppreſſing ſo the faith,
Doth perſecute Gods children dear, and all that Chriſt bewraith.
This truſty teacher of the ſwarm, proſeſt the living God;
The chief good thing they count their harm, perhaps he ſhakes his rod.
What Rebel (cacks the Preſident) is he I bear ſo loud?
Unto our youth an inſtrument, they ſay, and loe they bound.
Go, bring the Caitiff forth, he bids, and make no long delay;
Let him be ſet the boys amids; they do as he doth ſay.
Let him be given unto them all, and let them have their will,
To do to him what ſlight they ſhall, ſo that they will him kill.
Even as they liſt let them him fray, and him deride ſo long,
Till wearineſs provokes their play, no longer to prolong.
Let them, I ſay, then uncontroul'd, both prick and ſcortch his skin;
To bathe their hands let them be bold, in the hot blood of him.
The Scholars hereat make great game, it pleaſeth them full well;
That they may kill and quench the flame, they thought to them a hell.
They bind his hands behind his back, and naked they him ſtrip;
In Bodkin ſuſe at him they wack, they laugh to ſee him skip.
The private hate that each one hath in heart, it now appears,
They pour it forth in gawdy wrath, they wreak them of their tears.
Some caſt great ſtones, ſome other break their tables on his face;
Lo, here thy Latin, and thy Greek (oh barren boys of grace)
The blood runs down his cheeks, and doth imbrue the boxen leams,
Where notes by them were made (though loth) and well propoſed theams.
Some whet, ſome ſharp their pen/els points ſerving to write withal;
Some other gage his fleſh and joynts, as with a pointed nail.
Sometime they prick, ſometime they rent, his worthy Martyrs fleſh,
And thus by turns they dotormente this confeſſor afreſh.
Now all with one conſent on him their bloody hands they lay,
To ſee the blood from limb to limb drop down they make a play.
More painful was the pricking pang, of children oft and thick,
Than of the bigger boys that ſtang, and near the heart did ſtick.
For by the feeble ſtrokes of th'one, death was denied his will,
Of ſmart that made him wo begon, he had the better skill.
The deeper ſtrokes the great ones gave, and nearer touch'd the quick,
The welcomer he thought the ſame, whom longing death made ſick.
God make you ſtrong, he ſaith, I pray, God give you might at will,
And what you want in years, I ſay, let cruelty fulfil.
But whilſt the Hangman breathteth ſtill, and me with you doth match,
That weakly work, yet want no will, my life for to diſpatch;

My griefs was great: what groſs it thou now? ſaid ſome of them again,
In ſchool, adviſed well art thou, whom there thou muſt to pain?
Behold we pray, and now make good, as many thou ſmadſt ſtripes:
As when with weeping eyes we ſtood, in danger of thy gripes.
Art thou now angry at thy hand, that always crieſt write, write,
And never wouldſt that our right hand ſhould reſt in quiet plite?
We had forgot our playing times, thou churle deniedſt us of:
We now but prick and point our lines, and thus they grin and ſcoffe,
Correct good Sir, your viewed verſe, if ought amiſs there be:
Now uſeſt thy power and then rehearſe, that have not marked thee.
Chriſt pitying thy groaning man, with torments torn and tired,
Commands his heart to break even then, and life that was then hired,
He yields again to him that gave, and thus he makes exchange:
Immortal for mortal to have, that in ſuch pain did range.
This is, ſaith he, that this picture, thou ſo beholdſt, oh gueſt,
Of Caſſianus martyr pure, doth Preach I do Proteſt.
If thou prudence have ought in ſtore, in piety to deal, Caſſianus martyr.
In hope of juſt reward therefore, now ſhew thy loving zeal.
I could not but conſent, I weep, his tomb I do imbrace:
Home I return, and after ſleep, this pitiful Preface.
I write as a memorial, for ever to indure,
Of Caſſianus School-maſter, all others to allure,
To complacy under the croſs, of their profeſſion:
Accounting gain what ever loſs for Chriſt they take upon.

No leſs admirable than wonderful was the conſtancy alſo of Women and Maidens, who in the ſame perſecution gave their bodies to the tormentors, and their lives for the Teſtimony of Chriſt, with no leſs boldnes of ſpirit, than did the men themſelves above ſpecified, to whom how much more inferior they were of bodily ſtrength, ſo much more worthy of praiſe they be, for their conſtant ſtanding. Of whom ſome examples here we mind (Chriſt willing) to infer, ſuch as in our Stories and Chronicles ſeem moſt notable, firſt beginning with Eulalia, whoſe ſtory we have taken out of the foreſaid Prudentius, as followeth.

In the Weſt part of Spain, called Portugal, is a City great and Populous, named Emerita, wherein dwelt, and was brought up a Virgin, born of Noble Parentage, whoſe name was Eulalia, which Emerita although for the ſituation thereof, was both rich and famous, yet more adorned and famous was the renown thereof, by the Martyrdom, Blood, and Sepulchre of this bleſſed Virgin Eulalia. Twelve years of age was ſhe, and not much above, when ſhe refuſed great and Honorable offers in Marriage, as one not skilful, nor yet delighting in Courtly dalliance, neither yet taking pleaſure in Purple and gorgeous Apparel, or elſe in Precious Balms, or Coſtly Ornaments and Jewels: But forſaking and deſpiting all theſe and ſuch like Pompous allurements, then ſhewed ſhe her ſelf moſt buſie in preparing her journey to her hoped inheritance, and heavenly Patronage. Which Eulalia, as ſhe was modeſt and diſcreet in behaviour, ſage and ſober in conditions, ſo was ſhe alſo witty and ſharp in anſwering her Enemies. But when the furious rage of perſecution inforced her to joyn her ſelf amongſt Gods Children in the boſſhold of faith, and when the Chriſtians were commanded to offer incenſe and ſacrifice to Devils or dead Gods: Then began the bleſſed ſpirit of Eulalia to kindle, and being of a prompt and ready wit, thought forthwith (as a couragious Captain) to give a charge upon this ſo great and diſordered a battel: And ſo the filly woman, pouring out the Bowels of her inward heart before God, more provoketh thereby the force and rage of her Enemies againſt her. But the godly care of her Parents, fearing leſt the willing mind of this Damoſel, ſo ready to die for Chriſts cauſe, might make her guilty of her own death, hid her and kept her cloſe at their houſe in the Country, being a great way out of the City. She yet miſſliking that quiet life, and alſo deteſting to make ſuch delay, ſoftly ſtealeth out of the doors (no man knowing thereof) in the night; and in great haſt leaving the common way, openeth the hedge gaps, and with weary feet (God knoweth) paſſed through the thorny and briary places, accompanied yet with ſpiritual guard: And although dark and dreadful was the ſilent night, yet had ſhe with her, the Lord and guider of light. And as the children of Iſreal coming out of Egypt, had by the mighty power of God, a cloudy pillar for their guid in the day, and a flame of fire in the night; ſo had this Godly virgin, travelling in this dark night, when ſhe flying and forſaking the place where all filthy Idolatry abounded, and haſtened her Heavenly journey, was not oppreſſed with the dreadful darkneſs of the night: But yet ſhe before the day appeared in this her ſpeedy journey, with her ſelf conſidered and muſed on a thouſand matters and more.

In the morning betime, with a bold courage ſhe goeth unto the tribunal or Judgment-ſeat, and in the midſt of them all with a loud voice crying out, ſaid: I pray you what a ſhame is it for you thus raſhly and without advizement to deſtroy and kill mens Souls, and to throw their bodies alive againſt the rocks, and cauſe them to deny the omnipotent God? Would you know (O you unfortunate) what I am? Behold, I am one of the Chriſtians, an Enemy to your deviliſh Sacrifices, I ſpurn your Idols under my feet, I confeſs God omnipotent with my heart and mouth. Iſis, Apollo, and Venus, what are they? Maximinus himſelf, what is he? The one a thing of nought, for that they be the works of mens hands; the other but a caſtawy, becauſe he worſhippeth the ſame work. Therefore frivolous are they both, and both not worthy to be ſet by: Maximinus is a Lord of ſubſtance, and yet he himſelf falleth down before a ſtone, and voweth the honour of his dignity unto thoſe that are much inferior to his Vaſſals. Why then doth he oppreſs ſo tyrannically, more worthy ſtomachs and courages than himſelf? He muſt needs be a good guid and an upright Judge, which feedeth upon innocent blood, and breathing in the bodies of Godly men, doth rent and tear their bowels, and that more is, hath his delight in deſtroying and ſubverting the faith.

Go to therefore thou Hang-man, burn, cut and mangle thou theſe earthly members. It is an eaſie matter to break a brittle ſubſtance, but the inward mind ſhalt thou not hurt for any thing thou canſt do. The Pretor then or Judge, with theſe words of hers, fet in a great rage, ſaith, Hangman take her and pull her out by the hair of her Head, and torment her to the uttermoſt, let her feel the power of our country Gods, and let her know what the imperial Government of a Prince is. But yet, O thou ſtardy girle, faiſn would I have thee (if it were poſſible) before thou die, to revoke this thy wickedneſs. Behold what pleaſures thou maieſt enjoy by the honourable houſe thou cameſt of, thy fallen houſe and progeny followeth thee to death with lamentable tears, and the heavy nobility of thy kindred maketh doleful lamentation for thee. What meaneſt thou? Wilt thou kill thy ſelf ſo young a flower, and ſo near theſe Honourable marriages and great Dowaries thou maiſt injoy? Doth not the gliſtering and golden pomp of the bride-bed move thee? Doth not the reverend piety of thine anceſtors prick thee? Whom is it not, but that this thy raſhneſs and weakneſs grieveth? Behold here the furniture ready prepared for thy terrible death: Either ſhalt thou be beheaded with this ſword, or elſe with theſe wild beaſts ſhalt thou be pulled in pieces, or elſe thou being caſt into the fiery flames, ſhalt be (although lamentably bewailed of thy Friends and kinſfolks) conſumed to aſhes. What great matter is it for thee I pray thee, to eſcape all this? If thou will but take and put with thy fingers a little ſalt and incenſers into the Cenſers, thou ſhalt be delivered from all theſe puniſhments. To this Eulalia made no anſwer, but being in a great fury, ſhe ſpitteth in the Tyrants face, ſhe throweth down the Idols, and ſcurneth abroad with her feet the heap of incenſe prepared to the Cenſers. Then without further delay the Hang-men with both their ſtrengths took her, and pull one joynt from another, and with the talons of wild beaſts ſcotched her ſides to the hard bones: She all this while ſinging and prayſing God in this wiſe; Behold, O Lord, I will not forget thee: What a pleaſure is it for them, O Chriſt, that remember thy triumphant victories, to attain unto theſe high dignities? and ſtill calleth upon that holy name, all ſtained and imbrued with her own blood. This ſang ſhe with a bold ſtomach, neither lamentingly nor yet weepingly, but being glad and merry abandoning from her mind all heavineſs and grief, when as out of a warm fountain, her mangled members with freſh blood bathed her white and fair ſkin. Then proceed they to the laſt and final torment, which was not only the goring and wounding of her body with the Iron grate and hurdle, and terrible harrowing of her fleſh, but burned on every ſide with flaming Torches, her tormented breaſts and ſides: Her hair hanging about her ſhoulders in two parts divided (wherewith her Phane-fac'd chaſtity and virginity was covered) reaching down to the the ground. But when the cracking flame fleeth about her face, kindled by her hair, and reacheth the crown of her head: then ſhe deliring ſwift death, opened her mouth and ſwallowed the flame, and ſo reſted ſhe in Peace.

Ex Pruden. Then ſaid Prudentius and Ado, alſo Aquilinus add moreover, writing of a white Dove iſſuing out of her mouth at her departing, and of the fire quenched about her body, alſo of her body covered miraculouſly with ſnow, with other things more, whereof let every reader uſe his own Judgment.

As ye have heard now the Chriſtian life, and conſtant death of Eulalia, much worthy of praiſe and commendation: So no leſs commendation is worthy to be given to bleſſed Agnes, that conſtant damſel and martyr of God, who as ſhe was in Rome of honorable Parents begotten, ſo lieth ſhe there as honorably intombed and buried. Which Agnes for her unſpotted and undefiled virginity, deſerved no leſs praiſe, and commendation than for her willing death and Martyrdom. Some writers make of her a long diſcourſe, more in my judgment than neceſſary, reciting divers and ſundry ſtrange miracles by her done in the proceſs of her Hiſtory; which partly for tediouſneſs, partly for the doubtfulneſs of the author (whom ſome father upon Ambroſe) and partly for the ſtrangneſs and incredibility thereof, I omit, being ſatisfied with that which Prudentius briefly writeth of her, as followeth: She was (ſaith he) young and not marriageable, when firſt ſhe being dedicated to Chriſt, boldly reſiſted the wicked Edicts of the Emperor, left that through Idolatry ſhe might have defiled and forſaken the holy faith; but yet firſt proved by divers and ſundry policies to induce her to the ſame (as now with the flattering and inticing words of the Judge, now with the threatnings of the ſtorming Executioner) ſhe ſtood notwithſtanding ſtedfaſt in all couragious ſtrength: And willingly offered her body to hard and painful tormentes, not refuſing (as ſhe ſaid) to ſuffer whatſoever it ſhould be, yea though it were death it ſelf. Then ſaid the cruel tyrant, If to ſuffer pain and torment be ſo eaſie a matter and lightly regarded of thee, and that thou accountеſt thy life nothing worthy, yet the ſhame of thy dedicated or vowed virginity is a thing more regarded I know, and eſteemed of thee. Wherefore this is determined, that unleſs thou wilt make obeyſance to the Altar of Minerva, and ask forgiveneſs of her for thy arrogancy, thou ſhalt be ſent or abandoned to the common ſtews or brothel-houſe. Agnes the virgin with more ſpirit than vehemency inveigheth againſt both Minerva and her virginity: The youth in skuls flock and run together, and crave that they may have Agnes their ludibrious prey. Then, ſaith Agnes, Chriſt is not forgetful of thoſe that be his, that he will ſuffer violently to be taken from them their golden and pure chaſtity, neither will he leave them ſo deſtitute of help: He is always at hand and ready to fight for ſuch as are ſhamefac'd and chaſt Virgins, neither ſuffereth he his gifts of holy integrity or chaſtity to be polluted. Thou ſhalt, ſaith ſhe, willingly bath thy ſword in my blood if thou wilt, but thou ſhalt not defile my body with filthy luſt for any thing thou canſt do. She had no ſooner ſpoken theſe words, but he commanded that ſhe ſhould be ſet naked at the corner of ſome ſtreet (which place at that time, ſuch as were ſtrumpets commonly uſed) the greater part of the nultitude both forrowing and ſhaming to ſee ſo ſhameleſs a ſight, went their ways, ſome turning their heads, ſome hiding their faces. But one amongſt the reſt, with uncircumciſed eyes beholding the damſel, and that in ſuch opprobrious wiſe; behold a flame of fire like unto a flaſh of lightning falleth upon him, and ſtriketh his eyes out of his head: whereupon he for dead falling unto the ground, ſprawleth in the kennel-durt; whoſe companions taking him up, and carrying him away, bewayled him as a dead man: But the Virgin for this her miraculous delivery from the dauger and ſhame of that place, fingeth praiſes to God and Chriſt.

There be (ſaith Prudentius) that report, how that ſhe being deſired to pray unto Chriſt for the party, that a little before with fire from Heaven for his incontinency was ſtricken, was reſtored by her prayer both unto his perfect health and ſight. But bleſſed Agnes after that ſhe had climbed this her firſt greeſe and ſtep unto the heavenly pallace, forthwith began to climb another: For fury ingendring now the mortal wrath of her bloody Enemy, wringing his hands he crieth out ſaying: I am undone, O thou the Executioner draw out thy ſword, and do thine office that the Emperor hath appointed thee. And when Agnes ſaw a ſturdy and cruel fellow (to behold) ſtand behind her, or approaching near to her with a naked ſword in his hand: I am now gladder, ſaith ſhe, and rejoyce, that ſuch a one as thou, being a ſtout, fierce, ſtrong, and ſturdy ſouldier art come, than one more feeble, weak, and faint ſhould come, or elſe any other young man ſweetly imbalmed, and wearing gay apparel, that might deſtroy me with fained ſhame. Thus, even this, is he, I now confeſs, that I do love. I will make haſt to meet him, and will no longer protract my longing deſire. I will willingly receive into my paps the length of his ſword, and into my breſt will draw the force thereof even unto the hilts, that thus I being married unto Chriſt my ſpouſe, may ſurmount and eſcape all the darkneſs of this world, that reacheth even unto the ſkies. O eternal Governour, vouchſafe to open the gates of Heaven, once ſhut up againſt all the inhabitants of the earth, and receive (oh Chriſt) my ſoul that ſeeketh thee. Thus ſpeaking and kneeling upon her knees the prayeth unto Chriſt above in Heaven, that her neck might be the readier for the ſword, now hanging over the ſame. The executioner then with his bloody hand finiſheth her hope, and at one ſtroke cutteth off her head, and by ſuch ſhort and ſwift death doth he prevent her of the pain thereof.

I have oftentimes before complained, that the ſtories of Saints have been powdered and ſauced with divers untrue additions, and fabulous inventions of men, who either of a ſuperſtitious devotion, or of a ſubtil practiſe have ſo mangled-mangled their ſtories and lives, that almoſt nothing remaineth in them ſimple and uncorrupt, as in the uſual portues wont to be read for dayly ſervice, is manifeſt and evident to be ſeen; wherein few Legends there be able to abide the touch of Hiſtory, if they were truly tryed. This I write upon the occaſion ſpecially of good Katharine, whom now I have in hand: In whom although I nothing doubt, but in her life was great holineſs, in her knowledge excellency, in her death conſtancy: Yet that all things be true that be ſtoried of her, neither do I affirm, neither am I bound ſo to think: So many ſtrange fictions of her be fained diverſly of divers writers, whereof ſome ſeem incredible, ſome alſo impudent. As where Petrus de natalibus writing of her converſion declareth, how that Katharine ſleeping before a certain picture or table of the crucifix, Chriſt with his Mother Mary appeared unto her: And when Mary had offered her unto Chriſt to be his wife, he firſt refuſed her for her blackneſs. The next time ſhe being baptiſed, Mary appearing again, offered her to marry with Chriſt, who then being liked, was eſpouſed to him and married, having a Golden ring the ſame time put on her finger in her ſleep, &c. Bergomenſis writeth thus, that becauſe ſhe in the ſight of the people openly reſiſted the Emperor Maxentius to his face, and rebuked him for his cruelty, therefore ſhe was commanded and committed upon the ſame to priſon, which ſeemeth hitherto not much to digreſs from truth. It followeth moreover, that the ſame night an Angel came to her, comforting and exhorting her to be ſtrong and conſtant unto the Martyrdom, for that ſhe was a Maid accepted in the ſight of God, and that the Lord would be with her for whoſe honour ſhe did fight, and that he would give her a mouth and wiſdom which her Enemies ſhould not withſtand: With many other things more which I here omit. As this alſo I omit concerning the fifty Philoſophers, whom ſhe in diſputation convicted, and converted unto our Religion, and dyed Martyrs for the ſame. Item, of the converting of Porphyrius, kinſman to Maxentius, and Fauſtina the Emperors wife. At length (ſaith the ſtory) after the proved the rack, and the four ſharp cutting wheels, having at laſt her head cut off with the ſword, ſo ſhe finiſhed her Martyrdom, about the year of our Lord (as Antoninus affirmeth) three hundred and ten. Simeon Metaphraſtes, writing of her, diſcourſeth the ſame more at large, to whom they may reſort which covet more therein to be ſatiſfied.

Among the works of Baſil a certain oration is extant concerning Julitta the Martyr, who came to her Martyrdom (as he witneſſeth) by this occaſion. A certain avaricious and greedy perſon of great authority, and (as it may appear) appear) the Emperor his Deputy, or other like Officer (who abuſed the Decrees and Laws of the Emperor againſt the Chriſtians, to his own lucre and gain) violently took from this Julitta all her Goods, Lands, Chattels, and Servants, contrary to all equity and right. She made her pitiful complaint to the Judges: a day was appointed when the Cauſe ſhould be heard. The ſpoiled woman, and the ſpoiling Extortioner ſtood forth together; the woman lamentably declareth her cauſe, the man frowningly beholdeth her face. When ſhe had proved that of good right the Goods were her own, and that wrongfully he had dealt with her: the wicked and blood-thirſty Wretch preferring vile worldly ſubſtance, before the precious ſubſtance of a Chriſtian body, affirmed her action to be of no force, for that the was an Outlaw in not obſerving the Emperors gods, ſince her Chriſtian Faith hath been firſt abjured. His allegation was allowed as good and reaſonable. Whereupon Incenſe and Fire were prepared for her to worſhip the gods, which unleſs ſhe would do, neither the Emperors Protection, nor Laws, nor Judgment, nor Life ſhould ſhe enjoy in that Common weal. When this Hand-Maid of the Lord heard theſe words, ſhe ſaid, Farewel Life, welcome Death; farewel Riches, welcome Poverty. All that I have, if it were a thouſand times more, would I rather loſe, than to ſpeak one wicked and blaſphemous word againſt God my Creator. I yield thee thanks moſt hearty, O my God, for this gift of Grace, that I can contemn and deſpiſe this frail and tranſitory World, eſteeming Chriſtian Profeſſion above all Treaſures. Henceforth when any queſtion was demanded, her anſwer was, I am the Servant of Jeſus Chriſt. Her Kindred and Acquaintance flocking to her, advertiſed her to change her mind. But that vehemently ſhe reſiſted, with deteſtation of their Idolatry. Forthwith the Judge with the ſharp Sword of Sentence, not only cutteth off all her Goods and Poſſeſſions, but judgeth her alſo to the fire moſt cruelly. The joyful Martyr imbraceth the Sentence as a thing moſt ſweet and delectable. She addreſſeth her ſelf to the flames, in countenance, geſture and words, declaring the joy of her heart, coupled with ſingular conſtancy. To the women beholding her, ſententiouſly ſhe ſpake, Stick not, O ſiſters, to labour and travel after true Piety and Godlineſs. Ceaſe to accuſe the frogility of Feminine nature. What? are not we created of the ſame matter that men are? Yea, after Gods Image and Similitude are we made, as lively as they. Not fleſh only God uſed in the creation of the Woman, in ſign and token of her infirmity and weakneſs, but bone of bones is ſhe, in token that ſhe muſt be ſtrong in the true and living God, all falſe gods forſaken; conſtant in Faith, all Infidelity renounced; patient in Adverſity, all worldly eaſe refuſed. Wax weary (my dear Siſters) of your lives led in darkneſs, and be in love with my Chriſt, my God, my Redeemer, my Comforter, which is the true Light of the World. Perſwade your ſelves, or rather the Spirit of the living God perſwade you, that there is a World to come, wherein the Worſhippers of Idols and Devils ſhall be tormented perpetually, the Servants of the High God ſhall be crowned eternally. With theſe words ſhe imbraced the fire, and ſtreatly ſlept in the Lord.

There have been moreover beſide theſe above recited, divers godly women and faithful Martyrs, as Barbara a Noble woman in Thuſcia, who after miſerable Priſonment, harp Cords, and burning Flames put to her ſides, was at laſt beheaded. Alſo Fauſta the Virgin which ſuffered under Maximinus, by whom Euelaſius a Ruler of the Emperors Palace, and Maximinus the Prelident were both converted, and alſo ſuffered Martyrdom, as witneſſeth Metaphraſtes. Item, Juliana a Virgin of ſingular beauty in Nicomedia, who after divers Agonies ſuffered likewiſe under Maximinus. Item, Anaſia a Maid of Theſſalonica, who under the ſaid Maximinus ſuffered, Metaph. ibid. Fuſtina which ſuffered with Cyprianus Biſhop of Antioch, not to omit alſo Tecla; although moſt Writers do record that ſhe ſuffered under Nero. Platina in vita Cai maketh alſo mention of Lucia and Agatha. All which holy Maids and Virgins glorified the Lord Chriſt with their conſtant Martyrdom, in this tenth and laſt Perſecution of Dioclеſian.

During the time of which Perſecution, theſe Biſhops of Rome ſucceeded one after another, Caius who ſucceeded next after Xiſtus before mentioned, Marcellinus, Marcellus (of whom Euſebius in his ſtory maketh no mention), Euſebius, and then Miltiades: all which died Martyrs in the tempeſt of this Perſecution. Firſt, Marcellinus after the Martyrdom of Caius, was ordained Biſhop; he being brought by Dioclеſian to the Idols, firſt yielded to Excommunicated by the Chriſtians, he fell into ſuch Repentance, that he returned again to Dioclеſian, where he ſtanding to his former Confeſſion, and publickly condemning the Idolatry of the Heathen, recovered the Crown of Martyrdom, ſuffering with Claudius, Cyrinus, and Antoninus.

Marcellus likewiſe was urged of Maxentius to renounce his Biſhoprick and Religion, and to Sacrifice with them to Idols; which when he conſtantly refuſed, was beaten with Cudgels, and ſo expelled the City. Then he entring into the houſe of Lucina a widow, aſſembled there the Congregation; which when it came to the ears of Maxentius the Tyrant, he turned the houſe of Lucina into a ſtable, and made Marcellus the Keeper of the Beaſts; who with the ſtink thereof and miſerable handling, was put to death. Euſebius fate Biſhop of Rome, as Euſeb. in Chro. ſaith, ſeven months, Mariaus Scotus ſaith eight months, Damaſus affirmeth ſix years. Sabellicus allegeth certain Authors that ſay, that he was ſlain by Maximianus, but correcteth that himſelf, affirming that Maximianus died before him.

Miltiades by the teſtimony of Platina, and others that follow him, ſat three years and ſeven months, and ſuffered under Maximianus. But that ſeemeth not to be true, as both Sabellicus doth rightly note, affirming that the ſame cannot ſtand by the ſupputation of time: for ſo much as the ſaid Galerius Maximianus reigned but two years, and died before Miltiades. Alſo Euſebius manifeſtly expreſſeth the example of a Letter of Conſtantine written to this Miltiades Biſhop of Rome, plainly convicting that to be falſe which Platina affirmeth.

In the Book collected of general Councils, among the decreetal Epiſtles, there is a long tractation about the judgment and condemnation of Marcellinus: wherein the Maſters and Patrons of Popery in theſe our days take great hold to prove the Supremacy of the Pope to be above all general Councils, and that he ought not to be ſubject to the condemnation of any perſon or perſons, for that there is written, Nemo unquam judicavit pontificem, nec præſul facerdotem ſuum, quoniam prima ſedes non judicabitur a quoquam, &c. Although this ſentence of Miltiades ſeemeth apparently to be patched in rather by ſome Heldibrandus than by Miltiades, both for that it hangeth with little order of ſenſe upon that which goeth before; and again, becauſe that Prima ſedes here mentioned, was not yet ordained nor attributed to the See of Rome before the Council of Nice, where the order and placing of Biſhops was firſt eſtabliſhed. But to let this ſentence paſs, yet notwithſtanding the circumſtance and proceeding of this judgment, if it be rightly weighed, maketh very little to the purpoſe of theſe men. Neither is it true that the Biſhops of this Council of Simuſſe, did not condem Marcellinus, for the words of the Council be plain, Subſcripſerunt igitur in ejus damnationem & damnaverunt eum extra civitatem; that is, They ſubſcribed therefore to his Condemnation, and condemned him to be expelled out of the City. Moreover by the ſaid Council were brought in the forty two Witneſſes againſt Marcellinus. In the ſaid Council, the Verdict of the ſame witneſſes was declared, and alſo received. Furthermore, Quirinus one of the Biſhops there openly proteſted, that he would not depart the Council, before the malice of the Biſhops was revealed: What doth all this declare, but that the Biſhop of Rome was called there, and did appear before the Judgment Seat of the Council, and there ſtood ſubject to their Sentence and Authority, by the which he was expelled out of the City? As for the words of the Council, whereupon our Papiſts ſtand ſo much, Non enim noſtro, ſed tuo ipſius judicio condemnaberis, &c. Item, Tuo ore judica cauſam tuam, &c. Theſe words import not here the Authority of the Roman Biſhop to be above the Council, neither do they declare what the Council could not do, but what they would and wiſhed rather to be done; that is, that he ſhould rather acknowledge his Crime before God and them, them, with a voluntary yielding of his heart, then that the Confession of such an heinous Fact should be extorted from him through their condemnation, for that they saw to be expedient for his Souls health; otherwise their condemnation should serve him to small purpose; and so it came to pass. For he being urged of them to condemn himself, so did: prostrating himself and weeping before them. Whereupon immediately they proceeded to the sentence against him, condemning and pronouncing him to be expelled the City. Now whether by this may be gathered that the Bishops of Rome ought not to be cited, accused and condemned by any person or persons, let the indifferent Reader judge simply.

The Bishop of Rome condemned by the Council.

As touching the decretal Epistles, which be intituled under the names of these foresaid Bishops, who so well adviseth them, and with judgment will examine the stile, the time, the argument, the hanging together of the matter, and the Constitutions in them contained (little serving to any purpose, and nothing serving for those troublesome days then present) may easily discern them, either in no part to be theirs, or much of the same to be clouted and patched by the doings of others, which lived in other times; especially seeing all the constitutions in them for the most part tend to the setting up, and to exalt the See of Rome above all other Bishops and Churches, and to reduce all Causes and Appeals to the said See of Rome. So the Epistle of Caius beginning with the Commendation of the Authority of his See endeth after the same tenor, willing and commanding all difficult questions in all Provinces whatsoever emerging, to be referred to the See Apostolical. Moreover the greatest part of the said Epistle from this place (Quicunque illi sunt, ita obeæcati, &c. to the end of this period, Quoniam sicut ait B. Apostolus, magnum est Pietatis, &c.) is contained in the Epistle of Leo, unto Leo the Emperor: and so rightly agreeth in all points with the stile of Leo, that evident it is the same to be borrowed out of Leo, and to be patched into the Epistle of Caius out of Leo.

The decretal Epistles and constitutions of these Bishops of Rome examined.

The chief scope of the constitutions decretal, to magnifie the Church of Rome.

The Epistle of Caius.

A great part of the Epistle of Caius taken out of the Epistle Leo, to Leo the Emperor.

Likewise the Epistle of Marcellinus, to get more Authority with the Reader, is admired with a great part of Pauls Epistle to the Ephesians, word for word. And how it is like that Marcellinus, which died in the twentieth year of Diocletian, could write of consubstantiality of the Divine Persons, when that controversie and term of consubstantiality was not heard of in the Church before the Nicen Council, which was twenty three years after him? But especially the two Epistles of Marcellus bewray themselves, so that for the consuting thereof needeth no other probation more than only the reading of the same. Such a glorious stile of ambition therein doth appear, as it is eafie to be understood, not to proceed either from such an humble Martyr, or to favour any thing of the misery of such a time. His words of his first Epistle written unto the Brethren of Antioch, and alledged in the Popes Decrees by Gratianus are these:

The Epistle of Marcellinus.

The Epistles decretal of Marcellus.

24. q. 1. Regantur sex fratres.

We desire you Brethren, that you do not teach nor conceive any other thing but as ye have received of the blessed Apostle Saint Peter, and of other Apostles and Fathers. For of him ye were first of all instructed, wherefore you must not forsake your own Father and follow others. For he is the Head of the whole Church, to whom the Lord said, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church, &c. Whose Seat was first with you in Antioch, which afterward by the Commandment of the Lord, was translated from thence to Rome, of the which Church of Rome I am this day placed (by the Grace of God) to be the Governor. From the which Church of Rome, neither ought you to separate your selves, seeing to the same Church all manner of Causes Ecclesiastical, being of any importance (Gods Grace so disposing) are commanded to be referred: by the same to be ordered regularly, from whence they took their first beginning, &c. And followeth consequently upon the same, And if your Church of Antioch, which was once the first, will not yield her self unto the See of Rome, there is no other Church else that will not subject it self to our Dominion: to whom all other Bishops whosoever, as they must needs do (according to the Decrees of the Apostles and of their Successors) ought to fly, as to have their Head, and must Appeal to the same, and there to have their Redress and their Protection, from whence they took their first Institution and Consecration, &c.

In what chapter or leaf of all the Bible doth the Lord command the See of Rome to be translated from Antioch to Rome?

The Church of Rome ruleth to the Church of Antioch to yield unto her.

Whether this be like matter to proceed from the spirit of Marcellus that blessed Martyr in those so dreadful days, I say no more, but only desire the (gentle Reader) to judge.

The fond Epistle of Marcellus written of Maximus.

In his second Epistle moreover, the said Marcellus writing to Maxentius the bloody Tyrant, first reprehendeth him for his cruelty, sharply admonishing him how and what to do: to learn and seek the true Religion of God, to maintain his Church, to honour and reverence the Priests of God, and especially exhorteth him to charity, and that he would cease from Persecution, &c. All this is possible and like to be true. But now mark (good Reader) what blanched fluff here followed withall: as where he alledging the Statutes and Sanctions of his Predecessors, declareth and discusseth that no Bishop nor Minister ought to be persecuted or deprived of his goods. And if they be, then ought they to have their possessions and places again restored by the Law, before they were bound by the Law to answer to their Accusations laid in against them: and so after that, in convenient time, to be called to a Council; the which Council notwithstanding without the Authority of the holy See, cannot proceed regularly, albeit it remain in his power to assemble certain Bishops together. Neither can he regularly condemn any Bishop, appealing to this his Apostolical See, before the Sentence definitive do proceed from the foresaid See, &c. And it followeth after, And therefore (saith he) let no Bishop of what Crime soever he be attached, come to his Accusation, or be heard, but in his own ordinary Synod at his convenient time: the Regular and Apostolical Authority being joyned withall. Moreover in the said Epistle writing unto Maxentius, he decreeth that no Lay-men, or any suspected Bishop ought to accuse Prelates of the Church: So that if they be either Lay-men, or men of evil Conversation, or proved manifest Enemies, or incensed with any hatred, their Accusations against any Bishops ought not to stand. With other such matters more, concerning the disposition of judicial Court. Which matter, if Pope Gregory the seventh had written unto Henry the third Emperor, or if Pope Alexander the third had written to the Emperor Fredericus the first, it might have stood with some reason and opportunity of time. But now for Marcellus to write thefe Decrees in such Persecution of the Church, to Maxentius the Heathen and most cruel Emperor, how unlike it is to be true, and how it served then to purpose, the Reader may soon discern. And yet these be the Epistles and Constitutions decretal, whereby (under the pretensed Title of the Fathers) all Churches of late time, and all Ecclesiastical Causes have been, and yet are in this Realm of England to this day governed, directed, and disposed.

The Church of England governed by the Popes Canon Law without sufficient ground of antiquity.

The like discussion and examination I might also make of the other Epistles that follow of Eusebius and Miltiades, which all tend to the same scope, that no Prelate or Bishop ought to come to his answer (or Ad litem contestatam, as the words of their writing do term it) before they be orderly and fully restored again to their possessions. Who moreover in the said their Epistles still harp upon this Key of the Scripture, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam. Declaring moreover that this priviledge of judging all men, and to be judged of no man, but only to be left to the judgment of the Lord, was given to this foresaid holy See of Rome, from time of the Apostles, and chiefly left with Peter the holy Key-keeper: so that although the election of the Apostles was equal, yet this was chiefly granted to S. Peter, to have Prehemi-nence above the rest. Concluding in the end hereby, Quod semper majores causæ, sicut sunt Episcoporum, & potiorum curæ negotiorum, ad unam beati Principis Apostolorum Petri sedem confluerent; that is, That always all greater Causes, as be the matters of Bishops, and such other cares of weighty Importance, should be brought to the See of Saint Peter, the blessed Prince of the Apostles, &c. These be the words of Miltiades and Eusebius, whereby it may partly be smelled of him that hath any Nose, what was ment the meaning of them which forged these Writings and Letters upon these ancient holy Martyrs.

The Epistle of Miltiades to Maximus blanched.

Eusebius and Miltiades.

This I cannot but marvel at, in the third Epistle of Eusebius the Bishop of Rome, that whereas Marcellinus his his late Predecessor before, in his own time and remembrance did fall so horribly, and was condemned for the same justly to be expulsed the City by the Council of three hundred Bishops: yet notwithstanding the foresaid Eusebius in his third Epistle alledging that place of Tu es Petrus, bringeth in for a proof of the same, and saith, Quia in sede Apostolica extra maculam semper est Catholica servata Religio, &c. that is, For in the Apostolical See always the Catholick Religion hath been preserved without any spot or blemish.

The fall of Liberius.

Miltiades the last Bishop of Rome in danger of Persecution.

But howsoever the Forgers of these decretal Epistles have forgotten themselves, most certain it is, that these holy Bishops, unto whom they were and are ascribed, lived perfect good men, and died blessed Martyrs. Of whom this Miltiades was the last among all the Bishops of Rome here in the West Church of Europe, that ever was in danger of Persecution to be martyred, yet to this present day.

The fall of Ecclesiastical Discipline, and Chastisement.

The end of these Persecutions in all the West Churches.

And thus have ye heard the stories and names of such blessed Saints, which suffered in the time of Persecution, from the nineteenth year of Diocletian to the seventh and last year of Maxentius, described with the deaths also and plagues upon these Tormentors and cruel Tyrants, which were the Captains of the same Persecution. And here cometh in (blessed be Christ) the end of these Persecutions here in these West Churches of Europe, so far as the Dominion of blessed Constantinus did chiefly extend.

The reverence of Vsthazares.

Yet notwithstanding in Asia all Persecution as yet ceased not for the space of four years, as above is mentioned by the means of wicked Licinius, under whom divers there were holy and constant Martyrs, that suffered grievous Torments; as Hermilus a Deacon, and Stratonicus a Keeper of the Prison, both which after their punishments sustained, were strangled in the Flood Iher, Metaph. Also Theodorus the Captain, who being sent for of Licinius, because he would not come, and because he brake his gods in pieces, and gave them to the poor; therefore was fastened to the Cross, and after being pierced with sharp Pricks or Bodkins in the secret parts of his body, was at last beheaded. Add to these also Miles, who being first a Souldier, was afterward made Bishop of a certain City in Persia; where he seeing himself could do no good to convert them, after many tribulations and great afflictions among them, cursed the City and departed. Which City shortly after by Sapores King of Persia was destroyed.

Miles Bishop and Martyr.

The fall of Ecclesiastical Discipline, and Chastisement.

The fruit of Ecclesiastical Discipline, and Chastisement.

In the same Country of Persia, about this time suffered under Sapores the King (as recordeth Simeon Metaphrastes) divers valiant and constant Martyrs, as Actidimus, Pegasius, Anempodistus, Epidephorus, also Simeon Archbishop of Seleucia, with Crestphon another Bishop of Persia, with other Ministers and religious men of that Region, to the number of one hundred twenty eight. Of this Simeon and Crestphon thus writeth Sozomen. lib. 2. That the Idolatrous Magicians in Persia, taking counsel together against the Christians, accused Simeon and Crestphon to Sapores the King, for that they were grateful and accepted unto the Roman Emperor, and bewraid to him such things as were done in the Land of Persia. Whereupon Sapores, being moved, took great displeasure against the Christians, oppressing them with Taxes and Tributes unto their utter impoverishing, killing all their Priests with the Sword: after that calleth for Simeon the Archbishop, who there before the King declared himself a worthy and a valiant Captain of Christs Church. For when Sapores had commanded him to be led to suffer Torments, he neither shrunk for any fear, nor shewed any great humble suit of submission for any pardon: wherefore the King partly mavelling, partly offended, asked Why he did not kneel down as he was wont before to do? Simeon to this answered, For that, saith he, before this time I was not brought unto you in Bonds to betray the true God, as I am now; and so long I refused not to accomplish that which the Order and Custom of the Realm of me required; but now it is not lawful for me so to do, for now I come to stand in defence of our Religion and true Doctrine. When Simeon thus had answered, the King persisting in his purpose, offereth to him the choice either to worship with him after his manner (promising to him many great Gifts, if he would so do) or if he would not, threatneth to him and to all the other Christians within his Land, destruction. But Simeon, neither allured with his Promises, nor terrified with his Threatnings, continued constant in his Doctrine professed, so as neither he could be induced to Idolatrous Worship, nor yet to betray the truth of his Religion. For the which cause he was committed into Bonds, and there commanded to be kept, to the Kings pleasure further known.

The confluency of Simeon.

The fall of Vsthazares.

The wilful sufferers of Simeon go to the King.

It befel in the way as he was going to the Prison, there was sitting at the Kings Gate a certain Eunuch, an old Tutor or School-Master of the Kings, named Vsthazares, who had been once a Christian, and afterward falling from his Profession, fell with the Heathenish multitude to their Idolatry. This Vsthazares sitting at the door of the Kings Palace, and seeing Simeon passing by led to the prison, rose up and reverenced the Bishop. Simeon again with sharp words (as the time would suffer) rebuked him, and in great anger cried out against him, which being once a Christian, would so cowardly revolt from his Profession, and to return again to the Heathenish Idolatry. At the hearing of thefe words the Eunuch forthwith hurfling out into tears, laying away his Courtly Apparel, which was sumptuous and costly, and putting upon him a black and mourning Weed, sitteth before the Court Gates weeping and bewailing, thus saying with himself, Woe is me, with what hope, with what face shall I look hereafter for my God, which have denied my God, when as this Simeon my familiar Acquaintance, thus passing by me, so much disdaineth me, that he refuseth with one gentle word to salute me?

The answer of Vsthazares to the King.

Thefe words being brought to the ears of the King (as fuch Tale-carriers never lack in Princes Courts) procured against him no little Indignation. Whereupon Sapores the King sending for him, first with gentle words and courtly Promises began to speak him fair, asking him, What cause he had so to mourn, and whether there was any thing in his house, which was denied him, or which he had not at his own will and asking? Whereunto Vsthazares answering again, said, That there was of nothing in that earthly house, which was to him lacking, or whereunto his desire flood. Yea would God (said he) O King, any other grief or calamity in all the World, whatsoever it were, had happened to me rather than this, for the which I do most justly mourn and sorrow! For this sorroweth me, that I am this day alive, who should rather have died long since, and that I see this Sun, which against my heart and mind, for your pleasure dissemblingly I appeared to Worship; for which cause double-wise I am worthy of death: First, for that I have denied Christ. Secondly, because I did dissemble with you. And incontinent upon thefe words, sweating by Him that made both Heaven and Earth, affirmed moft certainly, that although he had played the Fool before, he would never be so mad again, as instead of the Creator and Maker of all things, to Worship the Creatures which he had made and cheated. Sapores the King being afronied at the so sudden alteration of this man, and doubting with himself whether to be angry with those luchunters or with him; whether to intreat him with gentleness or with rigor: at length in this mood commanded the said Vsthazares his old ancient Servant, and first Tutor and bringer up of his youth, to be had away, and to be beheaded. As he was going to the place of Execution, he desired of the Executioners a little to stay, while he might send a message unto the King, which was this (sent in by certain of the Kings moft trufty Eunuchs) desiring him, that for all the old and faithful Service he had done to his Father and to him, he would now require him with this one office again, to cause to be cried openly by a publick Crier in thefe words following, That Vsthazares was beheaded, not for any Treasonry or Crime committed against the King or the Realm, but only for that he was a Christian, and would not as the Kings pleasure deny his God. And to according unto his requeft, it was performed and granted. For this cause did Vsthazares so much desire the cause of his death to be published: because that as his shrinking back from Christ was a great occasion to many Christians to do the like; so now the same, hearing that Vsthazares died for no other cause but only for the Religion of Christ, should learn likewise by his example to be fervent and constant in that which they profess. And thus the blessed Eunuch did consummate consummate his Martyrdom. Of the which his said Martyrdom, Simeon being in prison hearing, was very joyful, and gave God thanks; who in the next day following, being brought forth before the King, and constantly refuting to condescend unto the Kings request, to worship vilible creatures, was likewise by the commandement of the King beheaded, with a great number more, which the same day also did suffer, to the number (as is said) of an hundred and more; all which were put to death before Simeon, he standing by and exhorting them with comfortable words: Admonishing them to stand firm and stedfast in the Lord; preaching and teaching them concerning death, Resurrection, and true piety; and proved by the Scriptures that to be true which he had said, declaring moreover that to be true life indeed, for to die, and that to be death indeed, to deny or betray God for fear of punishment: And added further, that there was no man alive, but needs once must die: For so much as to all men is appointed necessarily here to have an end. But those things, which after this life follow hereafter, to be eternal, which neither shall come to all men after one sort. Put as the condition and trade of life in divers men doth differ, and is not in all men like: So the time shall come, when all men in a moment shall render and receive according to their doings in this present life immortal rewards: Such as have here done well of life and glory; such as have done contrary of perpetual punishment. As touching thereof our well doing here is no doubt but of all other our holy actions and vertuous deeds, there is no higher or greater deed, than if a man here lose his life for his Lord God. With these words of comfortable exhortation, the holy Martyrs being prepared, willingly yielded up their lives to death. After whom at last followed Simeon, with two other Priests or Ministers of his Church: Abdeesalaes and Ananias, which also with him were partakers of the same Martyrdom.

The story of Pusices Martyr.

At the suffering of those above mentioned, it happened that Pusices one of the Kings officers, and overseers of his artificers, was there present, who seeing Ananias being an aged old Father, somewhat to shake and tremble at the sight of them that suffered: O father (said he) a little moment shut thine eyes, and be strong, and shortly thou shalt see the sight of God. Upon these words thus spoken, Pusices immediately was apprehended and brought unto the King, who there constantly confessed himself to be a Christian, and for that he was very bold and hardy before the King in this cause of Christs faith, was extreamly and most cruelly handled in the execution of his Martyrdom. For in the upper part of his neck they made a hole to thrust in their hand, and pluckt out his tongue out of his mouth, and so he was put to death. At the which time also the daughter of Pusices, a Godly virgin, by the malicious accusation of the wicked, was apprehended and put to death.

The next year following, upon the same day, when the Christians did celebrate the remembrance of the Lords passion, which we call good friday before Easter (as witnesseth the faid Sozomenus) Sapores the King directed out a cruel and sharp Edict throughout all his land, condemning to death all them, whosoever confessed themselves to be Christians. By reason whereof an innumerable multitude of Christians, through the wicked procuring of the malignant Magicians, suffered the same time by the sword, both in City and in Town: Some being sought for, some offering themselves willingly, left they should seem by their silence to deny Christ. Thus all the Christians, that could be found, without pity were slain, and divers also of the Kings own Court and houshold. Amongst whom was also Azades an Eunuch, one whom the King did intirely love and favour; which Azades after that the King understood thereof, commanded after that no Christians should be slain, but them only which were the Doctors and Teachers of Christian Religion.

Trabula the sister of Simeon.

False accusation rashly believed.

Trabula and her sister Martyrs.

In the same time it happened that the Queen fell into a certain disease; upon the occation whereof, the cruel Tyrant, with the wicked Magicians, fully and maliciously accused Trabula, the sister of Simeon the Martyr, a Godly Virgin, with another sister also of hers, that they had wrought privy charms to hurt the Queen, for the revenging of the death of Simeon. This accusation being received and believed, innocent Trabula, with the others were condemned, and with a saw cut in sunder by the middle, whose quarters were then hanged upon stakes, the Queen going between them, thinking thereby to be delivered of her sickness. This Trabula was a Maid of a right comely beauty and very amiable, to whom one of the Magicians cast great love, much desiring and labouring by gifts and rewards, sent into the prison to win her to his pleasure; promising that if she would apply to his request, she should be delivered and set at liberty. But she utterly refuling to consent unto him, or rather rebuking him for his incontinent attempt, did choose rather to die, than to betray either the Religion of her mind, or the Virginity of her body. Sozom.

The blind chance of the wicked Queen.

Now for so much as the King had commanded that no Christians should be put to death, but only such as were the teachers and leaders of the flock; The Magicians and Archmagicians left no diligence untried to set forward the matter. Whereby great affliction and persecution was among the Bishops and teachers of the Church, which inall places went to slaughter, especially in the country of Diobene; for that part of Persia above all other, was most Christian. Where Aceptimas the Bishop with a great number of his flock and Clergy were apprehended and taken: Upon the apprehension of whom, the Magicians, to satisfie the Kings commandment, dimnified all the rest, only depriving them of their living and goods. Only Aceptimas the Bishop they retained, with whom one Jacobus a Minister, or Priest of his Church was also joyned; not of any compullion, but only as himself so defired and obtained of those Magicians that he might follow him, and be coupled in the same bonds to serve the aged Bishop, and to relieve (so much as he might) his calamities, and heal his wounds. For he had been fore scourged before of the Magicians, after they had apprehended him, and brought him to worship the Sun: Which thing, because he would not do, they cast him into prison again, where this Jacobus was waiting upon him. At the same time likewise Athalar a Priest or Minister, also Azadanes and Abdiesus Deacons, were imprisoned, and miserably scourged for the testimony of the Lord Jesus. After this the Archimagus, espying his time, complaineth unto the King of them, having authority and commission given him (unless they would worship the Sun) to punish them as he pleased. This commandment received of the King, the Master Magus doth declare to them in prison. But they answered again plainly, that they would never be either betrayers of Christ, or worshippers of the Sun; whereupon without mercy they were put to bitter torments; where Aceptimas strongly perfisting in the confession of Christ, indured to death. The other being no less rent and wounded with scourges, yet continued marvellously alive; and because they would in no case turn from their constant sentence, were turned again into prison. Of whom Athalas in both the time of his whipping, was so drawn and racket with pulling, that both his arms being loosed out of the joynts, hanged down from his body: Which he so carried about without use of any hand to feed himself, but as he was fed of others.

Ex Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. 9. cap.

The rumor and noise of this fo miferable affliction of the Chriftians in the Kingdom of Perfia, coming to the ears of Conftantinus the Emperor, put him in great heavinefs, ftudying and revolving with himfelf, how to help the matter, which indeed was very hard for him to do. It fo befel the fame time, that certain Ambaffadors were then at Rome from Sapores King of Perfia; to whom Conftantinus did eafily grant and confent, fatisfying all their requefts and demands: thinking thereby to obtain the more friendfhip at the Kings hands, that at his requeft he would be good to the Chriftians; to whom he writeth his Epiftle in their behalf, and fendeth the fame by his meffengers, beginning thus:

The copy and effect of the Epiftle of Conftantin to Sapores.

Divinam fidem fervans veritatis lucem fortior. Veritatis luce doctus divinam fidem cognofco, Per ea igitur, quibus illa res agendas confirmat, fanctiffimam religionem cognitam reddo & hunc me cultum doctorem cognitionis Sancti Dei habere confiteor, &c. Euſebius, De vita Conſtantini. lib. 4. The contents whereof, briefly do tend to this effect. Declaring unto him how he ſhould ſtand much beholden to him, if at his requeſt he would ſhew ſome quiet and reſt to the Chriſtians, in whoſe Religion there was nothing which he could juſtly blame. For ſo much as in their ſacrifices they uſe to kill nothing, nor to ſhed blood, but only to offer up unbloidy Sacrifices, to make their prayers unto God; who delighteth not in bloodſhedding; but only in the Soul that loveth Vertue, and followeth ſuch doctrine and knowledge, which is arguing unto true piety. And therefore ſuch men as do lead him, and learn ſo to believe and to worſhip God, are more to be commended. Moreover, he aſſureth him to find God more merciful unto him, if he would imbrace the Godly piety and truth of the Chriſtians. And for example thereof, bringeth in the ſtories of Galienus and Valerianus, who ſo long as they were favourers of the Chriſtians, did proſper and flouriſh. But as ſoon as they moved any perſecution againſt them, it happened to them as it did to all other Emperors before them, that all went backward with them: Eſpecially might appear by Valerianus, who after he had raged ſo cruelly againſt the Chriſtians, was eftſoons overcome of the Perſians; the revenging hand of God falling upon him, Where he led ever a miſerable life, in wretched Captivity. Further alſo for the more evidence of the ſame, he referreth the examples of thoſe Emperors and Tyrants in his time, whom he vanquiſhed and ſubdued only by his faith in Chriſt, for the which faith God was his helper, and gave him the victory in many battels, and triumph over great Tyrants; whereby he hath ſo enlarged the Dominion of the Roman Monarchy, from the Weſt ocean unto the uttermoſt parts well-near of all the Eaſt. To the doing and working whereof, he neither called to him the help of any charmer, or divination of ſoothſayer, nor uſed the killing of any ſacrifice; but only the following of the croſs, and prayer made to Almighty God, without any other bloody ſacrifice, was the armour wherewith he overcame, &c. And in the end of the Epiſtle addeth theſe words. What joy (ſaith he) what gladneſs would it be to my heart, to hear the ſtate alſo of the Perſians to flouriſh, as I with it to do, by imbracing this ſort of men, the Chriſtians, I mean? So that both you with them, and they with you in long proſperity may enjoy much felicity together as your hearts would deſire, and in ſo doing no doubt ye ſhall. For ſo ſhall you have God, which is the Author and Creator of all this univerſall world, to be mercifull and gracious to you. Theſe men therefore I commend unto you upon your Kingly honour; and upon your clemency and piety, wherewith you are indued, I commit them unto you, deſiring you to embrace and receive them according to your humanity and benignity, agreeing and convenient to your eſtate: Who in ſo doing ſhall now both procure to your ſelf grace through your faith, and alſo ſhall declare to me a great pleaſure and benefit worthy of thanks.

The generall care of godly Emperors for all Chriſtians in all Places.

This example wrote Conſtantinus to King Sapores; ſuch care had this godly Prince for them that believed in Chriſt, not only in his own Monarchy, but alſo in all places of the world: Neither is it to be doubted, but this interceſſion of the Emperor, did ſomething mitigate the heat of the Perſians perſecution, although thereof we read no certain thing in our Hiſtories.

Of other troubles and perſecutions we read, which happned afterward in the ſaid Country of Perſia, under Iſdegerdes the King, but theſe followed long after about the time of the Emperor Theodoſius. At which time ſuffered Andas their Biſhop, and Hormiſdas, a great noble mans ſon, and of great reputation among the Perſians; whom when the King underſtood to be a Chriſtian, and to deny to turn from his Religion, condemned him to keep his Elephants naked. In proceſs of time, the King looking out, and ſeeing him all ſwarted and tanned in the Sun, commanded him to have a ſhirt put on, and to be brought before him; whom then the King asked, If he would deny Chriſt. Hormiſdas hearing this, tore of his ſhirt from his body and caſt it from him, ſaying If ye think that I will deny my faith to Chriſt for a ſhirt, have here your gift again, &c. And ſo was upon that expelled the Country: Theodor. lib. 5.

Another there was that ſame time, named Suenes, which had under him an hundred ſervants. The King taking diſpleaſure with him for that he would not alter from his Religion and Godly truth, asked who was the worſt of all his ſervants, and him the King made ruler of all the reſt, and coupling him with his Maſters wife, brought alſo Suenes under his ſubjection, thinking thereby to ſubdue alſo the faith of Suenes: But it was builded upon a ſure foundation.

Suenes Martyr.

The conſtancy of Suenes.

Of Benjamin the Deacon, thus writeth the ſaid Theodores in his firſt Book, that after two years of his imprifonment, at the requeſt of the Roman Legate he was delivered: who afterward contrary to the Kings commandment preached and taught the Goſpel of Chriſt, and was moſt miſerably excamnificate, having twenty ſharp pricks of reeds thruſt under his nails; but when he did laugh at that, then in his privy yard he had a ſharp reed thruſt in with horrible pain; after that a certain long ſtalk ragged and thorny, being thruſt into his body by the nether part, was forced into him with the horribleneſs of the pain whereof, the valiant and invincible ſouldier of the Lord gave over his life. Theod. ibid. And thus much concerning the Martyrs and perſecutions among the Perſians, although theſe perſecutions long not to this time, which came (as it is ſaid) long after the days of Conſtantius, about the year of our Lord, 425.

Of the lamentable story, or rather tragedy of Marcus Arethusius their Bishop, thus writeth the said Sozomenus, and also Theodoretus in his third Book in these words as follow.

The story of Marcus Arethusius.

This tragedy (saith he) of Marcus Arethusius, doth require the eloquence and worthiness of Æschilus and Sophocles, which may, as the matter deserveth, set forth and beautifie his great afflictions. This man, at the commandment of Constantinus, pulled down a certain Temple dedicated to Idols, and in stead thereof built up a Church where the Christians might congregate. The Arethusians remembring the little good will that Julianus bare unto him, accused him as a Traytor and Enemy to him. At the first, according as the Scripture teacheth, he prepared himself to flie: But when he perceived that there were certain of his kinsmen or friends apprehended in his stead, returning again of his own accord, he offered himself to those that thirsted for his blood. Whom when they had gotten, as men neither pitying his old age and worn years, nor abashed at his vertuous conversation, being a man so adorned both with Doctrine and manners, first stript him naked, and pitifully beat him: then within a while after, they cast him into a foul filthy sink, and from thence being brought, they caused boys to thrust him in with sharpned sticks made for the nonce to provoke his pain the more. Lastly, they put him in a basket, and being anointed with honey and broth, they hung him abroad in the heat of the Sun, as meat for wasps and flies to feed upon. And all this extremity they shewed unto him, for that they would inforce him to do one of these things; that is, either to build up again the Temple which he had destroyed, or else to give so much money as should pay for the building of the same: But even as he purposed with himself to suffer and abide their grievous torments, so refused he to do that they demanded of him. At length they taking him to be but a poor man, and not able to pay such a sum of money, promised to forgive him the one half, so that he would be contented to pay the other half. But he hanging in the basket wounded pitifully with the sharpned sticks of boys and children, and all to be bitten with wasps and flies, did not only conceal his pain and grief, but also derided those wicked ones, and called them base, low, and terrene people, and he himself to be exalted and set on high. At length they demanding of him but a small sum of money, he answered thus: It is as great wickedness to confer one half penny in cafe of impiety, as if a man should bestow the whole. Thus they being not able to prevail against him, let him down, and leaving him, went their way, for that every man might learn at his mouth the example of true piety and faithfulness.

The true confidence of Marcus Arethusius.

Great cruelty shewed.

Contempt-ners the cause of cruelty.

A notable saying.

Although the tractation of these aforesaid stories and persecutions of Persia, above premised, do stray somewhat out of the order and course of time and place, as which came neither in the time of Constantine, nor pertinent to the Monarchy of Rome: Yet because in this present History we are in hand with the holy Martyrs and Saints of Christ; for so much as these also gave such a faithful testimony of the Lord Jesus with their blood, I thought therefore not to pass them over without some testimony in this our Catalogue of holy Martyrs. And here an end of these persecutions of the Primitive Church.

It may peradventure be marvelled of some, reading the History of these so terrible persecutions above specified, why God Almighty director of all things, would suffer his own people and faithful servants, believing in his own and only begotten Son Jesus, so cruelly to be handled, so wrongfully to be vexed, so extremely to be tormented and put to death, and that the space of so many years together, as in these foresaid persecutions may appear. To the which admiration I have nothing to answer, but to say with the words of Hierome, Non debemus iuspicare hac rerum iniquitate perturbari, videntes, &c. We ought not to be moved with this iniquity of things, to see the wicked to prevail against the body: For so much as in the beginning of the World, we see Abel the just to be killed of wicked Cain, and afterward Jacob being thrust out, Esau to Reign in his fathers house: In like case the Egyptians with brick and tile afflicted the sons of Israel's yea, and the Lord himself, was he not crucified of the Jews, Barebas the thief being let go? Time would not suffice me to recite and reckon up how the godly in this world go to wrack, the wicked flourishing and prevailing: Hiero. Briefly, howsoever the cause hereof proceedeth, whether for our sins here in this life, or how else soever; yet this is to us, and may be to all men a sufficient stay, that we are sure these afflictions and persecutions of God his people in this world, not to come by any chance or blind fortune, but by the provident appointment and forewarning of God. For so in the old Law, by the affliction of the children of Israel, he hath prefigured these persecutions of the Christians. So by the words of Christ's own mouth in the Gospel he did forewarn his Church of these troubles to come. Again, neither did he suffer these so great afflictions to fall upon his servants, before that he had premonished them sufficiently by special revelation in the Apocalyps of John his servant; in the which Apocalyps he declared unto his Church before, not only what troubles were coming at hand towards them; where and by whom they should come, but also in plain number, if the words of the prophesie be well understood, affigneth the true time. For how long the said persecutions should continue, and when they should cease. For as there is no doubt, but by the breast with seven heads, bearing the Whore of Babylon, drunken with the blood of Saints, is signified the City of Rome: So in my Judgment the power of making of forty two months (in the thirteenth of the Apocalyps) is to be expounded, taking every month for a Sabbath of years, that is, reckoning a month for seven years, so that forty and two such Sabbaths of years being gathered together, make up the years just, between the time of Christs death to the last year of the persecution of Maxentius, when Constantinus fighting under the banner of Christ, overcame him, and made an end of all persecution within the Monarchy of Rome. The number of which years by plain computation, come to two hundred ninety and four: to the which of two hundred ninety and four years, if ye add the other five years, under the persecution of Licinius in Asia, then it is filleth up full the three hundred years. And so long continued the persecution of Christs people, under the heathen Tyrants and Emperors, of the Monarchy of Rome, according to the number of the forty and two months which the beast had power to make, specified in the thirteenth of the Apocalyps. For the better explication whereof, because the matter being of no small importance, greatly appertaineth to the publick utility of the Church: and lest any should misdoubt me herein, to follow any private interpretation of mine own: I thought good to communicate to the Reader, that which hath been imparted unto me, in the opening of these mystical numbers in the foresaid Book of Revelation contained, by occasion as followeth.

The wicked in this world do most flourish and prevail.

Perfection, crowned by persecution. Perfection of God's promises figured and forewarned of God.

The beast had power to make 42 months.

The persecuting state of the Primitive Church compared to the beast, which had 42 months power. The limits of ten years.

As I was in hand with these Histories, and therein considered the exceeding rage of these perfecutions, the intolerable torments of the blessed Saints, so cruelly racked, rent, torn, and pluckt in pieces with all kind of tortures, pains and punishments that could be devised, more bitter than any death it self: I could not without great sorrow and passion of mind, behold their sorrowful afflictions, or write of their bloody passions. Wherein much like it hapned to me as did to Titus Livius; who writing of the wars of Carthage, was so moved in the writing thereof, Ac si in parte aliqua laboris ac periculi ipse pariter fuisset. Further, I proceed in the story; and the hotter the persecutions grew, the more my grief with them and for them increased: Not only pitying their woful case, but almost reasoning with God, thus thinking like a fool with my self, why God of his goodness would suffer his children and servants so vehemently to be cruciated and afflicted? If mortal things were governed by heavenly providence (as must needs be granted) why did the wicked so rage and flourish, and the godly go so to wrack? If sins deserved punishment, yet neither were they sinners alone, and why was their death above all other so sharp and bitter? At last why would the Lord suffer the vehemency of these so horrible persecutions to indure so long time against his poor Church, shewing unto them no certain determined end of their tribulations, whereby they knowing the appointed determination of Almighty God, with more consolation might indure out the same? As the Israelites in the captivity of Babylon had seventy years limited unto them: And under Pharoah they were promised a deliverance out. Also under the Syrian Tyrants three score and two weeks were abridged unto them. Only in these perfecutions I could find no end determined, nor limitation set for their deliverance. Whereupon much marveling with my self, I searched the Book of Revelation, to see whether any thing there might be found; where although I well perceived the Beast there described to signifie the Empire of Rome, which had Power to overcome the Saints; yet concerning the time and continuance of these Persecutions under the Beast, I found nothing to satisfie my doubt. For albeit I read there of forty two months, of a time, times, and half a time, of one thousand two hundred and threescore days; yet all this by computation coming but to three years and a half, came nothing near the long continuance of these Persecutions, which lasted three hundred years. Thus being vexed and turmoiled in spirit, about the reckoning of these numbers and years: it so hapned upon a Sunday in the morning, I lying in my bed, and musing about these numbers, suddenly it was answered to my mind, as with a Majesty, thus inwardly saying within me, Thou Fool, count these months by Sabbaths, as the weeks of Daniel are counted by Sabbaths. The Lord I take to witness, thus it was. Whereupon thus being admonished, I began to reckon the forty two months by Sabbaths: first of months, that would not serve: then by Sabbaths of years, wherein I began to feel some probable understanding. Yet not satisfied herewith, to have the matter more sure, efsoons I repaired to certain Merchants of mine acquaintance: of whom one is departed a true faithful Servant of the Lord, the other two be yet alive, and witnesses hereof. To whom the number of these foresaid forty two months being propounded and examined by Sabbaths of years, the whole sum was found to surmount unto two hundred ninety and four years, containing the full and just time of these foresaid Persecutions, neither more nor less.

Forty two months or three years and a half. Rev. 11.

Now this one Clasp being opened, the other numbers that follow are plain and manifest to the Intelligent Reader to be understood. For where mention is made of three years and a half, of one time, two times and half a time, also of one thousand two hundred and threescore days, all these come to one reckoning and signifie forty and two months, by which months, as is said, is signified the whole time of these Primitive Persecutions, as here in order may appear.

The mystical Numbers in the Apocalyps opened.

1. One thousand two hundred and forty. Rev. 11. 12.

First, where mention is made, Apocalyps, Chapter eleven, that the two Prophets shall Prophesie 1260 days; and also that the woman flying into the Desert, shall there be fed 1260 days: who knoweth not that 1260 days make three years and a half? that is, months ——— 42

2. Three days and a half. Rev. 11.

Secondly, where we read, Chap. 11. the bodies of the two foresaid Prophets shall lie in the streets of the great City unburied the space of three days and a half, and after the said three days and a half they shall revive again, &c. let the hours of these three days and a half (which be 42) be reckoned every day for a Sabbath of years, or else every day for a month, and they come to months ——— 42

3. A time, times, and half a time. Rev. 12.

Thirdly, whereas in the same Book is expressed that the Woman had two wings given her to fly unto the Desert for a time, times and half a time: give for one time one year, or one day: for two times, two years or two days; for half a time, half a year, or half a day; and so it is manifest, that these three years and a half, mount to months ——— 42

4. Forty two months or three years and a half. Rev. 11.

Fourthly, account these forty two months aforesaid (which the Beast had Power to make, Apoc. 11.) by Sabbath of years; that is, seven years for a month, or every month for seven years, and it amounteth to the sum of years ——— 294

And so have ye the just years, days, times, and months of these foresaid Persecutions under the Beast, neither shorter nor longer, reckoning from the death of John Baptist under Herod the Roman King, to the end of Maxentius, and of Licinius, the two last great Persecutors, the one in the West, the other in the East: who were both vanquished by godly Constantinus. And so peace was given to the Church, albeit not in such ample wise, but that divers Tumults and Troubles afterward infused, yet they lasted not long: and the chief brunt, to speak of these Roman Persecutions which the Holy Ghost especially confidered above all other in this his Revelation thus ended in the time of Constantinus. Then was the great Dragon the Devil, to wit, the fierce rage and power of his malicious persecuting, tied short for a thousand years after this, so that he could not prevail in any such fort, but that the Power and Glory of the Gospel by little and little increasing and spreading with great joy and liberty, so prevailed that at length it got the upper hand and replenished the whole Earth, rightly verifying therein the water of Ezechiel, which issuing out of the right side of the Altar, the further it ran, the deeper it grew, till at length it replenished the whole Ocean Sea, and healed all the Fishes therein. No otherwise the course of the Gospel proceeding of small and hard beginnings, kept still his stream: the more it was stopped, the swifter it ran: by blood it seeded, by death it quickened, by cutting it multiplied, through violence it sprung: till at last out of Thraldom and Oppression so braft forth into perfect liberty, and flourished in all Prosperity: had it so been that the Christians wisely and moderately could have used this liberty, and not abused the same, forgetting their former Estate to their own pride, pomp, and worldly ease, as it came afterward to pass: whereof more is to be seen and said (the Lord willing) in place and time convenient.

Ezech. 47.

From the first Persecution of the Primitive Church to the last Persecution two hundred ninety and four years.

Universal Perfection ariseth foe one thousand years in the Church.

Apoc. 20. From the time of Licinius to Wickliffs one thousand years.

Satan bound up for a thousand years. The time of Satans binding opened.

And thus much touching the prophetical numbers in the Apocalyps. Wherein is to be noted, and magnified, the eternal Wisdom and high Providence of Almighty God, so disposing and governing his Church, that no adversity or perturbation happeneth at any time to it, which his provident wisdom doth not fore-see before, and preordain; neither doth he preordain or determine any thing, which he doth not most truly perform, both fore-seeing the beginning of such perfecutions, and limiting the end thereof, how long to continue, and when to cease. In much like sort we read in the Books of Genesis, how the flock of Israel was four hundred years in the Land of Egypt. During the space of which four hundred years, after the death of Joseph (who beareth a plain figure of Christ) they were hardly intreated, and cruelly afflicted of the Egyptians, about the space of three hundred years, reckoning from after the death of Joseph, to their deliverance out of the bondage of Egypt: semblably as these Christians, after Christs time suffered the like bondage under the Roman Tyrants.

The perfecuted Israelites bearing a figure of the perfecuted Church of Christ.

Thus much by the way I thought to insinuate, lest any should muse or take any offence in himself to see or read of the Church so long and so many years, to be under so miserable and extream Afflictions: wherein neither chance nor fortune, nor disposition of man, hath had any place, but only the fore-counsel and determination of the Lord so governed and disposed the same: who not only did suffer them to fall, and foresaw those Persecutions before they fell, but also appointed the times and years how long they should last, and when they should have an end, as by the foresaid forty two months in the thirteenth and eleventh Chapters of St. Johns Apocalyps hath been declared. Which months, containing two hundred ninety and four years, if they be rightly gathered, make the full time between the first year of the Persecution of Christ under the Jews and Herod, till the last year of Persecution under Licinius; which was from the Nativity of Christ, in the year of our Lord three hundred twenty and four: from the first Persecution of Christ, in the year of our Lord, two hundred ninety and four, as is aforesaid. After the which year according to the preordinate Council of God, when his feverity had been sufficiently declared upon his house, it pleased him to shew mercy again, and to bind up Satan the old Serpent, according to the twentieth Chapter of the Revelation, for the space of a thousand years: that is, from this time of Licinius, to the time of John Wickliffe and John Husse. During all which time, albeit certain Conflicts and Tumults have been among Christian Bishops themselves in the Church: yet no universal murthering Persecution was stirring before the Preaching of John Wickliffe, of Husse, and such others, as in the further process of this History (Christ willing and aiding us) shall more appear hereafter.

Thus having at large discourfed these horrible Persecutions past, and heavy Afflictions of Christian Martyrs:

now by the Grace of God, coming out of this Red-Sea of bloody Perfecution, leaving Pharaoh and his Hoft behind: let us fing gloriously to the worthy Name of our God, who through the blood of the Lamb after long and tedious Afflictions, at length hath vifited his people with comfort, hath tied up Satan (hort, hath fent his meek Mofes (gentle Conftantine I mean) by whom it hath fo pleafed the Lord to work Deliverance to his Captive people, to fet his Servants at liberty, to turn their mourning into joy, to magnifie the Church of his Son, to deftroy the Idols of all the World, to grant life and liberty (and would God alfo not fo much riches) unto them which before were the the abjects of all the World, and all by the means of godly Conftantinus, the meek and moft Chriftian Emperour, of whofe divine Victories, againft fo many Tyrants and Emperors, Perfecutors of Chrifts people, and laftly, againft Licinius, in the year of our Lord, three hundred twenty and four, of whofe other noble Acts and Prowefles, of whofe bleffed Vertues and his happy Birth and Progeny, part we have comprehended before, part now remaining (Chrift willing) to be declared.

This Conftantine was the Son of Conftantius the Emperor, a good and vertuous Child of a good and vertuous Father; born in Britany (as faith Eutropius) whofe Mother was named Helena, Daughter indeed of King Coilus: although Ambrofius in his Funeral Oration of the death of Theodofius faith, fhe was an Inholders Daughter. He was a moft bountiful and gracious Prince, having a defire to nourifh Learning and good Arts, and did oftentimes ufe to read, write, and ftudy himfelf: He had marvelous good fucceffe and profperous atchieving of all things he took in hand, which then was (and truly) fuppofed to proceed of this, for that he was fo great a Favourer of the Chriftian Faith. Which Faith when he had once embraced, he did ever after moft devoutly and religioufly reverence, and command by fpecial Commiffion and Proclamation, that every man fhould profefs the fame Religion throughout all the Roman Monarchy. The worfhipping of Idols, (whereunto he was addict by the allurement of Fauftа his wife, infomuch that he did facrifice to them) after the difcomfiture of Maxentius in battel, he utterly abjured: but his Baptifm he deferred even unto his old age, becaufe he had determined a journey into Perfia, and thought in Jordan to have been baptized, Euſeb. lib. de vita Conſtantini.

As touching his natural difpofition and wit, he was very eloquent, a good Philofopher, and in difputation fharp and ingenious. He was accuftomed to fay, that an Emperor ought to refufe no labour for the utility of the Common-weal; yea, and to adventure the mangling of his body for the remedy thereof; but if otherwife it may be holden, to cherifh the fame. This do Aurelius, Victor, Pomponius Letus, and Ignatius write of him. He firft entered into the Empire by the merciifulnefs of God, minding after long waves of doleful Perfecution to reftore unto his Church peace and tranquility, in the year of our Lord three hundred and eleven, as Euſebius accounteth in his Chronicle. His Reign continued as Eutropius affirmeth, thirty years, Latus faith thirty and two years, lacking two months. Great peace and tranquility injoyed the Church under the Reign of this good Emperor, which took great pain and travel for the Preſervation thereof. Firft, yea, and that before he had fubdued Licinius, he fet forth many Edicts for the reftitution of the goods of the Church, for the revoking of the Chriſtians out of exile, for taking away the diffention of the Doctors out of the Church, for the fetting of them free from publick Charges, and fuch like, even as the Copy of his Conftitutions here under declareth, which Euſebius in his tenth Book and fifth Chapter repeateth in this wife.

Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

VIctor Conſtantinus Maximus Auguſtus, to our loving Subjects inhabiting throughout the Eaſt parts, ſendeth greeting. The thing it ſelf, which in the ſure and moſt firm Law of Nature is contained, doth give unto all men (even as God hath ordained the ſame) ſufficient perceivance and underſtanding, both of ſuch things as man ought to fore-ſee, as alſo what things preſently he ought to meditate. Neither is there any thing therein to be doubted of ſuch as have their minds directed to the ſeely or meek ſpirit of perfect underſtanding: ſo that the perfect comprehending of found reaſon, and the perceivance thereof be compared with the knowledge of God, being the true and perfect vertue. Wherefore let no wiſe man be troubled, although he ſee divers men of divers diſpoſitions: for wiſdome which ſtringeth of vertue, cannot abide or acquaint her ſelf with fond Elues, unleſs (that on the other ſide) the malice of perverſe filthineſs prolong her days, and cauſe the ſame Idiety to ſurvive. Wherefore aſſuredly the crowns and price of vertue lieth open unto all men, and the moſt mighty God ordereth the judgment of the ſame. I underbeedily (as manifeſtly as poſſible is) will indeavour my ſelf to teſtifie and confeſs unto you all the hope which is in me. I think verily that the Emperors which before this time have lately been, even for their tyranny had the Empire taken from them: and my Father only exerciſing and uſing all meekneſs and lenity in his affairs, calling upon God the Father with great devotion and humility, hath been exalted to the ſame: and all the reſt, as men wanting their wits, and in compariſon as ſavage Beaſts, rather did give themſelves to like cruelty, than to any lenity and gentleneſs towards their Subjects: in which tyranny every one for his time being mezzelled, utterly ſubverted the true and unfeilable Doctrine; and ſo great malice was there kindled in their breaſt, that when all things were in peaceable tranquility, they made and raiſed moſt cruel and bloody inteſtine or civil Wars. It is credibly informed us, that in thoſe days Apollo gave Anſwers, but not by any mans mouth, but out of a certain Cave and dark place (ſaying) That he was much diſquieted by thoſe that were the juſt men and livers upon the earth; ſo that he could or would not for them declare the truth of ſuch things as others demanded. And hereby it came to paſs, that ſuch falſe Divinations were given from the Golden Tables in Apollos Temple. And this thing did his Prophetical Prieſt complain of, when he took up again the hair of his head, that other had contemptuouſly caſt down; and ſaid, That the neglecting of his divination was the cauſe of ſo many evils amongſt men. But let us ſee what was the end hereof. We now boldly, and without fear, invocate and worſhip the Omnipotent God. When I was a Child, I heard, that he which then was chief Emperor of Rome, unhappy, yea, moſt unhappy man, being ſeduced and brought into error by his Souldiers, curiouſly inquired who were thoſe juſt men upon the earth that Apollo meant? And one of his Prieſts which was neer about him, made anſwer, That they were the Chriſtians. This anſwer unto him being as delectable as honey unto the mouth, drew the Sword (given unto him to be a Revenger of evil Doers and Malefactors) againſt the Profeſſors of the irreprehenſible Sanctimony and Religion; and ſtraight-way he gave forth a Commiſſion (to bloody Homicides, as I may well call them) and gave Commandment to all the Judges that they ſhould indeavour themſelves with all the cunning they had, to the deviſing of more grievous and ſharper Puniſhments againſt the poor Chriſtians. Then, then I ſay, a man might have ſeen how greatly the honeſt Profeſſors of that Religion were moleſted with cruelty, and daily ſuffered no ſmall Injuries and Contumelies, and that alſo they ſuffered and ſuſtained the ſame with ſuch temperance, as though they had had no Injuries at all done unto them. Which temperance and patience of theirs was the cauſe why the furious Citizens were the more mad and raging againſt them. What Fires, what Tortures, what kind of Torments were there, but they without reſpect either of Age or Sex were inforced to feel them?

Then did the Earth, without doubt, her ſelf bewail her Children and the round World which containeth all things, being ſprinkled and imbrued with their blood, made doleful lamenlamentation for them, and the day it ſelf provoked to mourn, was made amazed for them. But what is this to purpoſe? Now the very barbarous Nations reſpect for their ſakes which received and harboured them, when they were afraid and fled from us, keeping them, as it were, in moſt loving and amiable Captivity; and they ſaved not only their lives, but alſo were a defence for their Religion. And now alſo the Roman Nation remembreth and hath before their eyes this blame and ſpot, which the Chriſtians that were of that time worthily gave unto them, when they by them were banished (as unfit members of that Common-wealth) amongſt the barbarous people. What needeth to make further rehearſal of the mourning lamentation, which the Heathen people themſelves throughout all the world made for the piteful murther and ſlaughter of them? After this it came to paſs, that they which were Authors of all theſe miſchiefs died alſo, and were committed for their reward to the moſt filthy and horrible dungeon of Hell. They being ſo intangled with inteſtine and civil Wars, left alive neither Name nor Kinſmen of their own, which thing undoubtedly had not chanced unleſs the wicked Divinations of Apollo's Oracles had deceived and bewitched them. To thee therefore now I pray: Oh moſt mighty God, that thou wilt vouchſafe to be merciful, and pardon all the Eaſt Parts and Inhabitants of the ſame, being oppreſſed with Calamity: and that by me thy Servant then will of thy goodneſs help and relieve the ſame. And theſe things raſhly crawel not at thy hands, O Lord, moſt mighty and holieſt God of all. For I being perſwaded by the only Oracles, have both begun and alſo finiſhed wholſome and profitable things: and further, by the bearing and ſhewing of thine Enſign, have overcome a mighty and ſtrong Hoſt: and when any neceſſity of the Common-weal (to my charge committed) requireth thereunto (following thoſe ſigns and tokens of thy Vertues) I boldly go forth and fight againſt mine Enemies: and for this cauſe have I ſacrificed my Soul unto thee, purified and cleanſed both with thy love and fear. Yea truly, thy Name do I ſincerely love, and thy Power do I reverence, which by many Tokens and Wonders haſt ſhewed and confirmed thereby my Belief and Faith. Therefore will I do my endeavour, and bend my ſelf thereunto, that I may re-edifie thy moſt holy Houſe, which thoſe wicked and ungodly Emperors have with ſo great ruine laid waſte; thy people do I deſire to bring and eſtabliſh in firm peace and tranquility, and that for the publick utility of all the Inhabitants of the Earth. Thoſe which yet err, and are out of the way, enjoy the benefit of peace and quietneſs, with and amongſt the number of the faithful ſort: for I truſt the reſtitution of the like ſociety and participation may be a means to bring them alſo that err into the perfect way of verity. Let no man therefore be grievous one unto another, but what every man thinketh beſt, that let him do: for ſuch as are wiſe, ought throughly to be perſwaded, that they only mean to live holily, and as they ſhould do, whom the Spirit of God moveth to take their delight and recreation in reading his holy Will: and if others wilfully will go out of the way, cleaving to the Synagogues of falſe Doctrine, they may at their own peril. As for us, we have the moſt worthy Houſe or Congregation of Gods verity, which he according to his own goodneſs and nature hath given us. And alſo we wiſh unto them, that with like participation and common conſent, they may feel with us the ſame delectation of mind. For this our Religion is neither new, nor newly invented, but it is an old or ancient belief the Creation of the World to be, and which God hath commanded to be celebrated with ſuch Worſhip as hath ſeemed and pleaſed him: but all living men are lyars, and are deceived with divers and ſundry Illuſions. Thou, O God, for Chriſt thy Sons ſake, ſuffer not this wickedneſs again to rout: thou haſt ſet up a clear burning light, that thereby as many as thou haſt choſen may come unto thee, the holy Miracles approve the ſame. It is thy Power that keepeth us in innocency and fidelity. The Sun and the Moon run their appointed courſe. Neither yet in ranging-wiſe wander the Stars to what place of the World they liſt themſelves. The days, years, months, and times keep their appointed turns. The Earth abideth firm and unmoveable at thy Word: and the Wind at the time (by thee diredted) ſtormeth and bloweth. The ſtreaming watry Floods ebb in time according as they flow. The raging Sea abideth within her bounded limits: and for that the Ocean Sea ſtretcheth out her ſelf in equal length and breadth with the whole Earth, this muſt be wrought with ſome marvelous Workmanſhip of thine own hand. Which thing, unleſs it were at thy Will made and diſpoſed: without all doubt ſo great difference and partition between, would ere this time have brought utter ruine and deſtruction both to the life of man, and to all that belongeth to man beſide. Which for that they have ſuch great and huge Conflicts amongſt themſelves, as alſo the inviſible Spirits have; we give thee thanks, O Lord moſt mighty, God of all gods, that all Mankind hath not been deſtroyed thereby. Surely even as greatly as thy benignity and gentleneſs is manifeſted by divers and ſundry Benefits beſtowed upon us, ſo much alſo is the ſame ſet forth and declared in the Diſcipline of thy eternal Word, to thoſe that be heavenly wiſe, and apply themſelves to the attainment of ſincere and true Vertue. But if any ſuch there be that little regard, or have but ſmall reſpect unto the conſideration thereof, let them not blame or lay a fault in others that do the ſame: for that Phyſick whereby Health is obtained, is manifeſtly offered unto all men. Now therefore let no man go about to ſubvert that, which experience it ſelf doth ſhew (of neceſſity) to be pure and good. Let us therefore altogether uſe the participation of this Benefit beſtowed upon us; that is to ſay, the Benefit of Peace and Tranquility, ſetting apart all Controverſie. And let no man hurt or be prejudicial to his Fellow for that thing wherein he thinketh himſelf to have done well. If by that, which any man knoweth and hath experience of, he thinketh he may profit his Neighbour, let him do the ſame; if not, let him give over and remit it till another time: for there is a great diverſity betwixt the willing and voluntary imbracing of Religion, and that when a man is thereunto inforced and coacted. Of theſe things have I made a more large Diſcourſe, than indeed the ſcope of mediocrity requireth; eſpecially becauſe I would not have my Faith (touching the verity) to be hid; for that I bear there be ſome which complain that the Churches are in a manner ſtanding of their Temples, and that the power of ſuch Darkneſs is cut off and taken away. Which thing ſurely I would take in better part, were it not that the violent Rebellion of ſtagitious Error were ſo fixed in many mens hearts, whereby they thruſt after the utter ſubverſion of the Common-weal and Empire.

The Prayer of Conſtantinus was fulfilled. Such thing in their Confeſſion preach the very and true God.

Such was the goodneſs of this Emperor Conſtantinus, or rather ſuch was the providence of Almighty God toward his Church in ſtirring him up, that all his care and ſtudy of mind was ſet upon nothing elſe, but only how to benefit and inlarge the commodities of the ſame. Neither was it to him enough to deliver the Church and people of God from outward vexation of forreign Tyrants and perſecutors. No leſs beneficial was his godly care alſo in quieting the inward diſſentions and diſturbance within the Church, among the Chriſtian Biſhops themſelves; according as we read of Moſes the deliverer of the Iſraelites, in agreeing the brethren together when he ſaw them at variance: Exod. 2. No leſs alſo did his vigilant ſtudy extend in erecting, reſtoring, and inriching the Churches of God in all Cities, and in providing for the Miniſters of the ſame. And therefore writing to Anilinus his cheif Captain, declareth his will and mind to him in letters concerning the goods which did appertain to the Churches of the Chriſtians, that he ſhould procure vigilantly for the ſame: that all ſuch goods, houſes, and gardens, belonging before to the right of Churches, ſhould again be reſtored in all ſpeedy wiſe, and that he therein might be certified with ſpeed, &c.

Moreover, he writing to the ſaid Anilinus in another letter, ſignifieth unto him in this effect: that for ſo much as the contempt of God his reverend Religion, is and hath been ever the greateſt decay to the name and people of Rome, as contrarily the maintaining and reverencing the ſame hath ever brought proſperity to all Common weals: therefore he in conſideration thereof hath taken that order, and giveth to him in charge, that through that Province where he hath to do, which was in Africa where Ceciliannus was Biſhop, he ſhould there see and provide that all such Ministers and Clerks, whose Vocation was to serve in the Church, should be freed and exempted from all publick duties and burdens, whereby they being so priviledged, and all Impediments removed which should hinder their divine ministration, thereby the common utility of the people might the better flourish, &c.

Another letter of Constantine to Miltiades Bishop of Rome.

Furthermore the said Constantinus in an other Letter writing to Miltiades Bishop of Rome, and to Marcus, declareth in his Letters to them how Cecilianus Bishop of Carthage hath been accused unto him by divers of his Colleagues and fellow Bishops. Wherefore his will is, that the said Cecilianus with ten Bishops his Accusers, with ten other his Defendants should repair up to him at Rome; where in the present assistance of the foresaid Miltiades, Rhetcius, Maternus, Marinus, and of other their fellow Colleagues, the cause of Cecilianus might be heard and rightly examined, so that all Schism and Division might be cut off from among them, wherein the fervent desire of Constantinus to peace and unity may well appear.

The letter of Constantine to Chrestus Bishop of Syracusa.

Upon the like cause and argument also, he writeth to Chrestus Bishop of Syracusa; being so desirous to nourish peace and concord in the Church, that he offereth to him, with his under Ministers and three Servants, his free carriage to come up to him unto the Council of other Bishops, for the agreeing of certain matters belonging to the Church.

He writeth also another Letter to the forenamed Cecilianus Bishop of Carthage.

The Letter of Constantine to Alexander and Arrius. Eu. Eccles. de vita Constan. lib. 2.

Moreover an other Letter he writeth to Eusebius for the edifying of new Christian Churches, and restoring of them which had been wasted before by foreign Enemies. And after he had collected the Synod of Nice for the study of peace and unity of the Church, he writeth upon the same to Alexander and Arrius. In which his Letters he moft lamentably uttered the great grief of his heart, to see and hear of their contention and division, whereby the peace and common harmony of the Church was broken, the Synod provoked and refilled, the holy people of the Lord divided into parts and tumults, contrary to the office of good and circumspect men, whose duty were rather to nourish concord, and to seek tranquility. And though in some small points and light trifles they did disagree from others; yet the example of Philosophers might teach them, who although in some part of a sentence or piece of a question, some might differ from others, yet in the unity of their Profession they did all join as fellows together. In like case were it their duty in such fruitless questions (or rather pieces of questions) to keep them in the conceptions of their minds in silence unto themselves, and not to bring them forth into publick Synods, to break therefore from the communion of the reverend Council: declaring moreover in the said Epistle, the first origin and occasion of this their contentious distention to rise upon vain and trifling terms, vile causes and light questions, and pieces rather of questions; about such matters as neither are to be moved, nor to be answered unto, being moved; more curious to be searched, and perilous to be expressed, than necessary to be enquired. Magisque puerilibus ineptiis, quam sacerdotum ac cordatorum virorum prudentiæ convenientia; as he there doth term them. Wherefore by all manner of means he doth labour them, doth intreat them, and perswade them, not only with reasons, but also with tears and sighing sobs, that they would restore peace again unto the Church, and quietness to the rest of his life (which otherwise would not be sweet unto him) and they would return again to the communion of the reverend Council; who in so doing should open his way and purposed journey into the East parts: which otherwise hearing of their discord and distention, would be sorry to see with his eyes that which grieveth him now to hear with his ears: with much more in the same Epistle contained, but this is the effect of the whole, Eusebius. de vita Constant. lib. 2. Thus much I thought summarily to comprehend, whereby the divine disposition and singular gentle nature of this meek and religious Constantine might more notoriously appear to all Princes, for them to learn by his example what zeal and care they ought to bear toward the Church of Christ, and how gently to govern, and how to be beneficial to the same.

Constantine set forth a spectacle to all Princes to follow.

Many other Edicts and Epistles written to other places and parties, he expressed at large in the second Book of Eusebius, De vita Constantini; wherein the zealous care and Princely beneficence of this noble Emperor toward the Church of Christ may appear: whereof in a brief recapitulation such Specialties we have collected as here followeth, and is to be seen in Sozo. lib. 1. cap. 8. 9.

A brief recapitulation of Constantines acts were wrought by Constantine upon Christs Church.

First, he commanded all them to be set free, whosoever for the confession of Christ had been condemned to banishment, or to the Mines of metal, or to any publick or private labour to them inflicted. Such as were put to any infamy or shame among the multitude, he willed them to be discharged from all such blemish of ignominy. Souldiers which before were deprived either of their place, or put out of their wages, were put to their liberty either to serve again in their place, or quietly to live at home. Whatsoever honour, place, or dignity had been taken away from any man, should be restored to them again. The Goods and Possessions of them that had suffered death for Christ, howsoever they were alienated, should return to their Heirs or next of Kin, or for lack of them should be given to the Church. He commanded moreover that only Christians should bear Office; the other he charged and restrained, that neither they should Sacrifice nor exercise any more Divinations and Ceremonies of the Gentiles, nor set up any Images, nor keep any Feasts of the Heathen Idolaters. He corrected moreover and abolished all such unlawful manners and unhoneft usages in the Cities as might be hurtful any ways to the Church; as the custom that the Egyptians had in the flowing of Nilus, at what time the people used to run together like brute Beasts, both Men and Women, and with all kind of Filthiness and Sodomitry to pollute their Cities in celebrating the increase of that River. This abomination Constantine extinguished, casting that wicked Order called Androgyne, to be killed: by reason when of the River afterward (through the benefit of God) yielded more increase in his flowing, to the greater fertility of the ground, than it did before.

Where sodomites is punished, there godliness follows.

Among the Romans was an old Law, that such as were barren, having no fruit of Children, should be amerced of half their Goods. Also, that such as being above the years of twenty and five unmarried, should not be numbred in the same Priviledges with them that were married, neither should he Heirs to them, to whom notwithstanding they were next in kin. These Laws, because they seemed unreasonable (to punish the defect of Nature, or gift of Virginity by mans Law) he abrogated and took away. An other Order was among the Romans, that they which made their Wills being sick, had certain prescribed and conceived words appointed to them to use, which unless they followed, their Wills stood in no effect. This Law also Constantine repealed, permitting to every man in making his Testament to use what words or what Witnesses he would. Likewise among the Romans he restrained and took away the cruel and bloody spectacles and fights, where men were wont with Swords one to kill another. Of the barbarous and filthy fathion of the Arethusians in Phœnicia, I have mentioned before, where they used to expose and set forth their Virgins to open Fornication before they should be married: which custom also Constantine removed away. Where no Churches were, there he commanded new to be made; where any were decayed, he commanded them to be repaired; where any were too little, he caused them to be enlarged, giving to the same great Gifts and Revenues, not only of such Tributes and Taxes coming to him from certain fundry Cities, which he transferred unto the Churches, but also out of his own Treasures. When any Bishops required any Council to be had, he satisfied their Petitions; and what in their Councils and Synods they established, being godly and honeft, he was ready to confirm the same.

The

The armour of his Souldiers, which were newly come from gentility, he garnished with the arms of the Cross, whereby they might learn the sooner to forget their old superstitious Idolatry. Moreover, like a worthy Emperor he prescribed a certain form of prayer, in stead of a Catechism for every man to have, and to learn how to pray and to invocate God. The which form of prayer is recited in the fourth Book of Eusebius De vita Constantini, in words as followeth:

Euseb. lib. 4. de vita Constant. The form of prayer appointed of Constantine for his Souldiers.

Te solum novimus Deum, te regem cognoscimus, te adjutorem invocamus, abs te victorias referimus, per te victrices vias inimicorum constituimus, tibi præsentium bonorum gratiam acceptam ferimus, & per te futura quoque speramus, tibi supplices fumus omnes: imperatorem noftrum Constantinum, ac pientissimos ejus filios, in longissima vita incolumes nobis ac victores custodire supplices oramus, per Christum Dominum noftrum: Amen. In English.

We acknowledge thee thee only to be our God, we confess thee to be our King, we invocate and call upon thee our only Helper, by thee we obtain our Victories, by thee we vanquish and subdue our Enemies, to thee we attribute whatsoever present Commodities we enjoy, and by thee we hope for good things to come: unto thee we direct all our Suits and Petitions, moft humbly beseeching thee to conserve Constantine our Emperor and his noble Children in long life to continue, and to give them Victory over all their Enemies, through Christ our Lord: Amen.

The Souldiers prayers.

In his own Palace he set up an house peculiar for Prayer and Doctrine, using also to pray and sing with his people. Also in his Wars he went not without his Tabernacle appointed for the same. The Sunday he commanded to be kept holy of all men, and free from all judiciary Causes, from Markets, Marts, Fairs, and all other manual Labours, only Husbandry excepted: especially charging that no Images or Monuments of Idolatry should be set up.

The Sunday appointed to be kept holy.

Liberties and priviledges granted to the Clergy.

Men of the Clergy and of the Ministery in all places he indued with special Priviledges and Immunities, so that if any were brought before the civil Magistrate, and used to appeal to the Sentence of his Bishop, it should be lawful for him so to do, and that the Sentence of the Bishop should stand in as great force as if the Magistrate or the Emperor himself had pronounced it.

The profession and liberality of Constantine in endowing Schools.

But here is to be observed and noted by the way, that the Clerks and Ministers then newly creeping out of Perfection, were in those days neither in number so great, nor in order of life of the like disposition to those in our days now living.

No less care and provision the said Constantinus also had for the maintenance of Schools pertaining to the Church, and to the nourishing of good Arts and liberal Sciences, especially of Divinity: not only with Stipends and Subsidies furnishing them, but also with large Priviledges and Exemptions defending the same, as by the words of his own Law is to be seen and read as followeth, Medicos, Grammaticos, & alios Professores literarum, & Doctores legum, cum uxoribus & liberis, &c. In English; Physitians, Grammarians, and other Professors of liberal Arts, and Doctors of the Law, with their Wives and Children, and all other their Possessions which they have in Cities, we command to be freed from all civil Charges and Functions, neither to receive foreign strangers in Provinces, nor to be burthened with any publick Administration, nor to be cited up to civil Judgment, nor to be drawn out or oppressed with any Injury. And if any man shall vex them, he shall incur such punishment as the Judge at his discretion shall award him. Their Stipends moreover and Salaries we command truly to be paid them, whereby they may more freely instruct others in Arts and Sciences, &c.

The publick fees granted by Constantine to Universities and Schools.

The liberality of Constantine in giving to Churches.

Over and besides this, so far did his godly Zeal and Princely Care and Provition extend to the Church of Christ, that he commanded and provided Books and Volumes of the Scripture, diligently and plainly to be written and copied out, to remain in publick Churches to the use of Posterity. Whereupon writing to Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia in a special Letter (recorded in the fourth Book of Euseb. De vita Constant.) he willeth him with all diligence to procure fifty Volumes of Parchment well bound and compacted, wherein he should cause to be written out of the Scripture in a fair legible hand, such things as he thought necessary and profitable for the Instruction of the Church, and alloweth him for that business two publick Ministers: he also writeth concerning the same to the General of his Army, to support and further him with such Necessaries, as thereunto should appertain, &c.

Euseb. lib. 4. de vita Constant. Eccles. Hist. lib. 10. cap. 4. & de vita Constant. lib. 4. Eccles. Hist. lib. 4. divine Confess.

A gift of the author. admonitory to Princes.

¶ In viewing, perusing, and writing this story, and in considering the Christian Zeal of this Emperor, I will that either this our printing and plenty of Books had been in his days, or that this so heroical heart toward Christian Religion, as was in this so excellent Monarch, might something appear in inferior Princes reigning in these our printing-days, &c.

The liberality of Constantine toward the poor and needy.

The liberal hand of this Emperor born to do all men good, was no less also open and ready toward the needy Poverty of such, which either by loss of Parents or other occasions were not able to help themselves: to whom he commanded and provided due subvention both of Corn and Rayment to be minifired out of his own Coffers, to the necessary relief of the poor Men, Women, Children, Orphans, and Widows, Euseb. de vita Constant. lib. 4.

Constantine remitteth the fourth part of his revenues.

Finally, among all the other Monuments of his singular Clemency and Munificence, this is not to be pretermitted; that through all the Empire of Rome and Provinces belonging to the same, not only he diminished such Taxes, Revenues and Impost, as publickly were coming to him, but also clearly remitted and releafed to the Contributors the fourth part of the same.

Donation of Constantine.

This present place would require something to be said of the Donation of Constantine, whereupon as upon their chiefeft Anchor-hold, the Bishops of Rome do ground their supream Dominion and Right over all the political Government of the West parts, and the Spiritual Government of all the other Sees and Parts of the World. Which donation to be falsely feigned and forged, and not to proceed from Constantine, many Arguments might here be inferred, if leisure from other matters would suffer me.

Reasons and arguments proving the donation of Constantine to be falsified.

1. First, for that no ancient History, nor yet Doctor, maketh any mention thereof.

2. Nauclerus reporteth it to be affirmed in the History of Isidorus. But in the old Copies of Isidorus no such thing is to be found.

3. Gratianus the Compiler of the Decrees, reciteth that Decree, not upon any ancient Authority, but only under the Title of Paleæ.

4. Gelasius is said to give some testimony thereof, in Dist. 15. Sancta Romana. But that Clause of the said distinction touching that matter in the old ancient Books is not extant.

5. Orbo Phrysingensis, who was about the time of Gratian, after he hath declared the Opinion of the Favourers of the Papacy, affirming this donation to be given of Constantine to Silvester the Pope, induceth consequently the Opinion of them that favour the Empire, affirming the contrary.

6. How doth this agree, that Constantine did yield up to Silvester all the Political Dominion over the West, when as the said Constantine at his death, dividing the Empire to his three Sons, gave the West part of the Empire to one, the East part to the second, the middle part to the third?

7. How is it like that Theodosius after them, being a just and a religious Prince, would or could have occupied the City of Rome, if it had not been his right, but had belonged to the Pope, and so did many other Emperors after him?

8. The phrase of this Decree, being conferred with the phrase and stile of Constantine in his other Edicts and Letters above specified, doth nothing agree.

9. Seeing the Papists themselves confess that the Decree of this Donation was written in Greek, how agreeth that with truth, when as both it was written not to the Grecians, but to the Romans, and also Constantine himself for lack of the Greek-Tongue, was fain to use the Latine-Tongue in the Council of Nice?

10. The contents of this Donation (whosoever was the Forger thereof) doth bewray it self: for if it be true which there is confessed, that he was baptized at Rome of Silvester, and the fourth day after his Baptism this Patrimony was given (which was before his battel against Maximinus or Licinius, in the year of our Lord three hundred and seventeen, as Nicephorus recordeth) how then accordeth this with that which followeth in the Donation, for him to have Jurisdiction given over the other four Principal

Sees

Sees of Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Hierusalem? when as the City of Constantinople was not yet begun before the death of Maximinus or Licinius, and was not finished before the eight and twentieth year of the Reign of Constantine, in the year of our Lord three hundred thirty and nine; or if it be true, as Hierome counteth, it was finished the three and twentieth year of his Reign, which was the year our of Lord three hundred thirty and four, long after this donation by their own account.

11. Furthermore, where in the said Constitution it is said that Constantine was baptized at Rome of Silvester; and thereby was purged of Leproſie; the Fable thereof agreeth not with the truth of History, for so much as Euſebius, lib. 4. de vita Conſtantini, Hieronymus in Chron. Ruffin. lib. 2. *cap.*11. Socrates, lib. 1. *cap.*39. *Theod. lib.*1. cap. 31. Sozomenus, lib. 2. cap. 34. do all together conſent that he was baptized not at Rome, but at Nicomedia; and that moreover, as by their teſtimony doth appear, not of Silveſter, but of Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, not before his batrel againſt Maximinus or Licinius, but in the thirty firſt year of his Reign, a little before his death.

12. Again, whereas Conſtantine in this donation appointed him to have the Principality over the other four Patriarchal Sees, that maketh Conſtantine contrary to himſelf; who in the Council of Nice afterward agreed with other Biſhops, that all the four Patriarchal Sees ſhould have equal Juriſdiction, every one over his own Territory and Precinct.

13. In ſum, briefly to conclude: who ſo deſireth more abundantly to be ſatisfied touching this matter, let him read the Books of Marſilius Patavinus, intituled, Defenſor pacis, in the year of our Lord, 1324. of Laurentius Valla, Anno 1440. of Antoninus Archbiſhop of Florence, who in his Hiſtory plainly denieth the tenor of this donation to be found in the old Books of the Decrees. Of Cuſanus Cardinalis, lib. 3. cap. 2. writing to the Council of Baſil, Anno 1460. of Aeneas Silvius In dialogo: of Herr. Paulus Caſtellanus, Anno 1496. of Raphael Wolaterranus, Anno 1500. of Lutherus, Anno 1537. &c. All which, by many and evident probations, diſpute and prove this donation taken out of a Book, De geſtis Silveſtri, and tranſlated (as they ſain) by one Bartholomeus Piceranus out of Greek into Latine; not to proceed from Conſtantinus, but to be a thing untimely pretended, or rather a Fable imagined, or elſe to be the deed of Pipinus or Charles, or ſome ſuch other, if it were ever the deed of any.

Commendation of Conſtantine the Emperour.

And thus haſt thou (beloved Reader) briefly collected the Narration of the noble Acts and heavenly Vertues of this moſt famus Emperor Conſtantine the great; a ſingular Spectacle for all Chriſtian Princes to behold and imitate, and worthy of perpetual Memory in all Congregations of Chriſtian Saints: whoſe fervent Zeal and Piety in general, to all Congregations and to all the Servants of Chriſt, was notable; but eſpecially the affection and reverence of his heart toward them was admirable, which had ſuffered any thing for the Confeſſion of Chriſt in the Perſecutions before; them had he principally in price and veneration, inſomuch that he imbraced and kiſſed their Wounds and Stripes, and their Eyes, being put out. And if any ſuch Biſhops or any other Miniſters brought to him any Complaints one againſt another (as many times they did) he would take their Bills of Complaint and burn them before their faces; ſo ſtudious and zealous was his Mind to have them agree, whoſe diſcord was to him more grief than it was to themſelves. All the vertuous Acts and memorable Doings of this divine and renowned Emperor to comprehend or commit to Hiſtory, it were the matter alone of a great Volume: wherefore contented with theſe above premiſed, becauſe nothing of him can be ſaid enough, I ceaſe to diſcourſe of him any further.

Conſtantine kiſſed the wounds of them that ſuffered for Chriſt.

Conſtantine ſometimes ſtirred up to ſtudies of Religion, and breaketh off ſtrivings among the Biſhops.

One thing yet remaineth not to be omitted, wherein (as by the way of a note) I thought good to admoniſh the learned Reader, ſuch as love to be converſant in reading of ancient Authors; that in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Euſebius, where in the latter end of the Book is added a certain Oration, Ad conventum Sanctorum, under the name of Euſebius Pamphilius, here is to be underſtood, that the ſaid Oration is wrongfully intituled upon the name of Euſebius, which in very truth is the Oration of Conſtantinus himſelf. For the probation whereof, (beſide the title and matter therein contained, and tractation heroical lively declaring the religious vein of Conſtantine) I alledge the very teſtimony of Euſebius himſelf in his fourth Book De vita Conſtantini, where he in expreſs words not only declareth that Conſtantine wrote ſuch an Oration, intituled, Ad conventum Sanctorum, but alſo promiſeth in the end of his Book, to annex the ſame: declaring moreover what difficulty the Interpreters had to tranſlate the ſame from the Roman Speech, to their Grecian Tongue, Euſeb. de vita Conſtantini, *lib.*4. *pag.*211.

Note, that the Oration Ad conventum Sanctorum is wrongfully ſet forth in Euſebius, which is indeed a Oration of Conſtantine.

And here an end of theſe lamentable and doleful Perſecutions of the Primitive Church, during the ſpace of three hundred years from the Paſſion of our Saviour Chriſt, till the coming of this Conſtantinus; by whom as by the elect Inſtrument of God, it hath ſo pleaſed his Almighty Majeſty, by his determinate purpoſe, to give reſt after long trouble to his Church, according to that Saint Cyprian declareth before to be revealed of God unto his Church: that after darkneſs and ſtormy tempeſt, ſhould come peaceable, calm, and ſtable quietneſs to his Church, meaning this time of Conſtantine now preſent. At which time it ſo pleaſed the Almighty, that the murthering malice of Satan ſhould at length be reſtrained, and himſelf tied up for a thouſand years, through his great mercy in Chriſt; to whom therefore be Thanks and Praiſe now and for ever. Amen.

Satan bound up for a thouſand years.

The End of the Firſt Book.

THE

THE SECOND BOOK,

CONTAINING

The next Three hundred Years following, with ſuch things ſpecially touched as have happened in England, from the time of King Lucius, to Gregorius, and ſo after to the time of King Egbert.

BY theſe Perſecutions hitherto in the Book before precedent thou mayeſt underſtand (Chriſtian Reader) how the fury of Satan and rage of men have done what they could to extinguiſh the Name and Religion of Chriſt: for what thing did lack that either death could do, or torments could work, or the gates of Hell could deviſe, all was to the uttermoſt attempted. And yet all the fury and malice of Satan, all the wiſdom of the world and ſtrength of men, doing, deviſing, practiſing what they could; notwithſtanding the Religion of Chriſt (as thou ſeeſt) hath had the upper hand: which thing I with thee greatly (gentle Reader) wiſely to note and diligently to ponder in conſidering theſe former Hiſtories. And becauſe thou canſt not conſider them, nor profit by them, unleſs thou do firſt read and peruſe them; let me crave therefore thus much at thine hands, to turn and read over the ſaid Hiſtories of thoſe Perſecutions above deſcribed, eſpecially above all the other Hiſtories of this preſent Volum, for thy eſpecial edification, which I truſt thou ſhalt find not unworthy the reading.

A Petition to the Reader diligently to read over the former Book of the Ten Perſecution.

Now becauſe the tying up of Satan giveth to the Church ſome reſt, and to me ſome leiſure to addreſs my ſelf to the handling of other Stories, I mind therefore (Chriſt willing) in this preſent Book, leaving a while the tractation of theſe general affairs pertaining to the univerſal Church, to proſecute ſuch Domeſtical Hiſtories as more nearly concern this our Country of England and Scotland done here at home, beginning firſt with King Lucius, with whom the Faith firſt began here in this Realm, as the ſentence of ſome writers doth hold. And for ſo much as here may riſe, yea and doth riſe a great controverſie in theſe our Popiſh days, concerning the firſt origine and planting of the Faith in this our Realm, it ſhall not be greatly out of our purpoſe ſomewhat to ſtay and ſay of this queſtion, Whether the Church of England firſt received the Faith from Rome or not? The which although I grant ſo to be, yet being ſo granted, it little availeth the purpoſe of them which would ſo have it. For be it that England firſt received the Chriſtian Faith and Religion from Rome, both in the time of Eleutherius their Biſhop 180 years after Chriſt, and alſo in the time of Auguſtine whom Gregory ſent hither, 600 years after Chriſt, yet their purpoſe followeth not thereby, that we muſt therefore fetch our Religion from thence ſtill, as from the chief well-head and fountain of all godlineſs. And yet as they are not able to prove the ſecond, ſo neither have I any cauſe to grant the firſt: that is, That our Chriſtian Faith was firſt derived from Rome, which I may prove by ſix or ſeven good conjectural reaſons. Whereof the firſt I take of the teſtimony of Gildas our Countryman, who in his Hiſtory affirmeth plainly, that Britain received the Goſpel in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, under whom Chriſt ſuffered. Lib. de victoria Aurelii Ambroſii. And ſaith moreover, that Joſeph of Arimathea, after diſperſion of the Jews, was ſent of Philip the Apoſtle from France to Britain, about the year of our Lord 63, and here remained in this land all his time; and ſo with his fellows laid the firſt foundation of Chriſtian Faith among the Britain people, whereupon other Preachers and Teachers coming afterward, confirmed the ſame and increaſed it.

The firſt planting of Chriſtian Faith in England.

Queſtion.

Whether Chriſtian Religion in this Realm came firſt from Rome.

Anſwer.

1. Gildas.

The ſecond reaſon is out of Tertullian, who living near about, or rather ſomewhat before the time of this Eleutherius, in his Book Contra Judæos, manifeſtly imporeth the ſame; where the ſaid Tertullian teſtifying how the Goſpel was diſperſed abroad by the ſound of the Apoſtles; and there reckoning up the Medes, Perſians, Parthians, and dwellers in Meſopotamia, Jewry, Cappadocia, Pontus, Aſia, Phrygia, Egypt, Pamphilia, with many more, at length cometh to the Coaſt of the Moorians, and all the borders of Spain, with divers Nations of France; and there amongſt all other reciteth alſo the parts of Britain, which the Romans could never attain to, and reporteth the ſame now to be ſubject to Chriſt; as alſo reckoneth up the places of Sarmatia, of the Danes, the Germani, the Scythians, with many other Provinces and Iſles to him unknown; in all which places (ſaith he) reigneth the name of Chriſt, which now beginneth to be common. This hath Tertullian. Note here how among other divers believing Nations, he mentioneth alſo the wildeſt places of Britain to be of the ſame number, and theſe in his time were Chriſtened, who was in the ſame Eleutherius time, as is above ſaid. Then was not Pope Eleutherius the firſt which ſent the Chriſtian Faith into this Realm, but the Goſpel was here received before his time either by Joſeph of Arimathea, as ſome Chronicles record, or by ſome of the Apoſtles, or of their Scholars, which had been here preaching Chriſt before Eleutherius wrote to Lucius.

2. In Tertul. contra Judæos.

My third Probation I deduct out of Origen, Hom. 6. in Ezechielem, whoſe words be theſe, Britannorum in Chriſtianam conſentire religionem. Whereby it appeareth that the Faith of Chriſt was ſparſed here in England before the days of Eleutherius.

3. Ex Origene, hom. 6. in Ezech.

For my fourth Probation I take the teſtimony of Beda, where he affirmeth, that in his time, and almoſt a thouſand years after Chriſt here in Britain, Eaſter was kept after the manner of the Eaſt Church, in the full of the Moon, what day in the week ſo ever it fell on, and not on the Sunday, as we do now. Whereby it is to be collected, that the firſt Preachers in this land have come out from the Eaſt part of the world, where it was ſo uſed, rather than from Rome.

4. Ex Beda.

Fifthly, I may alledg the words of Nicephorus, lib. 2. *cap.*40. where he ſaith that Simon Zelotes did ſpread the Goſpel of Chriſt to the Weſt Ocean, and brought the ſame unto the Iſles of Britain.

5. Ex Nicepho. lib.2. c.40.

Sixthly, may be here added alſo the words of Petrus Cluniacenſis, who writing to Bernard, affirmeth that the Scots in his time did celebrate their Eaſter, not after the Roman manner, but after the Greeks, &c. And as the ſaid Britains were not under the Roman order in the time of this Abbot of Cluniack; ſo neither were they nor would be under the Roman Legat, in the time of Gregory, nor would admit any primacy of the Biſhop of Rome to be above them.

6. Ex Petro Cluniacenſi ad Bernardum.

For the ſeventh argument moreover I may make my Probation by the plain words of Eleutherius, by whole Epiſtle written to King Lucius we may underſtand that Lucius had received the Faith of Chriſt in this land, before the King ſent to Eleutherius for the Roman Laws; for ſo the expreſs words of the Letter do manifeſtly purport, as hereafter followeth to be ſeen. By all which conjectures it may ſtand probably to be thought that the Britains were taught firſt by the Grecians of the Eaſt Church, rather than by the Romans.

7. Ex Epiſt. Eleutherii ad Lucium.

Peradventure Eleutherius might help ſomething either to to convert the King, or else to increase the faith then newly sprung among the People, but that he precisely was the first, that cannot be proved. But grant he were, as indeed the most part of our English stories confess, neither will I greatly stick with them therein; yet what have they got thereby when they have cast all their gain? in few words to conclude this matter, if so be that the Christian Faith and Religion was first derived from Rome to this our Nation by Eleutherius, then let them but grant to us the same Faith and Religion which then was taught at Rome, and from thence derived hither by the said Eleutherius, and we will desire no more; for then neither was any Universal Pope above all Churches and Councils, which came not in before Bonifacius time, which was 400 years after; neither any name or use of the Mass, the parts whereof how and by whom they were compiled, hereafter in this Book following appeareth to be seen. Neither any Sacrifice Propitiatory for the sowring of Purgatory was then offered upon hallowed Altars, but only the Communion frequented at Christian Tables, where Oblations and Gifts were offered as well of the People as of the Priests to God, because they should appear neither empty nor unkind before the Lord, as we may understand by the time of Cyprian. Neither was then any Transubstantiation heard of, which was not brought in before a thousand years after. Neither were then any Images of Saints departed set up in Churches; yea, a great number of the Saints worshipped in this our time were not as yet born, nor the Churches wherein they were worshipped were yet set up, but came in long after, especially in the time of Irene and Constans the Emperor. Likewise neither Relicks nor Peregrinations were then in use. Priests Marriage was then as lawful (and no less received) as now; neither was it condemned before the days of Hildebrand, almost a thousand years after that. Their service was then in the vulgar tongue, as witnesseth Hierome; the Sacraments ministred in both kinds as well to Lay-men as to Priests, the witness whereof is Cyprian. Yea and temporal men which would not then communicate at Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmass, were not then counted for Catholicks, the Popes own distinction can testifie. In Funerals, Priests then flocked not together, selling Trentals and Dirges for sweeping of Purgatory; but only a Funeral Concion was used, with Psalms of praises and songs of their worthy deeds, and Hallelujah sounding on high, which did shake the guilded Ceelings of the Temple, as witnesseth Nazianzen, Ambrose, with Hierome, &c.

What difference between the late Church of Rome and the old Church of Rome, and in what matters.

De consec. dist. 2.

In the Supper of the Lord, and at Baptism, no such Ceremonies were used, as now of late have been intruded: informach that as in this Story is shewed hereafter; both Augustine and Paulinus baptised then in Rivers, not in hallowed Fonts, as witnesseth Fabianus. The Portues of Sarum, of York, of Bangor, with Mattens and Evensong of the day; again, neither the Orders and Religions of Monks and Friers were not yet dreamed of, to the space almost of a thousand years after, &c. So that, as I said, if the Papists would needs derive the Faith and Religion of this Realm from Rome, then let them set us and leave us there where they had us; that is, let them suffer us to stand content with that Faith and Religion, which then was taught and brought from Rome by Eleutherius (as now we differ nothing from the same) and we will define no better. And if they will not, then let the wise Reader judge where the fault is, in us, or them, which neither themselves will perfuit in the Antiquity of the Romish Religion which they so much brag of, neither will they permit us so to do.

Fabian. cap. 219 & 220.

And thus much by the way to satisfie the forefaid objection, whereby we may have now a more ready passage into the order and course of the History. Being therefore granted unto them which they so earnestly flick upon, that the Christian Faith and Religion of this Realm was brought from Rome, first by Eleutherius, then afterward by Augustine; thus write the Chronicles of that matter.

Eleutherius Bishop of Rome.

Augustine The Fifth of Christ brought into this Realm.

About the time and year of the Lord 180. King Lucius son of Coilus, which builded Colchester, King of the Britains, first Latins, who then were the Inhabiters and Possessors of this Land (which now we English men call England) hearing of the Miracles and Wonders done by the Christians at that time in divers places (as Monumetensis writeth) directed his Letters to Eleutherius Bishop of Rome, to receive of him the Christian Faith; although about the computation of the year and time, great difference there is in Authors when this should be. Nauclerus saith it was Anno 156, but that cannot be, for so much as Eleutherius was not yet Bishop by the space of twenty years after that. Henricus de Erfordia saith, it was Anno 169, in the nineteenth year of Verus Emperor; but that agreeth not with approved Histories, which all consent that Verus reigned not nineteen years; and if he had, yet that year cometh not to the year of our Lord 169, but to the year 181. Some others say, that Eleutherius was made Bishop in the sixth year of Commodus, which was the year of our Lord 180. but that seemeth to go too far, but let the Authors agree as they can. Let us return to Eleutherius the good Bishop, who hearing the request of this King, and glad to see the godly towardnes of his well disposed mind, sendeth him certain Teachers and Preachers called Fugatius, or by some Faganus, and Damianus, or Dimianus, which converted first the King and People of Britain, and baptised them with the Baptism and Sacrament of Christs Faith. The Temples of Idolatry and all other Monuments of Gentility they subverted, converting the People from their divers and many Gods, to serve one living God. Thus true Religion with sincere faith increasing, Superstition decayed, with all other Rites of Idolatry. There were then in Britain 28 Head Priests which they called Flamines, and three Archpriests among them, which were called Arch-Flamines, having the overlight of their manners, and as Judges over the rest. These 28 Flamines they turned to 28 Bishops, and the three Arch-Flamines to three Archbishops, having their seats in three principal Cities of the Realm; that is, in London, in York, and in Glamorgantia, Videlicet in urbe legionum, by Wales. Thus the Countries of the whole Realm being divided every one under his own Bishop, and all things setled in a good order; the forefaid King Lucius sent again to the said Eleutherius for the Roman Laws, thereby likewise to be governed, as in Religion now they were framed accordingly unto whom Eleutherius again writeth after the tenor of these words ensuing:

Fugatius, Damianus.

Hospital mercy fo long to Poor.

Three Archbishops.

Hier. Hosting. lib. 1. What incommodity caused by lack of Succession.

The Epistle of Eleutherius, Bishop of Rome, sent to King Lucius.

Anno 169. a passione Christi scripsit Dominus Eleutherius Papa Lucio Regi Britanniæ, ad correctionem Regis & procerum Regni Britanniæ, and so forth as followeth in English.

Ex antiq. collectan. anglican.

Te require of us the Roman Laws, and the Emperors to be sent over to you, which you may practise and put in use here within your Realm. The Roman Laws and the Emperors were no way ever reproved, but the Law of God we may ever reprove, and have received of late through Gods mercy in the Realm of Britany, the Law and Faith of Christ; ye have with you within the Realm, both the parts of the Scriptures. Out of them by Gods grace, with the Council of your Realm take ye a Law, and by that Law (through Gods sufferance) rule your Kingdom of Britain. For you be Gods Vicar in your Kingdom, according to the saying of the Psalm, Deus judicium tuum Regi da, &c. that is, O God give thy judgment to the King, and thy righteousness to the Kings son, &c. He said not, the judgment and righteousness of the Emperor, but thy judgment and justice; that is to say, the Laws of God. The Kings sons be the Christian people and folk of the Realm, which be under your government, and live and continue in peace within your Kingdom, as the Gospel saith, Like as the Hen gathereth her Chickens under her wings, so doth the King his People. The people and folk of the Realm of Britain be yours; whom if they be divided, ye ought to gather in concord and peace, to call them to the Faith and Law of Christ, and to the holy Church, to cherish and maintain them, to rule and govern them, and to defend them always from such as would do them wrong, from malicious men and enemies. A King hath his name of ruling, and not of having a Realm. You shall be a King while you rule well; but if you do otherwise, the name of a King shall not remain with you, and you shall lose it, which God forbid. The Almighty God grant you so to rule the Realm of Britain, that you may Reign with him for ever, whose Vicar you be in the Realm,

The Title of Eleutherius to the Crown of Britain.

After

After this manner (as you have heard) was the Christian Faith either first brought in, or else confirmed in this Realm of Britain by the sending of Eleutherius, not with any Crosse or Procession, but only at the simple Preaching of Fagan and Damian, through whose Ministry this Realm and Island of Britain was ere[illegible] reduced to the Faith and Law of the Lord, according as was prophelied by Isaiah, as well of that as other Illands more, where he saith, Chap. 42. He shall not faint nor give over, till he hath set judgment in earth, and Islands shall wait for his Law, &c. The Faith thus received of the Britains continued among them and flourished the space of 216 years, till the coming of the Saxons, who then were Pagans; wherefore more followeth hereafter to be said, the Lord Christ assisting thereunto. In the mean time something to speak of this space before, which was betwixt the time of Lucius, and the first coming in of the Saxons: First, it is to be understood that all this while as yet, the Emperors of Rome had not received the Faith, what time the Kings of Britain and the subjects thereof were converted now, as is said, to Christ; for the which cause much trouble and perturbation was fought against them, not only here in Britain, but through all parts of Christendom by the Heathen Infidels. Insomuch that in the Persecution only of Diocletian and Maximinian, reigning both together within one month, 17000 Martyrs are numbered to have suffered for the name of Christ, as hath been hitherto in the Book before sufficiently discoursed.

Ex Beda. Polychron. Mennmouth.

Thus therefore, although the forefaid Lucius the Britain King, through the merciful Providence of God was then Christened, and the Gospel received generally almost in all the land, yet the state thereof, as well of the Religion as of the Commonwealth, could not be quit, for that the Emperors and Nobles of Rome were Infidels, and enemies to the same; but especially for this cause, it so happening that Lucius the Christian King died without issue. For thereby such trouble and variance fell among the Britains (as it happeneth in all other Realms, and namely in this Realm of England, whensoever Succession ceaseth) that not only they brought upon them the Idolatrous Romans, and at length the Saxons, but also intrapped themselves in such misery and desolation, as yet to this day amongst them remaineth. Such a thing it is where a Prince or a King is in a Kingdom, there to lack Succession, as especially in this case may appear. For after the death of Lucius, when the Barons and Nobles of the land could not accord within themselves upon Succession of the Crown, the Romans stept in and got the Crown into their own hands, whereupon followed great misery and ruin to the Realm. For sometimes the Idolatrous Romans, sometimes the Britains reigned and ruled as violence and victory would serve; one King murthering another, till at length the Saxons came and deprived them both, as in processe hereafter followeth to be seen.

In the mean season touching the story of King Lucius, here is to be reproved the fable of some Writers falsly feigning of him that he should after his Baptism received, put off all his Kingly honour, forsake the land, and be made a Preacher, who after long travel in Preaching and teaching in France, in Germany, in Augusta, and in Suevia, at length was made Doctor and Rector of the Church of Curiae, where (as this Fable saith) he suffered Martyrdom. But this fancy of whomsoever it first did spring, disagreeth from all our English Stories, who with a full consent do for the most part concord in this, that the said Lucius after he had founded many Churches, and given great riches and liberties to the same, deceased with great tranquillity in his own land, and was buried at Glowcester the fourteenth year after his Baptism, as the Book of Flores Historiarum doth count, which was the year of our Lord, as he saith 101, and reckoneth his conversion to be in the year 87. In some I find his decease to be the fourth, and in some the tenth year after his Baptism, and some hold that he reigned all the space of 77 years. And thus much concerning King Lucius.

The decease of King Lucius. Ex Rastalo.

Now to proceed in order of the story, briefly to touch the state of the forefaid land of Britain, between the time of King Lucius, and the entring of the Saxons, who were the Kings thereof, and in what order they succeeded, or rather invaded one after another, this Catalogue here underwritten will shew.

By this Table may appear a lamentable face of a Commonwealth so miserably rent and divided into two sorts of people, differing not so much in Country as in Religion; for when the Romans reigned, they were governed by the Infidels; when the Britains ruled, they were governed by Christians. Thus what quietnes was or could be in the Church in so unquiet and doubtful days, may easily be considered.

Although notwithstanding all these forefaid Heathen Rulers of the Romans which here governed, yet (God be praised) we read of no Persecution during all these Ten Persecutions above mentioned, that touched the Christian Britains, before the last Persecution only of Diocletian and Maximinus Herculeus, which here then exercised much cruelty. This Persecution, as it was the last among the Roman Christians, so it was the first of many and divers that followed after in this Church and Realm of England; wherefore we will hereafter Entreat (Christ willing) as order of the matter shall lead us. In the mean time this rage of Diocletian as it was universally through all the Churches in the world, fierce and vehement, so in this Realm of Britain also it was so fore, that as all our English Chronicles do testifie and record, all Christianity almost in the whole land was destroyed, Churches were subverted, all Books of the Scriptures burned, many of the faithful, both men and women were slain. Among whom the first and chiefest was Alhanus, then Julius, Aaron, and Amphibalus, of whom sufficiently hath been said before. What were the others, or how many they were that suffered besides, Stories make no rehearsal. And thus much thereof.

Diocletian Bishop never toucht with any Persecution before the time of Diocletian.

Now as concerning the Government of these abovenamed Kings of Britain, although I have little or nothing to note which greatly appertaineth to the matter of this Ecclesiastical History, yet this is not to be past over. First, how in the order of these Kings cometh Constantinus the Great and worthy Emperor, who was not only a Britain born by his Mother sides, being King Coilus daughter, but also by the help of the Britains Army (under the power of God) which the said Constantine took with him out of Britain to Rome, obtained with great victory peace and tranquillity to the whole universal Church of Christ, having three Legions with him out of this Realm of Britain (as some Stories affirm) whereby the strength of the said Realm was not a little impaired and endangered, as afterwards in this Story followeth.

Constantine the Great born and bred in Britain.

The cruel love this Realm of Britain was first watched.

After him likewise Maximian following his steps, took with him also (as Stories record) all the power and strength fivength which was left, and whatsoever he could make of able and fighting men to subdue France; besides the Garrisons which he had out with him before, sending for more to the number of an hundred thousand Souldiers at once to be sent to him out of Britain into France. At which time also Conanus his partner, being then in France, sent over for Virgins from Britain, to the number of 11000, who with Ursula, the Prince Dionets daughter being shipped over, many perished in the Sea, some were taken of the Infidels marching upon the borders; with whom because they would not be polluted, all were destroyed, being miserably disperst (some one way, some another) so that none escaped.

Britain finlled of Souldiers, Ursula with 11000 Virgins.

Thus poor Britain being left naked and destitute on every side, as a maimed body without might or strength, was left open to his enemies, not able to succour it self without help of foreign friends; to whom they were then constrained to fly, especially to the Romans, to whom the Britains sent this word or message, Scito ter consuli gemintes Britannorum. Repellunt nos Barbari ad mare: repellit nos mare ad Barbaros. Hinc oriuntur duo funerum genera, quia aut jugulamur, aut submergimur. But the Romans then began to forsake them, whereby they were in nearer danger to be oppressed by Gwanus and Melga, had not Gwetelinus the Archbishop of London made over to lesser Britain, and obtaining their help, had brought Constantinus the Kings brother to rescue his Country against the Infidels. This Constantinus was brother to Aldroenus, King of little Britain, and father to Constance, Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter, who after reigned Kings in Britain.

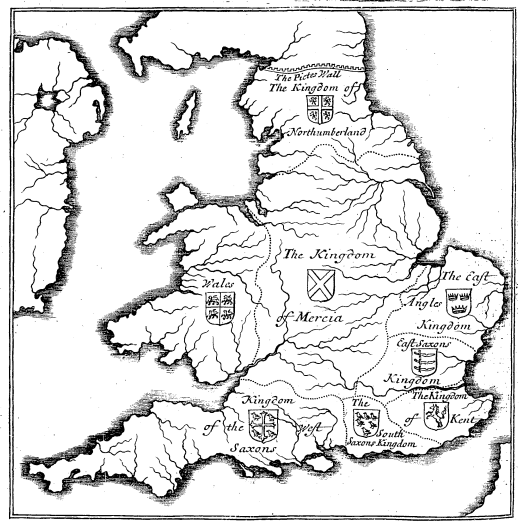
Gwetelinus Archbishop of London. Ex Chronico Monemutensi. Constantine, Constans, Aurelius Ambrosius, Uter Pendragon. The Saxons sent for to Britain.



Thus by the means of the good Archbishop and Constantinus, the state of the Religion and Realm of Britain was in some mean quiet and safety, during the time of the said Constantine, and of the good Archbishop. But as the Realm of Britain almost from the beginning was never without Civil war, at length came wicked Vortigerne, who cruelly causing Constance his Prince to be murthered, ambitiously invaded the Crown; who then fearing the other two Brethren of Constance, which were Aurelius and Uter, being then in little Britain, did send over for the aid of the Saxons, being then Infidels; and not only that, but also married with an Infidel, the daughter of Hengist, called Rowen. Whereupon the said Vortigerne not long after by the said Hengist and the Saxons was with like treachery dispossessed of his Kingdom, and the people of Britain driven out of their Country, after that the Saxons had slain of their chief Nobles and Barons at one meeting (joyning together subtilty with cruelty) to the number of 271; some stories say 460. This wicked act of the Saxons was done at Almesbury, or at a place called Stonehenge. By the monument of which stones there hanging, it seemeth that the noble Britains there were buried.

King Constans slain by Vortigerne, who usurpeth the Kingdom. Hengist and Horsus Captains of the Saxons.

A wicked murther of the Lords.

This fabulous story of the Welchmen, of bringing these stones from Ireland by Merlin, I pass over. Some Stories record that they were slain being bid to a Banquet. Others say that it was done at a talk or assembly, where the Saxons came with privy Knives contrary to promise made; with the which Knives they giving a privy watch-word in their Saxon speech, Neme your sexes, slew the Britains unarmed. And thus far concerning the History of the Britains. As this great Plague could not come to the Britains without Gods permission, so Gildas therewith in his Chronicle the cause thereof, writing thus, Quod Britones propter avaritiam & rapinam principum, propter iniquitatem & injustitiam judicum, propter desidiam praedicationis Episcoporum, propter luxuriam & malos mores populi, patriam perdidisse, &c.

Heptarchia Angliæ Saxonica: Or, a Description of England, as it was divided in the Saxons time into Seven Kingdoms.

The

The Entring and Reigning of the Saxons in the Realm of England,

Aurelius and Uter, Sons to Constans.

THIS was the coming in first of the Angles or Saxons into this Realm, being yet Unchristened and Infidels, which was about the year of our Lord, as William Malmsbury testifieth, 469; the Captains of whom were Hengistus and Horsus. Although the said Hengist and Saxons at their first coming, for all their subtil working, and cruel attempt, had no quiet setling in Britain, but were driven out divers times by the valiantness of Aurelius Ambrosius, and his Brother Uter above mentioned, who reigned after that among the Britains; yet notwithstanding they were not so driven out, but that they returned again, and at length possessed all, driving the Britains (such as remained) into Cambria, which we call now Wales. Hengistus (as some Chronicles record) reigned three and forty years, and died in Kent. Galfridus in suo Britannico saith, that he was taken in War by Aurelius Ambrosius, and beheaded at Coningsburgh, after he had reigned nine and thirty years.

Ex Galfrido in suo Britannico.

Ex Polychr. lib. 5. cap. 4.

The Saxons after they were setled in the possession of England, distributed the Realm among themselves first in seven parts, every part to have his King; that is, the first to be the King of Kent; the second to be King of Sussex and Southery, holding his Palace at Cicester; the third King was of Westsex; the fourth King of Essex; the fifth King was of the Eastangles, that is, of Cambridgeshire, Norfolk and Suffolk; the sixth King of Merceland, or Mercia, and in his Kingdom were contained the Countries of Lincoln, Leicester, Huntington, Northampton, Oxford, Derby, Warwick, &c. the seventh King had all the Countries beyond Humber, and was called King of Northumberland.

Seven Kings ruling in England.

After the death of Hengist, his Son Osca reigned four and twenty years, leaving his Son Octa, to whose reign with his Son Imenricus, Histories do attribute three and fifty years, who also were slain by Uter Pendragon. Polychronicon. lib. 5. cap. 4.

Of the Seven Kingdoms, although they continued not long, but at length joyned all in one, coming all into the possession and subjection of the Westsaxons; yet for the space they continued (which was with continual trouble and wars among themselves) this is the race and order of them, as in this Table particularly followeth to be seen.

A TABLE describing the Seven Kingdoms of the Saxons reigning here in ENGLAND.

IN the time of Vortiger above mentioned, began the Reign of the Saxons in this Land, the which coming out of three sorts of the German people (to wit) the Saxons, the Jutes and Angles, replenished the Land, of them called now Anglia. Of whom first Hengistus reigned in Kent, which Country of Kent he had obtained by Rowen his daughter, of King Vortiger, which was about the year of our Lord (as some do count) 476, or (as I find) in the computation of our English Tables 456, in some 463. After Hengist came in Octha, with Esca, or Ise his Kinsman; who afterward succeeded the said Hengist in Kent. Not long after came in another company of the Saxons, with Elle their Captain, which planted themselves in Southfax. And after them again another Garrison of the Saxons, with Cerdice their Captain, which did occupy the West part of the Land, called by them Westfaxon. And so likewise the other multitude of the Saxons after them, which as yet being Unchristened and Infidels, divided the whole Land among themselves into Seven Kingdoms, as in this Table followeth.

Alricus.	34
Eadbertus, Surnamed Pren.	2
Cuthredus.	18
Baldredus, expulsed.	18

The Kings of Kent.

This Ethelbert first of all the Saxons received the Faith, and subdued all the other six Kings, except only the King of Northumberland.

Erconbert commanded Lent first to be fasted in his Dominion.

Egebert killed two Sons of his Uncle.

Unto the time of Edrick all the Bishops of Canterbu, were Italians.

Some Chronicles do place these two, Nidredus and Wilbardus after Edrick, and give to them seven years, some again do omit them.

Between the reign of Alrick & Cuthred some stories do insert the reign of Eadbert, which reigned two years.

In the reign of this Baldred, the Kingdom of Kent was translated to Egbertus, otherwise called Egbrict, King of the Westsaxons; who subduing the foresaid Baldred, in the year 822, gave the said Kingdom to Athelstan his younger Son. After whose decease it came to Ethelwolf the Elder Son of Egbrict, and so was united to the Westsaxons, who then began to be the Monarch of the whole land. This Kingdom began near about the year of our Lord 456, and continued 342 years, and had fifteen Kings.

(478) Southfax, now called Sussex.

Ethelwolfus.
Redwallus.
Condebertus.
Ethelredus, or Etherus.

The Kings of Sussex.

Of this Cissa came Cicester, which he builded, and where he reigned.

This Nathanleod seemeth by some old stories to be a Britain, and the chief Marshal of King Uter, whom Porth the Saxon slew.

This Porth a Saxon came in at the Haven, which now is called of him Portsmouth.

Because I find but little mention of these two, I think it rather like to be the same Ethelwold, or Ethelwaldus, which after followeth.

Of Condebertus & Ethelred I find no mention but in one table only, supposing therefore, that the true names of these were Ercombertus, and Egbertus, which were Kings of Kent the ſame time, and peradventure might then rule in Suſſex.

Adelwold, or Ethelwaldus ſlain. — This Adelwold was the firſt King of Suſſex Chriſtened, and as Febian ſaith, the fourth Kin. of the Southſaxons; as others ſay the ſeventh, ſo uncertain be the Hiſtories of this Kingdom.

Adelbrich, or Berethunus ſlain. 5
Adhunus. 15

This Kingdom endured the ſhorteſt ſeaſon of all others, and ſoonеſt paſſed into other Kingdoms, in the days (as ſome write) of Ina King of Weſtſax, and ſo endured not above an 112 years under ſeven, or at moſt eleven Kings, beginning firſt in the year of the Lord 478, and about the thirtieth year of the firſt coming of the Saxons.

Kinewalkins. 31
Sexburga. 1
Eſcewinus, Aſcewinus, or Elkewinus. 2
Centwinus died at Rome. 7
Cedwallus. 3 — Cedwalla went to Rome, and there was Chriſtened, and died.
Ina, or Ine. 35 — Ina alſo went to Rome, and was made Monk.
Edelardus, or Athelardus. 14
The Kings of Weſtſax.
Cuthredus, or Cuthbert. 16
Sigebertus, or Sigbertus, ſlain. 1 — Sigebert for his pride and cruelty was depoſed of his people. And as he had killed before one of his faithful Counſel, giving him wholſome counſel; ſo after was he ſlain of the ſame Counſellers Swineherd, as he hid himſelf in a Wood.
Kinulfus, or Kinewulfus, ſlain. 31
Britbricus. 13 — This Egbert was firſt expelled by Britbricus, who after returned again and reigning, was much derided and ſcorned with mocking rimes (for a Coward) of Bermilfus K. of Mercia. At length the ſaid Egbert ſubdued him firſt, then all the reſt to his Kingdom: cauſing the whole land to be called no more Britain, but Anglia. Concerning the other Kings after him in that Lordſhip, hereafter followeth.
Egbertus, or Egbrichtus, otherwiſe Athelbertus, or Athelbrich, &c. 37

This Egbert ſubdued all the other ſeven Kingdoms, and firſt began the Monarchy of all the Saxons, which after by Alured was perfected, as hereafter followeth (the Lord willing) to be declared. This Kingdom of the Weſtſaxons began the year of Grace 522; and as it ſubdued all the others, ſo it did the longeſt continue, till about the coming of William the Conqueror, which is about the time of 554 years.

(547) Northumberland. — The Kings of Northumberland, with the years of their Reign.

Ida. 12 — This Ida of his Wife had ſix Children. Adda, Elfricus, Osmerus, Theodledus; of Concubines other ſix.

The Kings of Northumberland.

After Ida the Kingdom of Northumberland was divided into two Provinces, Deira and Bernicia.

Alle or Elle, Deirorum. 20 — This Alle was the Son of Iffe, and reigned in Deira.
Adda, Bernicorum. 7 — 20
Some Chronicles ſet under Adda, to reign in Bernicia, theſe Kings, Glappa or Clafpa, Theonulfus, or Huffa, or Theonvalnus, Frihulfus, Theodoricus.
Alricus, or Alfricus Deiorum. 5 — This Alfricus was the Son of Ida, and reigned five years.
Ethelfridus Bernicorum. — This Ethelfridus was he that flew the Monks of Bangor, to the number of 2200, which came to pray for the good ſucceſs of the Britains; and by his Wife Accan, the daughter of Ella, he had ſeven Sons, Eanfridus, Oſualdus, Oſwius, Oſtacus, Oſmundus, Oſa, Offa. Flor. Hiſtor.
Edwinus Northumberland ſlain. 17 — This Edwinus was the firſt of the Northumberland Kings, which was converted and Chriſtened by Paulinus Biſhip of London.
Ofricus Deirorum ſlain. — Theſe two are put out of the race of Kings, becauſe they revolted from the Chriſtian faith, and were both ſlain miſerably by Cedwalla a Britain, which then reigned in Northumberland, and in Mercia.
Eanfridus Bernicia, ſlain.
Oſwaldus, of Northumberland ſlain. — This Oſwaldus, called S. Oſwald, fought with Cedwalla, and Penda with a ſmall army, and by ſtrength of prayer vanquiſhed then in the field. He ſent for Aidanus into Scotland to preach in his Country, and as he preached in Scotiſh, the King expounded in Engliſh. He was a great giver of alms to the poor. Of his other acts more appeareth hereafter.
Oſwius, Northumberland. 28 — This Oſwius fighting againſt Penda, vowed to make his Daughter Elfred a Nun, giving with her twelve Lordſhips to build twelve Monaſteries, ſix in Bernicia, ſix in Deira.
Oſwinus reigned together with Oſwius in Deira, ſlain. 7 — The ſame Oſwius in the beginning of his reign took one Oſwinus the Son of Edwin to be his partner over the Country of Deira. Afterward cauſing him to be killed, took to him another called Edelwald, the Son of Oſwald. Of this Oſwinus more followeth hereafter to be declared.
Egfridus Northumberland, ſlain. 15 — This Egfrid married Ethelthrida, who being twelve years married to him, could after by no means be allured to lie with him, but obtaining of him license, was made Nun, and then Abbeſs of Ely. She made but one meal a day, and never wore linnen. At laſt the ſame Egfrid, fighting againſt the Scots, was ſlain in the field by a train of the Scots, fainting themſelves to fly.
Alfridus, Northumberland, ſlain. 20 — Of this Alfride, Beda in his Hiſtory teſtifieth, that he was exactly and perfectly ſeen in the holy Scriptures, and recovered much that his Predeceſſors had loſt before. Bed. lib.4.c.24. Some ſay he reigned not 18 years.
Oſred, Northumberland, ſlain. 11 — Oſred began his reign being but eight years old, and reigned the ſpace of ten years.
Kenredus, North. 2
Ofricus, North. 20 — Some affirm that Ofricus reigned but 11 years.
Celulfus, Northumberl. made a Monk. 9 — This Celulfe after he had reigned eight years, was made a Monk. To him Beda wrote his Story.
Egbertus, or Ealbertus, Northumberla. Monk. 21
Oſulfus, Northumberland, ſlain. 1
Mollo, or Ethelwold, Northumb. 11 — Mollo by the ſubtil train of Alfredus was made away, which Alfredus alſo himſelf after he had reigned ten years, was expulſed by his own people.
In ſome Chronicles this fix years.
Alredus, Northumber. expulſed. 10 — In ſome Chronicles this Alredus reigned but eight years.
Ethelbertus, or Edelbeus, Northumberland, expulſed. 5
Alfwoldus, Northumberland, ſlain. 11
Ofredus.
Ethelbertus, or Adelwaldus, North. ſlain. 16

After this Ethelbert, the Kingdom of Northumberland ceaſed the ſpace of 25 years, till Egbertus King of the Weſtſaxons ſubdued alſo them, as he did the other Saxons to his Dominion. After the which Egbert K. of the Weſtſaxons ſucceeded in Northumberland his Son.

Ethelwolfus. Ethelbaldus. } Kings of Weſtſaxons, reigning in Ethelbertus. Ethelredus. } Northumberland.

In the time of this Ethelredus, there were two under-Kings in Northumberland, Ella and Osbright, whom the Danes overcame, and reigned in their place, whoſe names were theſe:

Erbertus. Gurthred. }
Richſi. Gurthrid. } Danes.
Egebert. }

After the reign of theſe foreſaid Danes the Kingdom of Northumberland came into the hands of the Weſtſaxons, in the time of Athelſtane, and his Brother Edmund. It began firſt in the year 547, and ſo endured 409 years. It contained Yorkſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, the Biſhoprick of Durham, Copeland, and others.

The Metropolitan See of this Province of Eaſtſaxons was London, where the famous Church of St. Paul was builded by Ethelbert King of Kent, and Sigebert King of Eſſex, whom Ethelbert had lately before turned to Chriſts faith; whereof the firſt Biſhop was Adulfus, the ſecond Biſhop was Ceddus, the third came in by Simony, whoſe name was Wine. Malmesbulle vitis Pont. After him was Erkeswaldus, of whom writeth Beda, that he being diſeaſed in his legs that he could not go nor ride, yet would be carried about in a Litter to preach in his Dioceſs, &c. Although William Malmesbury writing of the Biſhops of London in his Book De vitis Pont. ſaith that Mauritius, firſt the Kings Chancellor, then Biſhop there, did firſt begin this ſo large and famous building of the Church of St. Paul in London; which work after him Richard his Succeſſor did proſecute, beſtowing all the rents of his Biſhoprick upon the ſame, and yet was ſcarcely ſeen. Yet herein may be anſwered peradventure, that the Church builded before by King Ethelbert and King Sigebert, might be overthrown by the Danes, and afterward was re-edified by theſe Biſhops above mentioned.

After this ſinful murther of Ethelbert, the Kingdom of Eaſtangles, during the time of certain years, was in great trouble and deſolation, under divers Kings and Tyrants; ſometimes the King of Weſtſax, ſometimes of Kent, or of Mercia, having dominion over them, till the coming of St. Edmund, which was the laſt King there ruling under the Weſtſaxons.

St. Edmund, Martyred. 16

After the death of St. Edmund, being ſlain of the Infidel Danes, the Kingdom remained with the Danes fifty years till at length Edward King of the Weſtſaxons expulſed the Danes, and joined it to his Kingdom. It began about the year of our Lord 501, and continued near about 377 years, Fabian numbreth but twelve Kings, but in others I find more.

The Metropolitan See of this Province of Eaſtangles was firſt at a Town called Dunmoke, or Dunwich, which in times paſt hath been a famous and populous Town, with a Mayor and four Bailiffs, and alſo divers Pariſh Churches and Hoſpitals, whereunto great Priviledges by divers Kings have been granted: which Town is now fallen into ruin and decay, and more than half conſumed by the eating in of the Sea, as alſo greatly impoveriſhed by loſs of the Haven, which heretofore hath flouriſhed with divers tall Ships belonging to the ſame, (the inhabitants thereof being not able of themſelves to repair it without the help of other good people); where the firſt Biſhop was Felix, a Burgundian, who ſat there fourteen years. After this, unto the time of Egebert King of Weſtſax, this Province was ever ruled by two Biſhops, whereof the one had his See at Dunmoke, now called Dunwich; the other at Hemaham, where twelve ſat one after another. From thence it was tranſlated to Thetford, where ſat three Biſhops. At laſt by Biſhop Herbert it was removed to Norwich, where he erected a Monaſtery of Monks.

This Province ſtandeth in the order and race of the Saxon Kings, reigning together with the Britains in this Realm. Now followeth the deſcription of the Britain Kings, reigning with the Saxons in like manner.

Although the miſerable Britains thus were bereaved of their land, by the cruel fidelity of the Saxons, yet were they not ſo driven out or expelled, but that a certain Kingdom remained among them in ſome part of the land, namely about Cornwall, and the parts of Cambria, which is divided in two parts, Southwales called Demetie, and Northwales called Venedocia. The ſaid Britains moreover through the valiant acts of their Kings, ſometimes reigned alſo in other Countries, diſplacing the Saxons, and recovering again their own, ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs, till the time of Cadwallader, when as the Britains being depoſed by Germanudas (whoſe help they themſelves ſent for out of Ireland againſt Cadwallader their wicked King) utterly loſt their Land and Kingdom; being thence driven utterly into Wales and Cornwal, in the year of our Lord 570. What the order of theſe Kings was, what were their acts, their names and times when they reigned, in this brief Table under written is expreſſed. Wherein firſt is to be premonſhed that Conſtantinus ſecundus had three Children, to wit, Conſtans, which was made a Monk in Winchester, and after made a King; the ſecond was Aurelius Ambroſius; Uther the third was Uter Pendragon. This being premiſed, we will now enter the deſcription of our Table, beginning with Vortiger.

A Table declaring the Kings of Britain which reigned together with the Saxons, after their coming into their land.

Kings of Britain which here reigned in the time of the Saxons.	Vortiger. Vortimer. Vortiger again. Aurelius Ambroſius. Uter Pendragon. Arthur.	Conſtantinus 3. Aurelius. Conanus. Vorigerius. Malgo. Careticus.

Here is to be underſtood that theſe Britain Kings above mentioned did not ſo reign here in this land, from the time of Vortiger, that they had the full Government over all the whole Realm, but only over parcels or parts, ſuch as by force of Arms they could either hold or win from the Saxons; which coming in daily, and growing upon them, did ſo enfeeble the land with multitudes of them, that the Britains at length were neither able to hold that which they had, nor to recover that which they loſt; leaving example to all Ages and Countries, what it is firſt to let in foreign Nations into their Dominion, but eſpecially what it is for Princes to joyn in Marriage with Infidels, as this Vortiger did with Hengiſts daughter, which was the mother of all this miſchief; giving to the Saxons not only ſtrength, but alſo occaſion and courage to attempt that which they did. Neither was this unconſidered before of the Britain Lords and Nobility, who worthily being therewith offended, juſtly depoſed their King, and Enthroned Vortimer his Son in his room. By the which Vortimer being a puiſſant Prince, the Saxons were then repulſed, and driven again into Germany, where they ſtayed a while till the death of Vortimer, whom Rowen daughter of Hengiſt cauſed traiterouſly to be poyſoned. Then Vortiger being reſtored again to his Kingdom, through the entreaty of Rowen his wife, ſent into Germany again for Hengiſt, who effoons making his return, came in with a Navy of 300 Ships well appointed. The Nobles of Britain hearing this, prepared themſelves on the contrary ſide in all forceable wiſe to put them off. But Hengiſt through Rowen his daughter ſo laboured the King, excuſing himſelf, and ſaying that he brought not the multitude to work any violence either againſt him or againſt his Country, but only thinking that Vortimer had yet been alive, whom he minded to impugn for the Kings ſake, and to take his part. And now forſomuch as he heareth of the death of Vortimer his enemy, he therefore commiteth both himſelf and his people to his diſpoſition, to appoint how few or how many of them he would to remain within his land; the reſt ſhould return. And if it ſo pleaſed the King to appoint day and place where they might meet and talk together of the matter, both he and his would ſtand to ſuch order as the King with his Council ſhould appoint. With theſe fair words the King and his Nobles well contented, did aſſign to them both day and place, which was in the Town of Ambry, where he meant to talk with them; adding this condition withal, that each part ſhould come without any manner of weapon. Hengiſt ſhewing himſelf well agreed thereto, gave privy intelligence of his ſide, that each man ſhould carry with him ſecretly in his Hoſe a long Knife, with their watch-word alſo given unto them when they ſhould draw their Knives, wherewith every Saxon ſhould (and ſo did) kill the Britain with whom he talked, as is above declared. The Britains Lords being ſlain, the Saxons took Vortiger the King and bound him; for whoſe ranſome they required to be delivered to them the Cities of London, York, Lincoln, Winchester, with other the moſt ſtrongeſt holds within the land; which being to them granted, they begin to make ſpoil and havock of the Britain Nation, deſtroying the Citizens, plucking down Churches, killing up the Prieſts, burning the Books of the holy Scripture, leaving nothing undone that tyranny could work, which was about the year of our Lord 462. The King ſeeing this miſerable ſlaughter of the people fled into Wales.

This while Aurelius Ambroſius, and Uter Pendragon, Brethren to King Conſtans above mentioned, whom Vortiger wickedly cauſed to be killed, were in little Britain. To whom the Britains ſent word deſiring their aid in Our Engliſh old Chronicles make record that Horſus the Brother of Hengiſt was ſlain before in the time of Vortimer. The ſame alſo do record that this Hengiſt was taken priſoner in the field, fighting againſt Aurelius Ambroſius; who then conſulting with his Nobles and Barons what was to be done with him, the Biſhop of Glouceſter, called Eldadus, ſtanding up, gave this counſel, ſaying, That if all men would deliver him, yet he with his own hands would cut him in pieces; alledging the example of Samuel againſt Agag King of the Amalekites, taken by King Saul in the field, whom the ſaid Samuel cauſed to be cut in pieces. Even ſo (ſaith he) do you to this Agag here; that as he hath made many a woman widow, and without children, ſo his mother may be made this day of him likewiſe. And ſo was Hengiſt taken out of their City by Eldad Conſul or Mayor of Glouceſter, and there was beheaded, if truth or credit be to be given to theſe our old Britain Stories, whereof I have nothing certainly to pronounce, but that I may ſuſpect the truth thereof, which was about the year of our Lord 480. *Henr. A certain ancient written Hiſtory I have in Latin, compiled in the fourteenth year of King Richard the Second, and by him cauſed to be written as the Title declareth; which becauſe it beareth no name of the Author, I call it by the name of him of whom I borrowed this Book, with many other likewiſe without name, Hiſtoria Cariana. This Hiſtory recordeth that Hengiſt died in Kent the two and thirtieth year of his reign; which if it be true, then is it falſe that he was taken at Cuninburgh, and ſlain in the North. This Aurelius Ambroſius before mentioned, is thought of Polydorus Virgilius, citing the authority of Beda, to deſcend of the ſtock of the Romans; which as it is not unpoſſible to be true, ſo this is certain by the full accord of all our old written Stories, that both the ſaid Aurelius and his Brother Uter Pendragon, being the Sons of Conſtantinus, Brother to Ambrosius King of little Britain, were nurſed and brought up in England in their tender age, and inſtructed by Guitelinus Archbiſhop of London, and after the murther of Conſtans their Elder Brother were conveyed from hence to little Britain; whereby it is manifeſt that they were born in this land; and though their Father were a Roman, as Polidorus pretendeth, yet like it is that they were Britains born, and had a Britain to their Mother.

The uncertainty of our old Britain Stories.

Aurelius Ambroſius King.

After the death of Aurelius, who (as the Story ſaith) was poyſoned by the crafty means of Paſcentius Son of Vortigere (ſubduing one under the weed of a Monk to play the Phyſician, and ſo to poyſon him); next ſucceeded his Brother Uter, Sirnamed Pendragon, about the year of our Lord 497, who fighting againſt Octa and Coſa, took them and brought them to London there to be kept; but they breaking out of priſon returned into Germany for more aid. In this mean time daily recourſe was of Saxons, with great Companies coming out of Saxony, with whom the Britains had divers and ſundry conflicts, ſometimes winning, ſometimes loſing. Not long after Octa and Coſa renewing their power in Germany, in all moſt ſpeedy haſt did return again and joyn with the other Saxons againſt the Britains. Here began the ſtate of miſerable Britain more and more to decay, while the Idolatrous Saxons prevailed in number and ſtrength againſt the Chriſtian Britains; oppreſſing the people, throwing down Churches then and Monaſteries, murthering the Prelates, ſparing neither age nor perſon, but waſting Chriſtianity almoſt through the whole Realm. To theſe miſeries it fell moreover, that Uter their King was ſick and could not come out; notwithſtanding being grieved with the lamentable deſtruction of his people, he cauſed his Bed to be brought into the Camp, where God gave him Victory. Offa and Cofa there being slain. After this Victory in short space Uter died of poyson (as is said) put into a fountain, whereof the King was wont to drink, about the year of our Lord 516. Flor. Hist. {Ann. 516.}

About which time and year came in Stuph and Wigarius two Nephews of Certhice King of Westsaxons, with their companies, so violently upon the Britains, that they of the Welt part of the Realm were not able to relist them. Then the merciful providence of Almighty God raised up for them King Arthur, the son of Uter, who was then Crowned after him, and victoriously reigned. To this Arthur the old Britain Histories do ascribe twelve great Victories against the Heathen Saxons; whole notorious and famous Conquests mentioned in the Britain Stories, I leave as I find them, referring them to the credit of their Authors in whom they are found. Notwithstanding, as I do not think contrary, but God by the foresaid Arthur gave to the Britains some stay and quietness during his life, and certain of his successors; so touching certain of his great Victories and Conquests, not only over this Land, but also over all Europe, I judge them more fabulous, than that any credit should be given unto them; and more worthy to be joyned with the Iliads of Homer, than to have place in any Ecclesiastical History. After Arthur next King of the Britains was Constantinus the third. After him Aurelius Conanus. Then Vortiporius; after whom followed Malgo, noted in stories to be a Sodomite. And after him the last King of the Britains was Careceius, all given to Civil War, execrable to God and Man. Who being chased out by the Britains themselves, the Land fell to possession of the Saxons, about the year of our Lord 568, by whom all the Clergy and the Christian Ministers of the Britains were then utterly driven out: insomuch that Thomus Archbishop of London, and Thadesseus Archbishop of York, seeing their Churches all wasted, and Parishes disperled with their carriages and monuments, left their Seas in Britain, and fled into Cambria, which we now call Wales. Touching which matter, and touching also the cause of this desolation and ruine of the Britains Kingdom, the first fountain and origine thereof partly before is declared; where was shewed in the time of Constantinus Magnus and Maximian, how these Noble Princes with other more, atchieving their venturous affairs in other Countries, took with them great Multitudes and Armies out of Britain; through the occasion whereof the Land was greatly impaired and deprived of the most chief and principal Nobles, being carried away to serve in Foreign Wars (which was no small cause, why the Realm of Britain being so wasted) was the lels able to help it self against their enemies. Although this was not the chief occasion, but other causes there were greater, wherefore God by his just judgment suffered this plague and overthrow to fall upon that people; as here out of an old Author, and partly out of Gildas I have found it, so I thought to annex it in his own words, first in Latine, then afterward Englished the same for the more credit of that which shall be alledged, in tenor as followeth:

King Arthur

Constantinus the third, Aurelius Conanus, Vortiporius, Malgo, Careceius Kings of Britain.

The Archbishop of London and the Archbishop of York, fly into Wales.

Ex Historia gentium Britannicarum.

Nobiliores totius Regni præditos Duces sequuti fuerunt, & ignobiles remanebant, qui cum vicem nobilium obtinere cæpissent, extulerunt se ultra quod dignitas expetebat. Et ob affluentiam divitiarum superbi caperunt tali & tantæ fornicationi indulgere, qualis nec inter gentes audita est. Et, ut Gildas historicus testatur, non solum hoc vitium, sed omnia quæ humanæ naturæ accidere solent, & præcipue quod totius boni evertit statum, odium veritatis, amor mendacii, susceptio mali pro bono, veneratio nequitiæ pro benignitate, exceptatio Sathanæ pro Angelo lucis: ungebantur reges, non propter dominum, sed qui cæteris crudeliores essent. Si quis vero eorum mitior, & veritati aliquatenus propior videretur, in hunc quasi Britanniæ subversorem omnia odia telaque torquebantur. Omnia quæ Deo placebant & displicebant æquali lance inter eos pendebantur. Et non solum hæ seculares viri, sed & ipse grex Domini, ejusque pastores sine discretione faciebant. Non igitur admirandum est degeneres tales patriam illam amittere, quam præditio modo maculabant.

The cause of the destruction of the Britains declared.

In English thus:

The Nobles of this Realm, following the Princes and Captains above named; by reason thereof the vulgar and rascal sort remained behind at home. Who, when they had gotten the rooms and places of the Nobles, they advanced themselves above that their dignity required. And through their abundance of riches, they surprised with pride, began to fall into such and so great fornication, as was never heard of even among the Gentiles. And as Gildas the Hiſtoriographer witnesseth, not into vice only, but also into all manner of wickedneſs, whereto mans nature is inclined: and especially into that which is the overthrow of all good effects, the hatred of the truth, love of lies, imbracing of evil inſtead of goodneſs, regarding of miſchief inſtead of vertue, receiving of the Devil inſtead of an Angel of light. They anointed Kings, not ſuch as could well rule a Commonwealth, but thoſe which exceeded all other in cruelty. And if any might be perceived to be ſomewhat more humble or meek, or to be more inclined to favour the truth than the reſidue, him did every one hate and backbite as the overthrower and deſtroyer of Britain. All things whether they pleaſed or diſpleaſed Gods they regarded alike. And not ſeculer men only did thus, but alſo the Congregation of the Lord and their Biſhops and Teachers without any difference at all. Therefore it is not to be marvelled that ſuch people ſo degenerating and going out of kind ſhould loſe that Country, which they had after this manner defiled.

In English thus: The English Hist.

And thus much hitherto concerning the Hiſtory of the Britains, till (by the grace of Chriſt) the order of time ſhall bring usthereafter to the Treatiſe of Cedwalla and Colwalladrus. Now remaineth it, in returning again to the matter of the Saxons, to diſcourſe particularly, that which before in the Table above we have ſummarily comprehended.

In this order and race of the Saxon Kings above ſpecified, which had thus chaſed out the Britains, and now divided their Land in ſeven Kingdoms; as there were many naughty and wicked Kings (whoſe pernicious examples, being all ſet on War and bloodſhed, are greatly to be deteſted and eſchewed of all true godly Princes) ſo ſome there were again (although but few) very fincere and good. But none almoſt from the firſt to the laſt, which was not either ſlain in war, or murthered in peace, or elſe conſtrained to make himſelf a Monk. Such was the rage then, and the tyranny of that time. Whether we ſhould impute it to the corruption of Mans Nature, or to the juſt judgment of Gods hand, ſo diſpoſing the matter, that as they had violently and falſly diſpoſſeſſed the Britains of their right; ſo they moſt miſerably were not only vexed of the Danes, and conquered at laſt by the Normans; but alſo more cruelly devoured themſelves, one warring ſtill againſt another, till they were never able to help themſelves, nor yet to reſiſt others. Of them which are noted for good among theſe Saxon Kings, the firſt and principal is Ethelbertus, or Ethelbricſt the firſt King in Kent above ſpecified: who by the means of Auſtin, and partly through his Wife named Berda, firſt received and preferred the Chriſtian Faith in all this Land of the Engliſh Saxons; whereof more followeth hereafter to be ſaid (the Lord ſo permitting) as place and opportunity ſhall require. The next place I give to Oſwaldus of Northumberland, who not only did his endeavour in furthering the faith of Chriſt amongſt his People; but alſo being King, diſdained not himſelf to ſtand up, and interpret to his Nobles and Subjects the preaching of Aidanus, preaching Chriſt to them in his Scotiſh language. In the ſame commendation alſo like as in the ſame line, cometh his Uncle Edwin King of Northumberland, a good Prince, and the firſt receiver of Chriſts faith in that Land, by the means of his Wife, and Paulinus Biſhop. Add to theſe alſo Sigebert, firſt chriſtened King of the Eaſtangles, and Sebert, firſt chriſtened King of Eſſex: of whom the one was a great furtherer of Religion, and ſetter up of Schools; the other, which is Sebert or Serbricht, was Nephew to Ethelbert of Kent, under whom he ruled in Eſſex. By the which Ethelbert, in the time of the ſaid Sebert, the Church of Pauls was builded at London, and Chriſtian Faith much enlarged, &c. Of the ſame name there was alſo another Ethelbert King of the Eaſtangles, a good Prince; who by the advice of his Council perſwaded to marriage (though againſt his will) went went peaceably to King Offa for diſpouſage of Athilrid his Daughter; where the good King meaning innocently, through the ſiniſter and deviliſh counſel of King Offa's Wife, was ſecretly beheaded and made away. Whereupon Offa, through repentance thereof, made the firſt Peter-pence to be given to S. Peters Church in Rome.

Peter-pence how they firſt came to be paid to Rome.

In the Catalogue of theſe good Kings is alſo to be numbred Kenelmus King of the Mercians, and Edmundus King of the Eaſtangles; of the which two, the firſt was falſly and abominably circumvented and beheaded, by the means of his cruel Siſter and his Tutor, as he was in his hunting at Corfecaſtle. The other which is called King Edmund the Martyr, was ſlain at Bury, or (as ſome write) at the Caſtle of Halefdom by the Danes: upon what occaſion, Hiſtories do vary. The Author of Flores Hiſtoriarum ſaith, it was by reaſon of one Lothbroke a Dane, who being of the Kings bloud, and being with his Hawk on the Sea ſide in a little Boat, was driven by the force of the Weather into the Coaſt of Northfolk, where he being preſented to King Edmund, was retained in the Court with great favour; till at length one Berick the Kings Falconer, envying and deſpighting him for his great dexterity in that faculty, privily did murther him in a Wood. This being at laſt eſpied, as Murther lightly will come out, Berick was ſet in Lothbroke's Boat alone, without all tackling, to be committed unto the Sea; and, as it chanced, was driven into Denmark, who there being ſeen in Lothbroke's Boat, was finckly examined of the party. He then to excuſe himſelf, falſly ſaid he was ſlain by the commandment of the King. Upon the occaſion whereof, Ingvar and Hubba, ſons to the ſaid Lothbroke, gathering an Army of Danes, invaded firſt Northumberland, after that burſting into Northfolk on every ſide, ſent this Meſſage to King Edmund after this tenor: Signifying that King Ingvar the victorious Prince [dread both by Sea and Land] as he had ſubjected divers other Lands under him, ſo arriving now to the Coaſts of Northfolk, where he intendeth to Winter, chargeth and commandeth him to divide with him his old treaſuries, and his fathers riches, and ſo to rule under him; which if he would not do, but would contemn his power ſo ſtrongly furniſhed with ſuch an Army, he ſhould be judged as unworthy both of Kingdom and Life, &c. The King hearing this Meſſage, not a little aſtoniſhed hereat, calling his Council about him, conſulted with them, eſpecially with one of his Biſhops being then his Secretary, what was beſt to be done; who fearing the Kings life, exhorteth him by words and divers examples to agree to the Meſſage. At this the King a while holding his peace, at length thereto made anſwer again in theſe words, ſaying, God (ſaith he) ſell your Lord, and let him know that Edmundus the Chriſtened King, for the love of this temporal life, will not ſubject himſelf to a Pagan Duke, unleſs before he become a Chriſtian, &c. The Meſſenger taking his Anſwer was not ſo ſoon out of the Gates, as Ingvar meeting him and bidding him to be ſhort in declaring his anſwer, cauſed all the Kings Garriſon to be ſet round about. Some ſay, that the King flying to Theford three pitcht a Field with the Danes; but the Danes prevailing, the good King from thence did fly to the Caſtle of Halefdom above mentioned; where he being purſued of the Danes, was there taken, and at length being bound to a ſtake, there, of the raging Danes was ſhot to death. And thus much for the good Kings.

Kenelmus King of the Mercians. St. Edmund King of the Eaſtangles.

The meſſage of Ingvar to King Edmund.

Now as concerning thoſe Kings which made themſelves Monks, which in number be ſeven or eight, although the example be rare and ſtrange, and much commended of the Chroniclers of that time; yet I cannot raſhly aſſent to their commendation, albeit the cafe thereof is no matter of our Hiſtory. Firſt, in altering their eſtate from Kings to Monks, if they did it to find more eaſe, and leſs trouble thereby, I ſee not how that excuſe ſtandeth with the office of a good man, to change his publick vocation for reſpect of private commodity. If fear of jeopardy and danger did drive them thereunto, what praiſe or commendation deſerve they in ſo doing? let the Monkiſh Hiſtories judge what they liſt. Me ſeemeth ſo much praiſe as they deſerve in providing their own ſafety, ſo much they deſerve again to be diſcommended in forſaking the Commonwealth. If they did it (as moſt like it is) for holineſs ſake, thinking in that kind of life to ſerve and pleaſe God better, or to merit more toward their ſalvation than in the eſtate of a King, therein they were far deceived; not knowing that the ſalvation which cometh of God, is to be meaſured and eſteemed, not by Mans merits, or by any perfection of life, or by difference of any vocation, more of one than another, but only by the free grace of the Goſpel, which freely juſtifieth all them that faithfully believe in Chriſt Jeſus. But here will be ſaid again; peradventure, in the ſolitary life of Monkery be fewer occaſions of evils than in Kings Courts, wherefore that life ſeverth more to holineſs, and is more to be preferred than the other. To this I anſwer, To avoid the occaſions of evil is good where ſtrength lacketh to reſiſt; but otherwiſe, where duty and charge bindeth to tarry; there to avoid the occaſions of evil, where rather they are to be reſiſted, rather declareth a weakneſs of the Man than deſerveth any praiſe. As is it truly ſaid of Truly, Out of Aſia (ſaith he) to live a good life is no Godamer-ey; but in Aſia, where ſo great occaſions of evils abound, there to live a good man, that is praiſe worthy. With the like reaſon I may infer, if a Man be called to be a King, there not to change the vocation for avoiding of occaſions, but rather to reſiſt occaſions, and to keep his vocation, declareth a good and perfect Man. But of theſe by-matters hitherto ſufficient.

Anſwer. Where vocation ſtandeth, evil is a good mans part. Occaſions of evil.

Theſe things now thus premiſed, concerning the order and reign of Kings, as is above prefixed; conſequently remaineth to enter the tractation of ſuch things, as in the time and reign of the aforeſaid Kings happened in the Church; firſt putting the Reader again in mind of the former Perſecutions within the Realm, partly before touched in the time of the Britain Kings, which eſpecially were three or four before the coming of Auſtin into England. Four Perſecutions in Britain before the coming of Auſtin into England.

1. The firſt was under Dioceſian, and that not only in England, but generally throughout all the Roman Monarchy, as is above ſpecified. In this Perſecution Alphabanus, Julius, Aaron, with a great number more of other good Chriſtian Britains were Martyred for Chriſts Name. This Perſecution of Dioceſian began the year of our Lord 280.

2. The ſecond Perſecution or deſtruction of Chriſtian Faith, was by the invading of Gnavius and Melga, whereof the firſt was Captain of the Huns, the other of the Picts. Theſe two Tyrants, after the cruel daughter of Urſula, and other 11000 noble Virgins made their Rode into Britain, hearing the fame to be deſtitute of the ſtrength of Men. At what time they made miſerable murther of Chriſts Saints, ſpoiling and waſting Churches, without mercy either of Women or Children, ſparing none. The Perſecution of Gnavius and Melga.

3. The third Perſecution came by Hengiſt, and the Saxons; who likewiſe deſtroyed and waſted the Chriſtian Congregations within the Land, like raging Wolves flying upon the Sheep, and ſpilling the blood of Chriſtians, till Aurelius Ambroſius came, and reſtored again the Churches deſtroyed. The Perſecution of Hengiſt in Britain.

4. The fourth deſtruction of the Chriſtian Faith and Religion was by Gurmundus a Pagan King of the Africans; who joyning in League with the Saxons, wrought much grieveſs to the Chriſtians of the Land. Inſomuch that Theonus Biſhop of London, and Thadioceus Biſhop of York, with the reſt of the People, ſo many as were left, having no place wherein to remain with ſafety, did fly ſome to Cornwall, and ſome to the Mountains of Wales about the year of our Lord 550. And this Perſecution remained to the time of Ethelbert King of Kent, in the year five hundred eighty nine. The fourth deſtruction of Chriſtian Faith in Britain by Gurmundus Africanus, in the year 585. This Gurmundus, as ſome ſtories record, was King of Africa.

In the Reign of this Ethelbert, which was then the fifth King of Kent, the Faith of Chriſt was firſt received of the Saxons or Engliſh Men, by the means of Gregory the Biſhop of Rome, in manner and order as here followeth, out of old Hiſtories collected and recorded. Ethelbert poſſeſſeth Kingdom at home to his brother, ſaid he would ſucceed his Kingdom of Chriſt.

Firſt then to joyn the order of our Hiſtory together; the Chriſtian Faith firſt received of King Lucius, indured in Britain till this time, near upon the ſeaſon of 400 years and odd, when by Gurmundus Africanus, (as is ſaid) the ſtabling with the Saxons againſt the Britains, it was near extinct in all the Land, during the ſpace of about forty four years. So that the firſt ſpringing of Chriſts Goſpel in this Land, was in the year of our Lord 180. The coming of the Saxons was in the year of 449, or 450. The coming of Auſtin was in the year 596. From the firſt entring in of the Saxons to their compleat Conqueſt, and the driving out of the Britains (which was about Years before the coming of Auſtin. The compaſſation of the time between the coming of Chriſt in the Goſpel to the coming of Auſtin into England. The continuance and decay of Chriſts Goſpel between the Britains and the Saxons about the later time of Cadwalader) were two hundred and forty years. In sum, from Christ to Lucius were one hundred and eighty years. The continuance of the Gospel from Lucius to the entring of the Saxons, was three hundred and two years. The decay of the same to the entring of Austin, was one hundred forty three years, which being added together make from Lucius to Austin four hundred forty five years; from Christ to Austin they make five hundred ninety eight years. In this year then

Anno 598. followed ninety eight, Austin being sent from Gregory, came into England; the occasion whereupon Gregory sent him hither was this:

Beda. Polychron. lib. 12. ca. 8. Malmesburiensis de regib. Henr. Hunt. lib. 5. Fabian. p. 5. cap. 119. Libri historiales Turn.

In the days of Pelagius Bishop of Rome, Gregory chancing to see certain Children in the Marker-place of Rome (brought thither to be sold out of England) being fair and beautiful of visage, demanded out of what Country they were? And understanding they were heathenish out of England, lamented the case of the Land, being so beautiful and Angelical, so to be subject under the Prince of darkness. And asking moreover out of what Province they were? It was answered out of Deira a part of Northsaxons; whereof, as it is to be thought, that which we now call Deirham taketh his name. Then he alluding to the name of Deira, These people (saith he) are to be delivered De Dei ira, which is, From Gods Wrath. Moreover understanding the Kings name of that Province to be Alle (above mentioned) alluding likewise to his name, There (saith he) ought Alleluja to be sung to the living God. Whereupon he being moved, and desirous to go and help the Conversion of that Country, was not permitted of Pelagius and the Romans for that time to accomplish his desire. But afterward, being Bishop himself next after Pelagius, he sent thither the foresaid Austin with other Preachers near about to the number of forty. But by the way, how it happened I cannot say, as Austin with his company were passing in their journey, such a sudden fear entred into their hearts that (as Antoninus saith) they returned all. Others write that Austin was sent back to Gregory again, to release them of that Voyage so dangerous and uncertain, amongst such a barbarous people, whose language they neither knew, nor were able to resist their rudeness. Then Gregory, with pithy persuasions confirming and comforting him, sent him again with Letters both to the Bishop of Arelatensis, willing him to help and aid the said Austin and his company, in all whatsoever his need required. Also other Letters he directed to the foresaid Austin, and to his fellows, exhorting them to go forward boldly to the Lords work, as by the tenor of the said Epistle here following may appear.

GRegorius Servus Servorum Dei, servis Domini nostri. Quia melius fuerat bona non incipere, quam ab iis quæ capta sunt cogitatione retrorsum redire, &c.

In English:

The Epistle of Gregory to them which went to preach in England.

GRegory the servant of Gods servants, to the servants of the Lord. Forsomuch as it is better not to take good things in hand, than after they be begun to think to revolt back from the same again, therefore now you may not nor cannot (dear Children) but with all fervent study and labour must needs go forward in that good business, which through the help of God you have well begun. Neither let the labour of your journey, nor the slanderous tongues of men appall you, but that with all instance and fervency ye proceed and accomplish the thing which the Lord hath ordained you to take in hand; knowing that your great travel shall be recompenced with reward of greater glory hereafter to come. Therefore as we send here Austin to you again, whom also we have ordained to be your Governour, so do you humbly obey him in all things, knowing that it shall be profitable so for your souls, whatsoever at his admonition ye shall do. Almighty God with his grace defend you, and grant me to see in the eternal Country the fruit of your labour; that although I cannot labour as I would with you, yet I may be found partaker of your retribution, for that my will is good to labour in the same fellowship with you together. The Lord God keep you safe, most dear and welbeloved Children. Dated the Tenth before the Kalends of Au- gust, in the Reign of our Sovereign Lord Mauricius most vertuous Emperor, the fourteenth of his Empire.

The Bishop of Rome cal-leth them to-gether his Lord.

Thus they emboldned and comforted through the good words of Gregory, sped forth their journey till they came at length to the Isle of Thenet, lying upon the East side of Kent. Near to the which landing place was then the Manory or Palace of the King, not far from Sandwich (Eastward from Canterbury) which the Inhabitants of the Ile then called Richborough, whereof some part of the ruinous Walls is yet to be seen. The King then Reigning in Kent, was Ethelbert, as above appeareth, the fifth King of that Province, who at that time had married a Wife a French Woman, being christened, named Berda, whom he had received of her Parents upon this condition, that he should permit her with her Bishop committed unto her, called Lebardus, to enjoy the freedom of her Faith and Religion; by the means whereof he was more flexible, and sooner induced to embrace the preaching and Doctrine of Christ. Thus Austin being arrived, sent forth certain messengers and interpreters to the King, signifying that such a one was come from Rome, bringing with him glad tidings to him and all his people of life and salvation eternally to Reign in Heaven, with the only true and living God for ever, if he would so willingly hearken to the same, as he was gladly come to preach and teach it unto him.

Austin and his company cometh to England.

Ethelbert King of Kent.

Berda.

What goodness cometh to have a good and godly Wife.

The King who had heard of this Religion before by means of his Wife, within a few days after cometh to the place where Austin was, to speak with him; but that should be without the House, after the manner of his Law. Austin against his coming, as stories affirm, erected up a Banner of the Crucifix (such was then the grosness of that time) and preached to him the Word of God. The King answering again, saith in effect as followeth, The words are very fair that you preach and promise; nevertheless because it is to me uncouth and new, I cannot soon start away from my Country Law wherewith I have been so long inured, and assent to you. Albeit, yet notwithstanding for that ye are come (as ye say) so far for my sake, ye shall not be molested by me, but shall be right well intreated, hearing all things to you munificent necessary for your sup-portation. Besides this, neither do we debar you, but grant you free leave to preach to our People and Subjects, to convert whom ye may to the faith of your Religion.

The King answereth to Austin.

The King saith upon oth Ethen.

When they had received this comfort of the King, they went with Procession to the City of Dorobernia, or Canterbury, singing Alleluja with the Letany, which then by Gregory had been ued at Rome in the time of the great Plague reigning then at Rome mentioned in old stories. The words of the Letany were these, Deprecamur te Domine in omni misericordia tua, ut auferatur furor tuus & ira tua a civitate ista, & de domo sancta tua quoniam peccavimus, Alleluja; that is, We beseech thee, O Lord, in all thy mercies, that thy fury and anger may cease from this City, and from thy holy House, for we have sinned, Alleluja. Thus they entring into the City of Dorobernia, the head City of all that Dominion at that time, where the King had given them a Mansion for their abode: there they continued preaching and baptising such as they had converted in the East side of the City in the old Church of Saint Martin (where the Queen was wont to resort) unto the time that the King was converted himself to Christ. At length, when the King had well considered the honest conversation of their life, and moved with the Miracles wrought through Gods hand by them, he, heard them more gladly; and lastly, by their wholesome exhortations and example of godly life, he was by them converted and christened in the year above specified five hundred eighty six, and the thirty sixth year of his Reign. After the King was thus converted, innumerable other daily came in and were adjoyned to the Church of Christ; whom the King did specially embrace, but compelled none; for so he had learned, that the faith and service of Christ ought to be voluntary, and not coacted. Then he gave to Austin a place for the Bishops See at Christs Church in Dorobernia, and builded the Abby of S. Peter and Paul in the East side of the said City, where after Austin and all the Kings of Kent were buried, and that place is now called St. Austin.

Austins Archbishop.

In

In this while Austin sailed into France unto the Bishop Arelatensis, called Etherius, by him to be consecrated Archbishop by the commandment of Gregory, and so was. Also the said Austin sent to Rome Laurentius one of his company, to declare to Gregory how they had sped, and what they had done in England; sending withal to have the counsel and advice of Gregory concerning nine or ten questions, whereof some are partly touched before.

The tenor of his Questions or Interrogations, with the Answers of Gregory to the same, here follow in English briefly translated.

Ex decret Gregorii prim. lib. 7. consilium. 2.

The Questions of Austin an Archbishop of Canterbury, sent to Gregory, with the Answer again of Gregory to the same.

The first Interrogation.

The first interrogation.

MY first Question (reverend Father) is concerning Bishops, how they ought to behave themselves toward their Clerks; or of such Oblations, as the faithful offer upon the Altar, what portions or dividents ought to be made thereof?

The Answer

The Answer.

How a Bishop ought to behave himself in the Congregation, the holy Scripture testifieth, which I doubt not but you know right well, especially in the Epistles of St. Paul to Timothy, wherein he laboureth to inform the said Timothy how to behave his conversation in the house of the Lord. The manner is of the See Apostolick to warn and charge all such as be ordained Bishops, of all their stipend, or that which is given to make four partitions. One to the Bishop for Hospitality and receiving comers in; another to the Clergy; the third to the Poor; the fourth to the repairing of Churches. But because your brotherhood instructed with rules of Monastical Discipline, cannot live separated from your Clerks about you, therefore in the English Church (which now through the Providence of God is brought to the faith of Christ) you must observe this Institution concerning your Conversation, which was in the first Fathers in the beginning of the Primitive Church; among whom there was not one, which counted any thing to be his own proper of all that he did possess: but all was common among them.

The 2d. Interrogation.

The second Interrogation.

I desire to know and to be instructed, whether Clerks, that cannot contain, may marry: and if they do marry, whether then they ought to return to the Secular State again or no?

The Answer

The Answer.

If there be any Clerks out of Holy Orders, which cannot contain, let them have their Wives, and take their stipends or wages without. For we read it so written of the forefaid Fathers, that they divided to every person according as their work was. Therefore as concerning the stipend of such, it must be provided and thought upon. And they must be also holden under Ecclesiastical Discipline, to live a godly Conversation, to employ themselves in singing Psalms, and to refrain their tongue, heart and body (by the grace of God) from all things unseemly and unlawful. As for the vulgar and common sort which live after the common condition of men, to describe what partitions to make, what Hospitality to keep, or what works of Mercy to exhibite, to such I have nothing to say, but to give (as our Master teacheth) in all our deeds of mercy of that which aboundeth: Of that (saith he) which aboundeth or is overplus, give Alms, and behold all things be clean unto you.

The third Interrogation.

The 3d. Interrogation

Seeing there is but one Faith, how happeneth it then the Ceremonies and Customs of Churches to be so diverse: as in the Church of Rome there is one custom and manner of Mass, and the French Church hath another?

The answer

The Answer.

The Custom of the Church of Rome, what it is you know, wherein you remember that you have been brought up from your youth; but rather it pleaseth me better, that whether it be in the Church of Rome, or any French Church, where ye find any thing that seemeth better to the service and pleasing of God, that ye choose the same, and so infer and bring into the English Church (which is yet new in the faith) the best and pickedst things chosen out of many Churches: for things are not to be loved for the place sake, but the place is to be beloved for the things that be good; wherefore such things as be good, godly, and religious, those choose out of all Churches, and induce to your people, that they may take root in the minds of English men.

Note a worthy saying of Gregory.

The fourth Interrogation.

The 4th. Interrogation

I pray you, what punishment judge you for him that shall steal or pilfer any thing out of the Church?

The Answer

The Answer.

This your brotherhood may soon discern by the person of a Thief, how it ought to be corrected. For some there be, that having sufficient to live upon, yet do steal. Others there be which steal of meer necessity. Wherefore considering the quality and difference of the crime, necessary it is, that some be corrected by loss of goods, some by stripes, some others more sharply, and some more easie; yea, and when sharper correction is to be executed, yet that must be done with Charity, and with no fury; for in punishing offenders, this is the cause and end wherefore they are punished, because they should be saved, and not perish in Hell fire. And so ought Discipline to proceed in correcting the faithful, as do good Fathers in punishing their Children, whom both they chasten for their evil, and yet being chastened, they look to have them their Heirs, and think to leave them all they have, notwithstanding they correct them sometimes in anger. Therefore this Charity must be kept in mind; and in the correction there is a measure to be had, so that the mind never do any thing without the rule of reason. Ye add moreover, with what recompence of measure things ought to be required again, which be stollen out of Churches? But God forbid that the Church should ever require again, with increase, that which is lost in outward things, and to seek her gain by endamaging others.

The fifth Interrogation.

The 5th. Interrogation

Item, Whether two brethren may marry two sisters, being far off from any part of kindred?

The answer

The Answer.

This in no part of Scripture is forbidden, but it may well and lawfully be done.

The sixth Interrogation.

The 6th. Interrogation

Item, To what degree of kindred may the matrimony of the faithful extend with their kindred, or whether it is lawful to marry with the Stepmother and her kinsfolks?

The answer

The Answer.

A certain terrene law amongst the old Romans doth permit, that either brother or sister, or the son and daughter of two brethren may marry together. But by the experience we learn, that the issue of such Marriage doth never thrive, nor come forward. Also the holy Law of God forbiddeth to reveal the turpitude of thy blood or kindred. Wherefore necessary it is, that in the third or fourth degree the faithful may lawfully marry; for in the second (being an unlawful) they must needs refrain. To be coupled with the stepmother is utterly abominable, for it is written in the law: Thou shalt not reveal the turpitude of thy father. For so much then as it is so written in the law: And they shall be two in one flesh; the son then that presumeth to reveal the turpitude of his Step-mother, which is one flesh with his father, what doth he then but reveal the turpitude of his own father? Likewise it was forbidden and unlawful to marry with thy kinswoman, which by her first Marriage was made one flesh with thy brother; for the which cause John the Baptist also lost his head, and was crowned a Martyr. Who, though he died not for the confession of Christ, yet for so much, as Christ saith, I am the truth: therefore in that John Baptist was slain for the truth, it may be said his blood was shed for Christ.

To what degree of kindred a man may marry.

By this rule the Marriage of King Henry with Queen Katharine Dowager was unlawful.

The seventh Interrogation.

The 7th. Interrogation.

Item, Whether such as so be coupled together in filthy and unlawful Matrimony ought to be separated, and denied the partaking of the holy Communion?

The Answer.

The Answer

Because there be many of the Nation of Englishmen, which being yet in their infidelity, were so joyned and coupled in such execrable Marriage; the same coming now to faith, are to be admonished hereafter to abstain from the like, and that they know the same to be a grievous sin: that they dread the dreadful judgment of God, left for their carnal delectation they incur the torments of eternal punishment. And yet notwithstanding they are not to be secluded therefore from the participation of Christs body and blood: left we should seem to revenge those things in them, which they before their Baptism through ignorance did commit. For in this time the Holy Church doth correct some faults more fervently, some faults she fusfereth again through mansuetude and meekness; some wittingly and willingly she doth wink at and dissemble; that many times the evil, which she doth detest through bearing and dissembling the may stop and bridle. All they therefore which are come to the faith, must be admonished that they commit no such offence. Which thing if they do, they are to be deprived of the Communion of the Lords Body and Blood. For like as in them that fall through ignorance, their default in this case is tolerable: so in them again it is strongly to be inforced, which knowing they do nought, yet fear not to commit.

A differet saying of Gregory to be noted.

The eighth Interrogation.

The 8th. Interrogation.

Item, To this I desire to be satisfied, after what manner I should deal or do with the Bishops of France, and of Britain?

The Answer.

The Answer

As touching the Bishops in France, I give you no authority or power over them. For the Bishops of Arelas, or Orleance hath by the old time of our Predecessors received the Pall, whom now we ought not to deprive of his authority. Therefore when your brotherhood shall go unto the Province of France, whatsoever ye shall have there to do with the Bishop of Orleance, to do, that he lose nothing of that which he hath found and obtained of the ancient ordinance of our fore-elders. But as concerning the Bishops of Britain, we commit them all to your brotherhood, that the ignorant may be taught, the infirm by persuasion may be confirmed, the wilful by authority may be corrected.

Greg. lib. 25. epist. in Gallianum.

The ninth Interrogation.

The 9th.

Whether a woman being great with child, ought to be baptised; or after she hath children, after how long time she ought to enter into the Church? Or else, that which she hath brought forth, lest it should be prevented with death, after how many days it ought to receive Baptism? Or after how long time after her Child-birth is it lawful for her Husband to resort to her? Or else, if she be in her monthly course, after the disease of women, whether then she may enter into the Church, and receive the Sacrament of the holy Communion? Or else her Husband after the lying with his Wife, before he be washed with water, whether is it lawful for him to enter the Church, and to draw unto the mystery of the holy Communion? All which things must be declared and opened to the rude multitude of Englishmen.

The Answer.

The childing or bearing Woman, why may she not be baptised, seeing that the fruitfulness of the flesh is no fault before the eyes of Almighty God? For our first Parents in Paradise, after they had transgressed, left their immortality by the just judgment of God, which they had taken before. Then because Almighty God would not mankind utterly to perish, because of his fall (although he left now his immortality for his trespass) yet of his benign pity, left notwithstanding to him the fruit and generation of issue. Wherefore the issue and generation of mans nature, which is conserved by the gift of Almighty God, how can it be debarred from the grace of holy Baptism?

The Answer

As concerning the Churching of Women, after they have travelled, where ye demand after how many days they ought to go to the Church, this you have learned in the old law, that for a Man child thirty three days, after a Woman child sixty and three days be appointed her to keep in: albeit this you must take to be understood in a Mystery. For if she should the hour after her travel enter into the Church to give thanks, the committed therein no sin: for why? the lust and pleasure of the flesh, and not the travel and pain of the flesh is sin. In the conjunction of the flesh is pleasure, but in the travel and bringing forth of the child is pain and groaning; as unto the Mother of all it is said. In sorrow thou shalt travel. Therefore if we forbid the Woman after her labour to enter into the Church, then what do we else but count the same punishment given unto her for sin? Therefore for the Woman after her labour to be baptised, either that which she hath travelled forth (if present necessity of death doth so require) yea, in the self same hour, either she that hath brought forth, either that which is born in the same hour when it is born, to be baptised we do not forbid.

The Church's ling of women.

He speaketh here after the rules of the time.

Moreover, for the Man to company with his Wife, that he must not, before the Child that is born be wained. But now there is a lewd and naughty Custom risen in the condition of married folks, that Mothers do conterm to nurse their own children which they have born, but set them to other Women out to nurse, which seemeth only to come of the cafe of incontinency: for while they will not contain themselves, therefore they put from them their Children to nurse, &c.

Mothers that nurse not their own children.

As concerning the Women in their menstruous course, whether she ought to enter the Church? To this I answer: She ought not to be forbid. For the superfluity of nature in her ought not to be imputed for any fault, neither is it just that she should be deprived of her access to the Church, for that which she suffered against her will. And if the woman did well, presuming in touching the Lords Coat in the time of her bloody issue; why then may not that be granted unto all women infirmed by the fault of nature, which is commended in one person down in her infirmity? Therefore to receive the Mystery of the Holy Communion, it is not forbidden them. Albeit if she dare not so for presume in her great infirmity, she is to be praised, but if she do receive, she is not to be judged: for it is a point of a good mind in some manner to acknowledge her sins there, where is no sin: because many times that is done without fault, which cometh of fault. As when we be hungry, we eat without fault, notwithstanding it cometh by the fault of our first father to us that we are hungry, &c.

Where ye ask, if a man after the company with his Wife may resort to the Church, or to the holy Communion, before he be purged with water? The law given to the old people, commanded that a man (after the company with his Wife) should be purified with water, and also should tarry the Sun-set before he came to the Congregation. Which seemeth to be underfood spiritually: for then moit true it is, that the man companieth with the woman, when his mind through delectation is joyned to unlawful Concupifcence in his heart and cogitation. At that time, before the said fire of Concupifcence shall be removed, let the person think himself unworthy the entrance to the Congregation, through the viciousness of his filthy will. But of this matter sundry Nations have every one their sundry customs: some one way, and some another. The ancient manner of the Romans from our forefathers, hath been, that in such case, first they purge themselves with water, then for a little they abstain reverently, and so resort to the Church, &c.

After many other words debated of this matter, thus he setteth. But if any person not for voluptuousness of the flesh, but for procreation of children do company with his Wife, that man concerning either the coming to the Church, or the receiving the Misteries of the Lords Body and Blood, is to be left to his own judgment; for he ought not to be forbid of us to come, which when he lieth in the fire, will not burn, &c.

There is another question also to these adjoyned, with his answer likewise to the same, concerning pollutions in the night: but I thought these at this present to our English ears sufficient.

To return now to the story again; Gregory after he had sent these resolutions to the questions of Austin, sendeth moreover to the Church of England more coadjutors and helpers, as Melitus, Justus, Paulinus and Rusticanus, with Books and such other implements as he thought necessary for the English Church. He sendeth moreover to the foresaid Austin a Pall with Letters, wherein he setteth an order between the two Metropolitan Sees, the one to be at London, the other to be at York. Notwithstanding, he granteth to the said Austin during his life, to be the only chief Archbishop of all the Land: and after his time, then to return to the two foresaid See of London and York, as is in the same Letter contained, the Tenor whereof here followeth in his own words, as ensueth.

Gregory sendeth the Emperor his Lord.

Besides this, the said Gregory sendeth also another Letter to Melitus concerning his judgment, what is to be done with the idolatrous Temples and Phanes of the English men newly converted, which Phanes he thinketh not best to pluck down, but to convert the use thereof, and so let them stand. And likewise of their Sacrifices, and killing of Oxen, how the same ought to be ordeted, and how to be altered, disputing by the occasions thereof, of the sacrifices of the old Egyptians, permitted of God unto the Israelites, the end and use thereof being altered, &c.

A Letter of Gregory to Melitus.

He sendeth also another Letter to the foresaid Austin, wherein he warneth him not to be proud or puft up for the Miracles wrought of God by him, in converting the People of England, but rather to fear and tremble, left so much as he were puft up by the outward work of Miracles, so much he should fall inwardly through the vain glory of his heart: and therefore wisely exhorteth him to repress the swelling glory of his heart, with the remembrance of his sins rather against God, whereby he rather hath cause to lament, than to rejoice for the other. Not all the elect of God (saith he) work Miracles, and yet have they their names written in the Book of Life. And therefore he should not count so much of those Miracles done, but rather rejoyce with the Disciples of Christ, and labour to have his name written in the Book of Life, where all the Elect of God be contained, neither is there any end of that rejoycing. And whatsoever Miracles it hath pleased God by him to have been done, he should remember they were not done for him, but for their convertion, whose salvation God fought thereby, &c.

A Letter of Gregory to King Ethelbert.

Item, he directed another Epistle to King Ethelbert, as is expressed at large in the Chronicle of Henry Huntington. lib. 3. in the which Epistle, first he praiseth God, then commendeth the goodness of the King, by whom it pleased God so to work such goodness of the People. Secondly, exhorteth him to persist and continue in the godly profession of Christs faith, and to be fervent and zealous in the same; in converting the multitude; in destroying the Temples and works of idolatry, in ruling and governing the people in all holiness and godly conversation, after the godly example of the Emperor Constantine the great. Lastly, comforting him with the promises of life and reward to come, with the Lord that regneth and liveth for ever; premonishing him besides, of the terrors and distresses that shall happen (though not in his days) yet before the terrible day of Gods judgment. Wherefore he willeth him always to be solicitous for his soul, and suspectful of the hour of his death, and watchful of the judgment, that he may be always prepared for the same, when that judgment shall come. In the end he desireth him to accept such presents and gifts which he thought good to send unto him from Rome, &c.

{ Anno 595. Polychron. li. 5. cap. 9. Fabian. part. 3. cap. 119.

Austin thus receiving his Pall from Gregory, as is aboveSaid, and now of a Monk being made an Archbishop, after he had baptized a great part of Kent; he afterward made two Archbishops or Metropolitans, by the commandment of Gregory, as witnesseth Polychron, one at London, another at York.

Archbishops of London and of York made by Austin. Matthew Westminster lib. 8. Bishop of London.

Melitus, of whom mention is made before, was sent specially to the Eastsaxons in the Province of Essex, where after he was made Bishop of London, under Sigebert, King of Essex; which Sigebert, together with his Uncle Ethelbert first builded the Church and Minster of St. Paul in London, and appointed it to Melitus for the Bishops See. Austin (associate with this Melitus and Justus through the help of Ethelbert) assembled and gathered together the Bishops and Doctors of Britain in in a place, which taking the name of the said Austin, was called Austins Oke. In this Assembly he charged the said Bishops, that they should preach with him the Word of God to the English men, and also that they should among themselves reform certain Rites and Usages in their Church, specially for keeping of their *Easter*tide, baptising after the manner of Rome, and such other like. To this the Scots and Britains would not agree, refusing to leave the Custom which they so long time had continued, without the assent of them all which used the same. Here the stories both of Beda, Ceſtrenſis in Polychron. Huntingtonenſis, Jornalenſis, Fabianus, and others more, write of a certain Miracle wrote upon a blind Engliſhman; whom when the Britains could not help, Auſtin kneeling down, and praying, reſtored the blind man to ſight before them all, for a confirmation (as theſe Authors ſay) of his opinion in keeping of Eaſter. But concerning the credit of this Miracle, that I leave to the Authors of whom I had it.

The Britains and Scots uſed not the Rites of Rome.

Then Auſtin gathered another Synod, to the which came ſeven Biſhops of Britain, with the wiſeſt men of that famous Abbey of Bangor. But firſt they took counſel of a certain wiſe and holy man amongſt them what to do; and whether they ſhould be obedient to Auſtin or not. And he ſaid, If he be the ſervant of God, agree unto him. But how ſhall we know that, ſaid they? To whom he anſwered again, If he be meek and humble of heart, by that know that he is the ſervant of God. To this they ſaid again, And how ſhall we know him to be humble and meek of heart? By this (quoth he) ſeeing you are the greater number, if he at your coming into your Synod riſe up, and courteouſly receive you, perceive him to be an humble and a meek man; but if he ſhall contemn and deſpiſe you (being as ye are) the greater part, deſpiſe you him again. Thus the Britain Biſhops entring into the Council, Auſtin after the Romiſh manner keeping his Chair would not remove. Whereat they being not a little offended, after ſome heat of words, in diſdain and great diſpleaſure departed thence. To whom then Auſtin ſpake, and ſaid, That if they would not take peace with their brethren, they ſhould receive War with their enemies; and if they diſdained to preach with them the way of life to the Engliſh Nation, they ſhould ſuffer by their hands the revenge of death. Which not long after ſo came to paſs by the means of Ethelfride, King of Northumberland, who being yet a Pagan, and ſtirred with a fierce fury againſt the Britains, came with a great Army againſt the City of Cheſter, where Brocmaile the Conſul of that City, a friend and helper of the Britains ſide, was ready with his force to receive him. There was at the ſame time at Bangor in Wales an exceeding great Monaſtery, wherein was ſuch a number of Monks, as Galfridus with other Authors, do teſtifie, that if the whole company were divided into ſeven parts, in every of the ſeven parts were contained not ſo few as three hundred Monks; which all did live by the ſweat of their brows, and labour of their own hands, having one for their Ruler, named Dino. Out of this Monaſtery came the Monks of Cheſter, to pray for the good ſucceſs of Brocmaile, fighting for them againſt the Saxons. Three days they continued in faſting and prayer. When Ethelfride the foreſaid King, ſeeing them ſo intentive to their prayers, demanded the cauſe of their coming thither in ſuch a company, and when he perceived it was to pray for their Conſul; Then (ſaith he) although they bear no weapon, yet they fight againſt us, and with their prayers and preachings they perſecute us. Whereupon after that Brocmaile being overcome, did flie away, the King commanded his men to turn their weapons againſt the ſilly unarmed Monks, of whom he flew the ſame time, or rather martyred, eleven hundred, only fifty perſons of that number did fly and eſcape away with Brocmaile, the reſt were all ſlain. The Authors that write of this lamentable Murther, declare and ſay how the foreſpeak'ng of Auſtin was here verified upon the Britains, which becauſe they would not joyn peace with their friends, he ſaid ſhould be deſtroyed of their enemies. Of both theſe parties the Reader may judge what he pleaſeth; I cannot ſee but both together were to be blamed. And as I cannot but accuſe the one, ſo I cannot defend the other. Firſt Auſtin in this matter can in no wiſe be excuſed; who being a Monk before, and therefore a Scholar and profeſſor of humility, ſhewed ſo little humility in this Aſſembly, to ſeven Biſhops and an Archbiſhop, coming at his commandment to the Council, that he thought ſcorn once to ſit at their coming in. Much leſs would his Phariſaical Solemnity have girded himſelf, and waſhed his brethrens feet after their travel, as Chriſt our great Maſter did to his Diſciples; ſeeing his Lordſhip was ſo high, or rather ſo heavy, or rather ſo proud, that he could not find in his heart to give them a little moving of his body, to declare a brotherly and an humble heart. Again, the Britains were as much or more to blame, who ſo much neglected their ſpiritual duty, in revenging their temporal injury, that they denied to joyn their helping labour, to turn the idolatrous Saxons to the way of life and ſalvation, in which reſpect all private cauſes ought to give place, and to be forgotten. For the which cauſe, although lamentable to us, yet no great marvel in them, if the ſtroke of Gods puniſhment did light upon them, according to the words of Auſtin, as is before declared. But eſpecially the cruel King in this fact was moſt of all to blame ſo furiouſly to fly upon them which had neither weapon to reſiſt him, nor yet any will to harm him. And ſo likewiſe the ſame or like happened to himſelf afterward. For ſo was he alſo ſlain in the field by Chriſtian Edwin, who ſucceeded him, as he had ſlain the Chriſtians before, which was about the year of our Lord ſix hundred and ten. But to return to Auſtin again, who by report of Authors was departed before this cruelty was done; after he had baptiſed and chriſtened ten thouſand Saxons or Angles in the Weſt River, that is called Swale, beſide York on a Chriſtmas day, perceiving his end to draw near, he ordained a Succeſſor named Laurentius to rule after him the Archbiſhops See of Dorobernia. Where note by the way, (Chriſtian Reader) that whereas Auſtin baptiſed then in Rivers, it followeth, there was then no uſe of Fonts. Again, if it be true that Fabian ſaith, he baptiſed ten thouſand in one day; the Rite then of baptiſing at Rome was not ſo ceremonial, neither had ſo many Trinkets at that time, as it hath had ſince: or elſe it could not be that he could baptiſe ſo many in one day.

Laurentius Archbiſhop after Auſtin.

Baptiſing in Rivers, not in Fonts. Baptiſing among the old Romans was not ſo full with ſo many ceremonies as ſince.

In the mean ſeaſon, about this time departed Gregory, Biſhop of Rome, of whom it is ſaid, that of the number of all the firſt Biſhops before him in the Primitive time, he was the baſeſt; of all them that came after him, he was the beſt. About which time alſo died in Wales, David, Archbiſhop firſt of Kaerleon, who then tranſlated the See from thence to Menevia, and therefore is called David of Wales. Not long after this alſo deceaſed the foreſaid Auſtin in England, after he had ſit there fifteen or ſixeeen years; by the which count we may note it, not to be true that Henry Huntington and others do witneſs, that Auſtin was dead before that Battel of Ethelfride againſt the Monks of Bangor. For if it be true that Polychronicon teſtifieth of this murther, to be done about the year of our Lord ſix hundred and nine, and the coming of Auſtin firſt into the Realm to be Anno five hundred ninety ſix, then Auſtin enduring ſixteen years, could not be dead at this Battel. Moreover Galfridus Monumetenſis declareth concerning the ſame Battel, that Ethelbert the King of Kent, being (as is ſaid) converted by Auſtin to Chriſts faith: after he ſaw the Britains to diſdain and deny their ſubjection unto Auſtin, neither would aſſiſt him with preaching to the Engliſh Nation; therefore ſtirred up he the foreſaid Ethelfride to war againſt the Britains; but that ſeemeth rather ſuſpicious than true, that he being a Chriſtian King, either could ſo much prevail with a Pagan Idolater, or elſe would attempt ſo far to commit ſuch a cruel deed; but of uncertain things I have nothing certainly to ſay, much leſs to judge.

Galfrid. Monumenſis.

About this preſent time above prefixed, which is Anno ſix hundred and ten. I read in the ſtory of Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis, the Writer of Polychronicon, of John the Patriarch of Alexandria, whom for his rare example of hoſpitality and bountifulneſs to the poor, I thought no leſs worthy to have place amongſt good men, than I ſee the ſame now to be followed of few. This John (being before belike a hard and ſparing man) { Anno 610. Polychron. lib.6. cap. 8. A ſtory of John Patriarch of Alexandria.

Mercy may live a maiden, for no man will marry her. This John was ſo bountiful in giving, that he afraid to ſtrive in a manner with the Lord, whether the Lord ſhould give more, or he ſhould diſtribute more alſmes than which was given.

as he was at his prayer, upon a time, (it is ſaid) there appeared to him a comely Vigin, having on her head a garland of Olive leaves, which named her ſelf Mercy, ſaying to him, and promiſing, that if he would take her to wife, he ſhould proſper well. This, whether it were true or not, or elſe invented for a morality; I would wiſh this flouriſhing damſel to be married to more than to this John, that ſhe ſhould not live ſo long a Virgin as now ſhe doth, becauſe no man will marry her. But to return to this Patriarch, who after that day (as the ſtory recordeth) was ſo merciful and ſo beneficial, eſpecially to the poor and needy, that he counted them as his Maſters, and himſelf as a ſervant and ſteward unto them: This Patriarch was wont commonly twice a week to ſit at his door all the day long, to take up matters, and to ſet unity where was any variance. One day it happned, as he was ſitting all the day before his gate, and ſaw no man come, he lamented, that all that day he had done no good: To whom his Deacon ſtanding by, anſwered again, that he had more cauſe to rejoyce, ſeeing he had brought the City in that order and in ſuch peace, that there needed no reconcilement amongſt them. Another time as the ſaid John the Patriarch was at ſervice, and reading the Goſpel in the Church, the people (as their uſed manner is) went out of the Church to talke and jangle: He perceiving that, went out likewiſe, and ſat amongſt them; whereat they marvelled to ſee him do ſo. My children (ſaid he) where the ſhock is, there ought the Shepheard to be: Wherefore either come you in, that I may alſo come in with you; or elſe if you tarry out, I will likewiſe tarry out together with you, &c.

The acts of Gregory the firſt.

As touching the acts and deeds of Gregory, above mentioned, how he withſtood the ambitious pride of John Patriarch of Conſtantinople, which would be the univerſal Priеſt, and only chief Biſhop of all others, declaring him to be no leſs than the forerunner of Antichriſt, that would take that name upon him: How, and with what reaſons he anſwered again the letters of the Emperor Mauricius in that behalf, ſufficient relation is made thereof in the firſt entry and beginning of this Book. This Gregory among many other things induced into the Church (the ſpecialties whereof hereafter ſhall follow, Chriſt willing, more at large) firſt began and brought in this title among the Roman Biſhops, to be called, Servus Servorum Dei: Putting them in remembrance thereby, both of their humbleneſs, and alſo of their duty in the Church of Chriſt. Moreover, as concerning his act for the ſole life of Prieſts firſt begun, and then broken again: Alſo concerning the order of Gregories maſs Book to be received in all Churches: Hereof who ſo luſteth to read more, ſhall find the ſame in other places hereafter, namely, when we come to the time of Pope Adrian the firſt.

Whereupon the Roman Biſhops uſe in their ſtile. Servus Servorum Dei.

Sabinianus Biſhop of Rome.

After the death of Gregory above mentioned, firſt came Sabinianus, who, as he was a malicious detractor of Gregory, and of his Works, ſo he continued not long, ſcarce the ſpace of two years. After whom ſucceeded next Bonifacius the third, which albeit he Reigned but one year, yet in that one year he did more hurt than Gregory with ſo much labors, and in ſo many years, could do good before. For that which Gregory kept out, he brought in, obtaining of Phocas the wicked Emperor, for him and his ſucceſſors after him, that the See of Rome above all other Churches ſhould have the preeminence, and that the Biſhop of Rome ſhould be the univerſal head of all Churches of Chriſt in Chriſtendom: Alledging for him this frivolous reaſon, that Saint Peter had and left to his ſucceſſors in Rome, the keys of binding and looſing, &c. And thus began firſt Rome to take an head above all other Churches, by the means of Bonifacе the third, who, as he lacked no boldneſs nor ambition to ſeek it, ſo neither lacked he an Emperor fit and meet to give ſuch a gift. This Emperors name was Phocas, a man of ſuch wickedneſs and ambition (moſt like to his own Biſhop Bonifacе) that to aſpire to the Empire, he murthered his own Maſter, the Emperor Mauricius and his Children. Thus Phocas coming up to be Emperor, after his deteſtable villany done, thinking to ſtabliſh his Empire with friendſhip and favour of his people, and eſpecially with the Biſhop of Rome, quickly condeſcended to all his petitions, and ſo granted him (as it is ſaid) to be that he would, the univerſal and head Biſhop over all Chriſtian Churches. But as blood commonly requireth blood again, ſo it came to paſs on the ſaid Phocas. For as he had cruelly ſlain the Lord and Emperor Mauricius before, ſo he in like manner (of Heraclius the Emperor ſucceeding him) had his hands and feet cut off, and ſo was caſt into the Sea. And thus wicked Phocas, which gave the firſt Supremacy to Rome, loſt his own. But Rome would not ſo ſoon loſe his Supremacy once given, as the giver loſt his life: For ever ſince, from that day it hath holden, defended, and maintained the ſame ſtill, and yet doth to this preſent day, by all force and policy poſſible. And thus much concerning Bonifacе, whom by the words of Gregory, we may well call the runner before Antichriſt. For as Gregory brought in their ſtile, Servus Servorum Dei; This Bonifacе brought in their heads firſt, Volumus ac mandamus, Statuimus ac præcipimus. That is: We will and command, &c.

How Rome began firſt to take an head above other Churches.

Mention was made a little before of Ethelbert King of Kent, and alſo of Ethelfrid, King of Northſaxon or Northumbria. This Ethelbert having under his ſubjection all the other Saxon Kings unto Humber, after he had firſt received himſelf, and cauſed to be received of others, the Chriſtian faith by the Preaching of Auſtin, and this Ethelbert at the prayer of the Citizens of Dorobernia tranſlated to the ſaid City: Malmesburienſis lib. de Pontific. Wherefore ſuch authors as ſay, that Paul was builded by Sigebert, ſay not amiſs, which Sigebert was the King of Eſſex, in which Province ſtandeth the City of London. This Ethelbert alſo founded the Church of Saint Andrew in the City of Dorubres in Kent, now called Rocheſter, of one Roſ, diſtant from Dorobernia four and twenty miles. Of this City Juſtus was Biſhop, ordained before by Auſtin. Moreover the forenamed Ethelbert ſtirred up a dweller of London, to make a Chapel or Church of Saint Peter in the Weſt end of London, then called Thorny, now the Town of Weſtminſter, which Church or Chapel was after by Edward the Confeſſor inlarged or new builded: Laſtly, of Henry the third it was newly again reedified and made as it is now, a large Monaſtery, &c. After theſe Chriſtian and worthy acts, this Ethelbert, when he had Reigned the courſe of fifty and ſix years, changed this mortal life about the year of our Lord, 616. whom ſome ſtories ſay to be ſlain in a fight between him and Ethelfrid King of Nortlſaxons.

In the mean time the foreſaid Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, after the cruel murther of the Monks of Bangor, eſcaped not long unto his hire: For after he had Reigned four and twenty years he was ſlain in the field of Edwin, who ſucceeded in Northumberland after him.

Blood revenged with blood.

This Edwin being the ſon, not of Ethelfrid (as Galfridus Monumetenſis ſaith) but rather Alla (as Giraldus Cambrenſis ſeemeth to witneſs more truly) was firſt a Panim or Idolater; afterward by Paulinus was Chriſtened, and the firſt Chriſtened King in Northumberland. The occaſion of which his calling or converſion, as is in ſundry ſtories contained, was this.

Edwin firſt Chriſtened King in Northumberland. Giraldus Cambrenſis.

Edwin being yet a Pagan, married the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, called Edelburga a Chriſtian woman, otherwiſe called Tace. But before this marriage, Edwin being yet young, Ethelfrid the King conceiving envy againſt him, perſecuted him ſo fore, that he was forced to flie to Redwaldus, King of Eaſtangles, as in the table of the Kings is expreſſed; The which Redwaldus what for fear, what with bribes being corrupted of Ethelfrid, at length privily had intended to have betrayed Edwin. But as Gods Will was, Edwin having warning thereof by a ſecret friend of his, was moved to flie, and to ſave himſelf, being promiſed alſo of his friends to be ſafe y conveyed away, if he would thereto agree. To whom Edwin ſaid, Whether ſhall I flie, that have ſo long ſeen the heads of mine Enemies, through all Provinces of the Realm? And if I muſt needs be ſlain, I had rather he ſhould do it, than another unworthy perſon. Thus

The order obſerved in the converſion of the Realm of Edwin to the faith of Chriſt.

The troubles of Edwin.

he remaining by himself alone and solitary, sitting in a great study, there appeared unto him suddenly a certain stranger to him unknown, and said; I know well the cause of thy thought and heaviness. What wouldst thou give him that should deliver thee out of this fear, and should reconcile King Redwald to thee again? I would give him (said Edwin) all that I ever could make. And he said again: And what if I make thee a mightier King than was any of thy Progenitors? He answered again as before. Moreover (saith he) And what if he shew thee a better kind and way of life, than ever was shewed to any of thine Ancestors before thee; wilt thou obey him and do after his counsel? Yea, (said Edwin) promising most firmly with all his heart so to do. Then he laying his hand upon his head: When (said he) this token hapneth unto thee, then remember this time of thy tribulation, and the promise which thou hast made, and the word which now I say unto thee. And with that he vanished out of his sight suddenly. After this so done, as Edwin was sitting alone by himself pensive and sad, his forefaid friend, which moved him before to flie, cometh to him, bidding him be of good cheer; For the heart (said he) of King Redwaldus, which had before intended thy destruction, is now altered through the counsel of the Queen, and is fully bent to keep his promise with you, whatsoever shall fall thereupon. To make the story short, Redwaldus the King (although Fabian following Henry Huntington, saith it was Edwin) with all convenient speed assembled an host, wherewith he suddenly coming upon Ethelfrid, gave battel unto him about the borders of Mercia, where Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, with Reiner, Redwaldus son, was slain in the field. By reason whereof Edwin (his Enemies now being destroyed) was quietly placed in the possession of Northumberland. All this while yet Edwin remained in his old Paganism, albeit his Queen (as is above declared) King Ethelberts daughter, a Christian woman, with Paulinus the Bishop, ceased not to stir and perswade the King to Christian faith. But he taking counsel with his Nobles and Counsellors upon the matter, was hard to be won. Then the Lord, who disposeth all things after his purpose to bring all good things to pass, sent another trouble upon him, by means thereof to call him: For by affliction God useth commonly to call them whom he will save, or by whom he will work salvation unto others. So his divine wisdom thinketh good to make them first to know themselves before they come to know him, or to teach him to others. So it was with Paul (who was stricken down before he was lifted up) with Constantinus, Edwinus, and many more. How long was Joseph in prison before he bare rule? How hardly escaped this our Queen now being (Queen Elizabeth) by whom notwithstanding it hath pleased God to restore this his Gospel now Preached amongst us? In what conflicts and agonies inwardly in his spirit was M. Luther, before he came to preach the justification of Christ openly? And so be all they most commonly, which come to any lively feeling or sensible working of Christ the Lord.

But to return to Edwin again. The occasion of his trouble was this. Quicelinus with Kinegilsus his brother, Kings of Westsaxons (as above is mentioned in the table of the Saxon Kings) conspiring the death of Edwin, now King of Northumberland, upon envy and malice sent upon an Easter day, a sword-man, named Emmer, privily to slay the faid Edwin. This sword-man or cut-throat, came to a City beside the water of Darwent in Derbishire, there to wait his time: And lastly, found the King (mally accompanied, and intended to have run the King thorow with a sword invenomed. But one Lilla, the Kings trusty servant, disgarnished of a shield or other weapon to defend his Master, start between the King and the sword, and was stricken thorow the body and died, and the King was wounded with the same stroke. And after he wounded also the third, which was a Knight, and so was taken, and confessed by whom he was sent to work that treason. The other Knight that was secondly wounded, died, and the King lay after long sick ere he were healed.

After this, about Whitsuntide, the King being scantly whole of his wound, assembled his host, intending to make war against the King of Westsaxons, promising to Christ to be Christened if he would give him victory over his Enemies: and in token thereof caused his daughter, born of Edelburge the same Easter day when he was wounded, named Eufled, to be Baptised, with twelve others of his family, of Paulinus. Thus Edwin proceeded to the battel against Quiceline and Kinegilsus with Kenwolcus and other Enemies, who in the same battel being all vanquished and put to flight, Edwin through the power of Christ returneth home victor. But for all this victory and other things given to him of God, as he was in wealth with the world, he forgat his promise made, and had little mind thereof, save only that he by the Preaching of Paulinus forsook his Maumetry; and for his excuse said, that he might not clearly deny his old Law, which his Forefathers had kept so long, and suddenly be Christened without authority and good advice of his counsel.

About the same season Pope Boniface the fifth sent also to the faid Edwin letters exhortatory, with sundry presents from Rome to him, and to Edelburge the Queen: But neither would that prevail. Then Paulinus seeing the King so hard to be converted, poured out his Prayers unto God for his conversion; who the same time had revealed to him by the holy Ghost, the oracle above mentioned, which was shewed to the King when he was with Redwaldus, King of the Eastangles. Whereupon Paulinus coming after to the King on a certain day, and laying his hand upon the Kings head, asked him if he knew that token. The King hearing this, and remembring well the token, was ready to fall down at his feet. But Paulinus not suffering that, did lift him up again, saying unto him: Behold, O King, you have vanquished your Enemies, you have obtained your Kingdom; now perform the third thing which you promised, that is, to receive the faith of Christ, and to be obedient to him. Whereupon the King conferring with his Counsel and his Nobles, was Baptised of Paulinus at York, with many of his other Subjects with him. In so much that Coifie, the chief of the Prelates of his old Maumetry, armed himself with his Idolatrous Bishops, and beside good Horses, which before by their old law they might not do, nor ride but only a Mare: And so destroyed all the Altars of the Maumetry, and their Temple of Idols, which was at Godmondham, not far from York. And this was in the eleventh year of his Reign.

From that time forth, during the life of Edwin, which was the term of six years more, Paulinus Christened continually in the rivers of Gwenie and Swala, in both provinces of Deira, and in Bernicia, using the faid Rivers for his Fonts, and Preached in the shire of Lincesete, where he builded also a Church of stone at Lincoln.

In this time was so great peace in the Kingdom of Edwin after his conversion, that a woman laden with Gold, might have gone from the one side of the Sea to the other, and no man molest her. Moreover by the high way sides, through all his Kingdom he caused by every Well or spring to be chained a dish or boll of brass, to take up water for the refreshing of such as went by the way, which bolls of brass there remained safe, that no man touched them during all the life of the said Edwin. Such was then the tender care and study of Christian Princes, for the refreshing of their Subjects. But that was then the brasen world, which now is grown to Iron and Lead, called Ætas ferrea, or rather Plumbea.

This Edwin who first brought in the faith, in the North parts continuing after his baptism six years, at length was slain in battel by Cedwalla, King of the Britains, and by wicked Penda, King of the Mercians, with his son Offricus also, in the field called Hatfield.

This Paulinus was the first Archbishop of York, and as he was of Justus Archbishop of Canterbury, ordained Archbishop of the See of York; so he again after the decease of Justus, ordained Honorius to be Archbishop of Canterbury.

Paulinus after the death of godly Edwin, seeing unmerciful Cedwalla or Cadwallon, with his Britains, and wicked Penda with the Idolatrous Mercians, to spoyl the land in such fort, as they made no spare neither of age, nor Sex, nor Religion, was compelled to fly with Edelburge the Queen and Eufled her daughter by water into Kent, where the faid Archbishop Paulinus, remained Bishop of Rochester, the faid space of nineteen years. And so the Church of Northumberland, lacked a Bishop for the space of thirty thirty years after. Notwithstanding he left there one James his Deacon, a good man, who continued there Baptising and Preaching in the North parts, till that peace being recovered, and the number of the faithful increasing, the Church came again to his stay. Hunting. lib. 2.

By means of this Edwin, Erpwaldus King of the Eastangles, son to Redwaldus above mentioned, was reduced to Christs faith.

After the decease of Edwin and his son Offrick, both slain in battel, Reigned Osriens and Eanfridus, the one in Deira, the other in Bernicia. Ofricus was the son of Elfricus which was brother to Ethelfrid. Eanfridus was the Eldest son of Ethelfrid; for Ethelfrid had three sons, to wit, Eanfridus, Oswaldus, and Ofricus. These two Kings of Deira and Bernicia, Osricus, and Eufrid, being first christened in Scotland, after being Kings, returned to their Idolatry: and so in the year following were slain one after the other by the forefaid Cedwalla and wicked Penda, as is in the table above expressed.

After whom succeeded in Northumberland, the second son of Ethelfrid, named Oswaldus, having rule on both the provinces, as well Deira, as Bernicia. Whereof when the forefaid Cedwalla (or Cadwallo) the Britain King had understanding, who before had made havoke of the Saxons, and thought to have rooted them utterly out of England; he kept King Penda with a mighty host of the Britains, thinking to slay also Oswald as he had before slain his brother Eufrid, and King Edwin before them. But Oswald, when he was warned of the great strength of this Cedwal and Penda, made his Prayers to God, and besought him meekly of help to withstand his Enemy, for the salvation of his people. Thus after Oswald had prayed for the saving of his people, the two hosts met in a field named Denesburg, some say Hevenfield, where was fought a strong battel. But finally, the army and power of Penda and Cedwal, which were far exceeding the number of Oswalds host, was chased, and most part slain of Oswaldus: After he reigned over the Britains two and twenty years, leaving after him a son, whom Gunfridus called Cadwaladrus, the last King of the Britains.

Of this Oswald much praise and commendation is written in Authors, for his fervent zeal in Christs Religion, and merciful pity towards the poor, with other great vertues more. As touching the miracles of S. Oswald, what it pleased the people of that time to report of him, I have not here to affirm. This I find in stories certain, that he being well and vertuously disposed, to the setting forth of Christ's faith and Doctrine, sent into Scotland for a certain Bishop there called Aidanus, which was a famous Preacher. The King at what time he was in Scotland banished, had learned the Scotish Tongue perfectly: Wherefore as this Aidanus Preached in his Scotish Tongue to the Saxons, the King himself interpreting that which he had said, disdained not to preach and expound the same unto his Nobles and Subjects in the English Tongue.

Moreover, towards the poor and needy his pity and tenderness was such, being notwithstanding of so high and princely calling, that upon a time being then Easter day, he sitting with the said Aidanus at meat, and served after the manner of Kings, in silver: There cometh to him one of the Servitors, bringing him word that there was a great multitude of poor People sitting in the street, which desired some Alms of the King. He hearing this, commandeth not only the meat prepared for his table to be carried unto them, but also taking a silver platter which stood before him, brake it in pieces and sent it amongst them, and so relieved his poor Subjects, not only with the meat of his table, but with dishes also. Aidanus the Bishop, seeing this and marvelling thereat, taketh him by the hand, wishing and praying in this wise: This hand (saith he) I pray God may continue and never putrifie. What the stories say more concerning this hand of Oswald, I intend not to meddle further than simple, true, and due probability will bear me out. In those days, and partly by the means of the said Oswald, Kingisilsus King of the Westsaxons was converted to Christs faith; especially through the godly labour of Berinus, which was sent by Pope Honorius to Preach in England, and was then made Bishop of Dorchester. Lands given to Wimbesters.

Of this Berinus, Malmesbury, Polychronicon, with divers other writers do report a thing strange and miraculous; which if it be a Fable, as no doubt it is, I cannot but marvel that so many authors so constantly agree in reporting and affirming the same: The matter is this, This Berinus being sent as is said, by Honorius to Preach in England, promiseth him to travel to the uttermost borders thereof, and there to Preach the Gospel, where the name of Christ was never heard: Thus he setting forward in his journey, passeth through France, and so to the Sea side; where he found a passage ready, and the wind served so fair, that he was called upon in such haste, that he had no leasure to remember himself to take all things with him which he had to carry: At length he was on the sea saying and almost in the middle course of his passage, he remembred himself of a certain relick left behind him for haste, which Honorius had given him at his coming out. Malmesburiensis calleth it Corporalia, Historia Tornalensis calleth it Pallulam super quam corpus Christi confecratur, which we call a Corporas or such a like thing, and what else inclosed within it I cannot tell. Here Berinus in great sorrow could not tell what to do: If he should have spoken to the heathen Mariners to turn their course back again, they would have mocked him, and it had been in vain. Wherefore as the stories write, he boldly stepped into the Sea, and walking on foot back again, taketh with him that which was left behind, and so returneth to his company again, having not one thred of his garments wet. Of his miracle, or whether I should call it a fable rather, let the Reader judge as he thinketh; because it is not written in the Scripture, we are not bound to believe it. But if it were true, it is then thought to be wrought of God, not for any holiness in the Man or in the Corporas, but a special gift for the conversion of the Heathen, for whose salvation God suffereth oft many wonders to be done. This Berinus, being received in the ship again with a great admiration of the Mariners, who were therewith converted and baptised, was driven at last by the weather to the coast of the Westsaxons, where Kinigilsus and his brother Quicelinus above mentioned did reign. Which two Kings the same time by the Preaching of Berinus were converted and made Christian men, with the people of the Country, being before rude and barbarous. It happened the same time when the forefaid Kings should be Christened, that Oswaldus (mentioned a little before) King of Northumberland, was then present, and the same day married Kinigilsus his daughter, and also was Godfather to the King.

Thus Oswald after he had Reigned nine years in such holiness and perfectness of life, as is above specified, was slain at length in the field called Marfield by wicked Penda, King of the Mercians: Which Penda at length after all his Tyranny was overcome and slain by Oswy brother to Oswald next King after Oswald of Northumberland, notwithstanding he had thrice the people which Osuy had. This Penda being a Panim, had three sons. Wolferus, Weda, and Egfridus. To the second son Weda, Osuy had before time married his daughter, by consent of Penda his Father: The which Weda by help of Osuy was made King of Southmercia, the which Lordship is severed from Northmercia by the River of Trent. The same Weda moreover, at what time he married the daughter of Osuy, promised to him that he would become a Christian man: Which thing he performed after the death of Penda his father; but afterward within three years of his Reign, he was by reason of his wife slain. And after him the Kingdom fell to Wolferus the other brother; who being wedded to Ermenilda daughter of Ercombert King of Kent, was shortly after christened; so that he is counted the first christened King of Mercia. This Wolferus conquered Kenwalcus King of Kent, and got the Isle of Wight, which after he gave to Sigbert King of the Eastangles, upon condition he would be christened. And thus the Eastangles which as before had expulsed Melitus their Bishop, as is declared, recovered again the Christian faith under Sigbert their

But to return again to Oſwy, from whom we have a little digreſſed, of whom we ſhewed before how he ſucceeded after Oſwald in the Province of Bernicia, to whom alſo was joyned Oſwine his Coſin over the Province of Deira, and there, with his fellow Oſwy Reigned the ſpace of ſeven years. This Oſwine was gentle and liberal to his people, and no leſs devout toward God: Who upon a time had given to Aidanus the Biſhop above mentioned, a princely Horſe with the Trappers, and all that appertained thereto, becauſe he ſhould not ſo much travel on foot, but ſometimes eaſe himſelf withal. Thus Aidanus the Scotiſh Biſhop as he was riding upon his highe Horſe, by the way meeteth him a certain poor man, asking and craving his charity. Aidanus having nothing elſe to give him, lighted down and giveth to him his Horſe trapped and garniſhed as he was. The King underſtanding this, and not contented therewith, as he was entring to dinner with the faid Aidanus: What meant you Father Biſhop (ſaid he) to give away my Horſe I gave you, unto the begger? Had not I other Horſes in my ſtable that might have ſerved him well enough, but you muſt give away that which of purpoſe was picked out for you amongſt the chieveſt? To whom the Biſhop made anſwer again, ſaying, or rather rebuking the King: What be theſe words (O King ſaith he) that you ſpeak? Why ſee you more price by an Horſe, which is but the ſole of an Horſe, than you do by him which is the ſon of Mare, yea, which is the ſon of God? He ſaid but this, when the King forthwith ungirding his ſword from about him (as he was then newly come in from Hunting) falleth down at the feet of the Biſhop, deſiring him to forgive him that, and he would never after ſpeak word to him for any treaſure he ſhould afterward give away of his. The Biſhop ſeeing the King ſo meekly affected, he then taking him up, and chearing him again with words, began ſhortly after to weep and to be very heavy. His Miniſter asking the cauſe thereof, Aidanus anſwered in his Scotiſh Language, ſaying to him: I weep (ſaith he) For that this King cannot live long. This people is not worthy to have ſuch a Prince, as he is to Reign amongſt them. And ſo as Aidanus ſaid, it came to paſs. For not long after Oſwy the King of Bernicia diſdaining at him, when Oſwine either was not able, or not willing to joyn with him in battel, cauſed him Trayterouſly to be ſlain. In the time of this Oſwy King of Northumberland, was a certain man named Benedict, who was the bringer up of Bede from his youth, and took him to his inſtitution when he was but ſeven years old, and ſo taught him during his life. This Benedict or Benet, deſcending of a noble ſtock and rich kin, and in good favour with Oſwy, forſook ſervice, houſe, and all his kindred to ſerve Chriſt, and went to Rome (where he had been in his life time five times) and brought from thence Books into Monaſteries, with other things which he thought then to ſerve for devotion. This Benedict, ſurnamed Biſhop, was the firſt that brought in the Art and uſe of glaſing into this Land; for before that, Glaſs-windows were not known either in Churches or in Houſes.

Alſo Aidanus, Finianus, and Colmannus, with three Scotiſh Biſhops of Northumberland holy Men, held with the Britains againſt the Romiſh order for the keeping of Eaſter day. Moreover Cuthbertus, Jarumannus, Cedda, and Wilfridius lived the ſame time: Whom as I judge to be Biſhops of holy converſation, ſo I thought it ſufficient here only to name them. As touching their miracles wherefore they were made Saints in the Popes Kalender, ſeeing they are not written in the Goſpel, nor in my Creed, but in certain old Chronicles of that age, ſo they are no matter of my Faith: Notwithſtanding as touching their converſation, this I read, and alſo do credit, that the Clergy both of Britain and England, at that time pliſd nothing that was worldly, but gave themſelves to Preaching and Teaching the Word of our Saviour, and followed the life that they Preached by giving of good example. And over that, as our Hiſtories accord, they were to voyd of covetouſneſs, that they received no poſſeſſions or territories which were forced upon them.

About this ſeaſon or not much before, under the Reign of Oſwy and Oſwine Kings of Northumberland, another Synod or Council was holden againſt the Britains and the Scotiſh Biſhops, for the right obſerving of Saſter at Sternhalt. At what time Agilbertus Biſhop Weſt-Saxons came to Northumberland, to inſtitute Wilfrid Abbat of Ripon, where this queſtion for Eaſter day began to be moved: For Colman, then Biſhop of Northumberland, followed not the coſtom of Rome, nor of the Saxons, but followed the Britains and the Scotiſh Biſhops, his Predeceſſors in the ſame See before. Thus on the one ſide was Colman the Archbiſhop of York, and Hilda the Abbeſs of Sternhalt, which alleadged for them the doings and examples of their Predeceſſors, both godly and reverend Biſhops, as Aidanus, Finianus, Archbiſhops of that See of York before them, and divers more, who had uſed always to celebrate the Eaſter from the fourteenth day of the firſt month, till the eight and twentieth of the ſame. Controverſie about Eaſter day.

The queſtion of Eaſter and of ſhaving, and other eccleſiaſtical matters being moved, it was determined, that in the Abbey which is called Sternhalt, of the which Hilda a devout woman was Abbeſs, a Convocation ſhould be had, and this queſtion there determined. To the which place came both the Kings, the Father and the Son, Biſhop Colman with his Clergy of Scotland, Agilbert, with Agathon and Wilfrid Prieſts. James and Roman were on their ſides; Hilda the Abbeſs with her company was on the Scotiſh part, and the reverend Biſhop Cedda was appointed Prolocutor for both parties in that Parliament. King Oſwy began firſt with an Oration, declaring that it was neceſſary for ſuch as ſerved one God, to live in one uniform order, and that ſuch as looked for one Kingdom in Heaven, ſhould not ſuffer in celebration of the heavenly Sacraments, but ſhould rather ſeek for the true Tradition, and follow the ſame. This ſaid, he commanded his Biſhop Colman to declare what the rite and cuſtom was in this behalf that he uſed, and from whence it had the original. Then Colman, obeying his Princes commandment, ſaid: The Eaſter which I obſerve, I received of my Anceſtors that ſent me hither a Biſhop, the which all our Forefathers, being men of God, did celebrate in like manner: And leſt it ſhould be contemned or deſpiſed of any man, it is manifeſtly apparent to be the very ſame which the holy Evangeliſt S. John (a Diſciple eſpecially beloved of the Lord) did accuſtomably uſe in all Churches and Congregations where he had authority. When Colman had ſpoken many things to this effect, the King commanded Agilbert to declare his opinion in this behalf, and to ſhew the order that he then uſed, from whence it came, and by what authority he obſerved the ſame. Agilbert requeſted the King that his Scholar Wilfrid a Prieſt might ſpeak for him, in as much as they both with the reſt of his Clergy were of one opinion herein, and that the ſaid Wilfrid could utter his mind better, and more plainly in the Engliſh Tongue, than he himſelf could. Then Wilfrid at the Kings commandment began on this ſort, and ſaid: The Eaſter which we keep, we have ſeen at Rome, whereas the holy Apoſtles, Peter and Paul, did live and teach, did ſuffer and were buried. The ſame alſo is uſed in Italy and in France; The which Countries we have travelled for Learning, and have noted it to be celebrated of them all. In Aſia alſo and in Africk, in Egypt and in Greece, and finally in all the world, the ſame manner of Eaſter is obſerved that we uſe, ſave only by theſe here preſent with their accomplices, the Picts and the Britains: With the which two (and yet not altogether agreeing) they condeſcend and ſtrive fooliſhly in this order againſt the univerſal World. To whom Colman replied, ſaying: I marvel you will call this order fooliſh, that ſo great an Apoſtle as was worthy to lie in the Lords lap, did did uſe, whom all the World doth well know, to have lived moſt wiſely. And Wilfrid anſwered, God forbid that I ſhould reprove S. John of his Folly, who kept the rites of Moſes Law, according to the letter (the Church being yet Jewiſh in many points) and the Apoſtles not as yet able to abdicate all the obſervations of the law before ordained. As for example, they could not reject Images invented of the Devil, the which all men that believe on Chriſt, ought of neceſſity to forſake and deteſt, leſt they ſhould be an offence to thoſe Jews that were amongſt the Gentiles. For this cauſe did S. Paul circumciſe Timothy, for this cauſe did he ſacrifice in the Temple, and did ſhave his head with Aquila and Priſcilla, at Corinth: All which things were done to none other purpoſe, than to eſchew the offence of the Jews. Hereupon alſo ſaid James to Paul, Thou ſeeſt Brother, how many thouſand Jews do believe, and all theſe be Zealous (notwithſtanding) of the law. Yet ſeeing the Goſpel is ſo manifeſtly Preached in the World, it is not lawful for the faithful to be Circumciſed, neither to offer ſacrifice of carnal things to God. Therefore John according to the cuſtom of the Law, the fourteenth day of the firſt month at even-ing, did begin the Celebration of the Feaſt of Eaſter, nothing reſpecting whether it were celebrated in the Sabbath, or in any other Ferial day. But Peter when he Preached at Rome, remembring that the Lord did ariſe from death on the firſt day after the Sabbath, giving thereby an hope to the world of the Reſurrection, thought good to obſtitute Eaſter on that day, and not after the uſe and precepts of the law (that was) the fourteenth day of the firſt month: Even ſo John looking for the Moon at night, if it did ariſe, and the next day after were Sunday, which then was called the Sabbath, then did he celebrate the Eaſter of the Lord in the evening, like as we uſe to do even at this day. But if Sunday were not the next day after the fourteenth day, but fell on the ſixteenth day, or ſeventeenth, or on any other day unto the one and twentieth, he tarried always for it, and did begin the holy Solemnity of Eaſter on the evening next before the Sabbath. And ſo it came to paſs, that Eaſter was always kept on the Sunday, and was not celebrated but from the fifteenth day unto the one and twentieth: Neither doth this tradition of the Apoſtle break the Law, but fulfil the ſame. In the which it is to be noted, that Eaſter was inſtituted from the fourteenth day of the firſt month at evening, unto the one and twentieth day of the ſame month at evening; the which manner all S. Johns ſucceſſors in Aſia after his death did follow, and the Catholick Church throughout the whole World. And that this is the true Eaſter, and only of all Chriſtians to be obſerved, it was not newly decreed, but confirmed by the Council of Nice, as appeareth by the eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. Whereupon it is manifeſt that you (Colman) do neither follow the example of S. John, as ye think, nor of S. Peter, whoſe tradition you do willingly reſiſt, nor of the Church, nor yet of the Goſpel, in the celebration of Eaſter. For S. John, obſerving Eaſter according to the Precepts of the Law, kept it not on the firſt day after the Sabbath; but you preciſely keep it only on the firſt day after the Sabbath. Peter did celebrate Eaſter from the fifteenth day of the Moon to the one and twentieth day, but you keep Eaſter from the fourteenth unto the twentieth day; ſo that you begin Eaſter oftentimes the thirteenth day at night, of which manner neither the Law nor the Goſpel maketh any mention. But the Lord in the fourteenth day, either did eat the old Paſſover at night, or elſe did celebrate the Sacraments of the New Teſtament, in the remembrance of his death and paſſion. You do alſo utterly reject from the celebration of Eaſter, the one and twentieth day, the which the Law hath chiefly willed to be obſerved: And therefore as I ſaid, in the keeping of Eaſter, you neither agree with S. John, nor with Peter, nor with the Law, nor yet with the Goſpel. Then Colman again anſwered to theſe things, ſaying: Did then Anatholius a godly man, and one much commended in the foreſaid eccleſiaſtical ſtory, againſt the Law and the Goſpel, who writeth that the Eaſter was to be kept from the fourteenth day unto the twentieth? Or ſhall we think that Columba, our reverend Father and his ſucceſſors, being men of God, who obſerved the Eaſter after this manner, did againſt the holy Scripture? Whereas ſome of them were men of ſuch godlineſs and vertue, as was declared by their wonderful miracles. (And I hereby nothing doubting of their holineſs) do endevour to follow their life, order and diſcipline. Then ſaid Wilfrid: It is certain that Anatholius was both a godly man, and worthy of great commendation; but what have you to do with him ſeeing you obſerve not his Order? For he following the true rule in keeping his Eaſter, obſerveth the circle of nineteen years; the which either you know not, or if you do, you condemn the common order obſerved in the univerſal Church of Chriſt. And moreover, the ſaid Anatholius doth ſo count the fourteenth day, in the obſervation of Eaſter, as he confeſſeth the ſame to be the fifteenth day at night, after the manner of the Egyptians, and likewiſe noteth the twentieth day, to be in the feaſt of Eaſter, the one and twentieth in the evening: The which diſtinction that you know not, by this may appear, for that you keep the Eaſter, on the thirteenth day before the full Moon. Or otherwiſe I can anſwer you touching your Father Columba and his ſucceſſors, whoſe Order you ſay you follow, moved thereto by their miracles, on this wiſe, that the Lord will anſwer to many that ſhall ſay in the day of Judgment, that in his name they have prophefied and caſt out Divels, and have done many Miracles, &c. That he never knew them. But God forbid that I ſhould ſay ſo of your Fathers, becauſe it is much better to believe well of thoſe we know not, than ill. Whereupon I deny not that they were the ſervants of God, and holy Men, which loved the Lord of a good intent, though of a rude ſimplicity: And I think that the Order which they uſed in the Eaſter, did not much hurt them, ſo long as they had none amongſt them that could ſhew them the right obſervation of the ſame for them to follow. For I think, if the truth had been declared unto them, they would as well have received it in this matter as they did in others. But you and your Fellows, if you refuſe the Order of the Apoſtolical See, or rather, of the univerſal Church, which is confirmed by the holy Scripture; without all doubt you do ſin. And though your Forefathers were holy Men, what is their fewneſs, being but a corner of an Iſland, to be preferred before the univerſal Church, of Jeſus Chriſt, diſperſed throughout the whole World? And if Columba your Father (and ours alſo, being of Chriſt Jeſus) were mighty in miracles, is he therefore to be preferred before the Prince of the holy Apoſtles? To whom the Lord ſaid, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church, and the gates of Hell ſhall not prevail againſt it, and I will give thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Wilfrid refelleth.

The King concludeth.

Wilfrid having thus ended his argument, the King ſaid to Colman: Is it true that the Lord ſpake theſe things to S. Peter? And Colman anſwered, Yea. Then ſaid the King, Can you declare any thing that the Lord gave to Colman? Colman anſwered, No. Then quoth the King, Do both of you agree and conſent in this matter without any controverſie, that theſe words were principally ſpoken to Peter, and that the Lord gave him the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven? And they both anſwered, Yea. Then concluded the King on this wiſe, For ſo much as S. Peter is the Door-keeper of Heaven, I will not gainſay him; But in that I am able, I will obey his Orders in every point, leſt when I come to the gates of Heaven, he ſhut them againſt Me.

The authority of men is not to be ſticked unto for their doing of miracles.

Upon this ſimple and rude reaſon of the King, the multitude eſtſoons conſented, and with them alſo Cedda was contented to give over, only Colman the Scot, being then Archbiſhop of York, in diſpleaſure left the Realm, and departed into Scotland, carrying with him the bones of Aidanus. Bed. lib. 3. cap. 25. And thus much concerning this matter of Eaſter.

After the deceaſe of Oſwy, Egfrid his Son was King after him in Northumberland fifteen years. By this Egfrid Cuthbert was promoted to the Biſhoprick of the See of Farne: And Wilfrid which before had been Archbiſhop of York, was diſplaced through the means of Theodore Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Cedda poſſeſſed that See. Wilfrid, when he was put out, went to Rome, and complained of him to Agathon the Biſhop, and was well allowed in ſome things. But the King and Theodorus had there ſuch Proctors and Friends, that he returned without ſpeeding of his cauſe. Wherefore he returned into the South-Saxons, and builded an Abbey in Siſeſie, and Preached unto the South-Saxons, fifteen years. The King of the South-Saxons at that time was Ethelwold, to whom we declared a little before that Wolferus King of the Mercians gave the Ile of Wight upon condition that he would be Christened, and so was baptized by Berinus: the said Wolferus being his Godfather, and Son in Law, both in one day. Wherefore Wolferus now being licenfed by Ethelwold the King, preached unto his Nobles and people of South-Sax, and converted them to Christ. In the mean time of whose baptiling, the rain which before they lacked three years together, was given them plentifully, whereby their great Famine flacked, and the Country was made fruitful, which before was dried up with barrenneſs: insomuch that (as in ſome ſtories it is ſaid) the people perured with Famine, would go forty together upon the Rocks by the Sea-ide, and taking hands together would throw themſelves down to the Sea. Moreover, where they lacked before the Art of Filhing, the forefaid Wilfride taught them how with Nets to fiſh.

Aſtrid King of Northumberland.

After Egfride, who was ſlain in the ſtraits of Scotland, next ſucceeded Alfride his Brother, and Baſtard Son to Oſwy, and reigned eighteen or nineteen years in Northumberland. This Alfride reſtored again the foreſaid Wilfride to the See of York, whom his Brother had before expelled, and put in Cedda. Notwithſtanding the ſame King within five years after, expulſed the ſaid Wilfride again, and ſo went he to Rome. But at length by Oſrick his Succeſſor was placed again the Archbiſhop of York, and Cedda was ordained by Theodorus Biſhop of Mercia. The which Province of Mercia, the ſaid Theodorus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by the Authority of the Synod holden at Hatfield, did after divide into five Biſhopricks: that is, one to Cheſter, the ſecond to Worceſter, the third to Lichfield, the fourth to Cederna in Lindſey, the fifth to Dorcheſter, which was after tranſlated to Lincoln.

Wilfride reſtored again to the See of York.

Mercia divided into five Biſhopricks.

Near about this time in the year of our Lord, 666. the deteſtable Sect of Mahumet began to take ſtrength and place. Although Polychronicon differing a little in years, accounteth the beginning of this Sect ſomewhat before, but the moſt diligent Searchers of them which write now, refer it to this year, which well agreeth with the number of that Beaſt, ſignified in the Apocalypſe, χξ∈ that is, 666. Of this Mahumet came the Kingdom of Agarens (whom he after named Saracens) to whom he gave ſundry Laws, patched of many Sects and Religions together: he taught them to pray ever to the South; and as we keep the Sunday, ſo they keep the Friday, which they call the day of Venus. He permitted them to have as many Wives as they were able to maintain; to have as many Concubines as they liſt; to abſtain from the uſe of Wine, except on certain ſolemn days in the year; to have and worſhip only one God Omnipotent, ſaying that Moſes and the Prophets were great men, but Chriſt was greater, and greateſt of all the Prophets, as being born of the Virgin Mary by the Power of God without mans ſeed, and at laſt was taken up to Heaven, but was not ſlain, but another in his likeneſs for him, with many other wicked Blaſphemies in his Law contained. At length this Kingdom of the Saracens began to be conquered of the Turks, and in proceſs of time wholly ſubdued to them.

Anno 666.

Ex Polycron. & Vincile Cambrenſi. Ex Stephano Conqueranſi.

But now to return again to the time of our Engliſh Saxons: In this mean ſeaſon Theodorus was ſent from Italy into England, by Vitellianus the Pope, to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and with him divers other Monks of Italy, to ſet up here in England Latine Service, Maſſes, Ceremonies, Letanies, with ſuch other Romiſh ware, &c. This Theodorus being made Archbiſhop and Metropolitan of Canterbury, began to play the Rex, placing and diſplacing the Biſhops at his pleaſure. As for Cedda and Wilfride Archbiſhops of York, he thruſt them both out, under the pretence that they were not lawfully conſecrated, notwithſtanding they were ſufficiently authorized by their Kings, and were placed againſt their wills. Wherefore Wilfride, as is before touched, went up to Rome, but could have no redreſs of his Cauſe. Yet to ſhew what modeſty this Wilfride uſed againſt his Enemy being ſo violently moleſted as he was, becauſe the words of his complaint are expreſſed in William Malmeſbury, I thought here to expreſs the ſame both for the commendation of the party, and alſo for the good Example of others, in caſe any ſuch be, whom good Examples will move to well-doing.

Theodorus Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

This Wilfride therefore, having ſuch injury and violence offered unto him by the hands of Theodore, although he had juſt cauſe to do his uttermoſt; yet in proſecuting his Complaint how he tempered himſelf, what words of modeſty he uſed, rather to defend his Innocency, than to impugne his Adverſary, by this his ſuggeſtion offered up to the Biſhop of Rome, may appear, whoſe words in effect were theſe, Quid autem acciderit, ut Theodorus ſanctiſſ. Archiepiſcopus (me ſuperſtite in ſede, quam licet indignus diſponſabam) abſque conſenſu cujuſlibet Epiſcopi ex ſua auctoritate (mea humilitate non acquieſcente) ordinaverit tres Epiſcopos: omittere magis quam urgere, pro ejuſdem viri reverentia, conducit. Quem quidem, pro eo quod ab hac Apoſtolicæ ſedis ſummitate directius aſſ. accuſare non audeo, &c. In Engliſh: How it chanceth that Theodorus the moſt holy and reverend Archbiſhop (my ſelf being alive in the See, which I thought unworthy did rule and diſpoſe) hath of his own Authority without the conſent of any Biſhop (neither having any ſimple voice agreeing to the ſame) ordained three Biſhops, I had rather paſs over in ſilence, than to ſtir any further therein, becauſe of the reverence of that man, and no leſs thought I it my duty ſo to do. The which man for that he hath been directed by the See Apoſtolical, I will not, nor dare not here accuſe, &c. Thus the cauſe of the faid Wilfride albeit it was ſufficiently known in the Court of Rome, to be well allowed for juſt and innocent; yet it was not then redreſſed. In ſuch elimination was this Theodorus then among the Romans. Upon this Controverſie of theſe two Biſhops I may well here infer the words of William Malmeſbury, not unworthy in my mind to be noted, which be theſe in his Latine ſtory, Ubi videri & doleri poteſt humana miſeria, quod videlicet quantumlibet quis ſanctitate polleat, non ad plenum perviacaces mores exuat, &c. That is, In the which Theodore (ſaith he) the weak and miſerable infirmity of man be ſeen and alſo lamented; conſidering, that although a man be never ſo holy, yet in the ſame man is found ſomething, whereby it may be perceived that he hath not utterly put off all his ſtubborn conditions, &c.

In the in this Theodorus, and by the means of him, in Provincial Synod was holden at Thetford, mentioned in the ſtory of Beda: the Principal Contents whereof were theſe:

Anno 680.

First, That Eaſter-day ſhould be uniformly kept and obſerved through the whole Realm, upon one certain day, videlicet prima, 14. Luna menſis primi. 1.

Secondly, That no Biſhop ſhould intermeddle within the Dioceſs of another. 2.

Thirdly, That Monaſteries conſecrated unto God ſhould be exempt and free from the Juriſdiction of the Biſhops. 3.

Fourthly, That the Monks ſhould not ſtray from one place (that is) from one Monaſtery to another, without the licence of their Abbot: alſo to keep the ſame Obedience which they promiſed at their firſt entring. 4.

Fifthly, That no Clergy-man ſhould forſake his own Biſhop, and be received in any other place, without Letters Commendatory of his own Biſhop. 5.

Sixthly, That foreign Biſhops and Clergy-men coming into the Realm, ſhould be content only with the benefit of ſuch Hoſpitality, as ſhould be offered them: neither ſhould intermeddle any further within the Precinct of any Biſhop, without his ſpecial permiſſion. 6.

Seventhly, That Synods Provincial ſhould be kept within the Realm at leaſt once a year. 7.

Eighthly, That no Biſhop ſhould prefer himſelf before another, but muſt obſerve the time and order of his Conſecration. 8.

Ninethly, That the number of Biſhops ſhould be augmented, as the number of the people increaſeth, 9.

Tenthly, That no Marriage ſhould be admitted, but that which was lawful; no Inceſt to be ſuffered; neither any man to put away his Wife for any cauſe, except only for Fornication, after the rule of the Goſpel. And theſe be the principal Chapters of that Synod, &c.

In the next year following was the ſixth general Council kept at Conſtance, whereat this Theodore was alſo preſent under Pope Agatho: where marriage was permitted to Greek Prieſts, and forbidden to the Latine. In this Council the Latine Maſs was firſt openly ſaid by John Portuenſis, the Popes Legat, before the Patriarch and Princes at Conſtantinople, in the Temple of Saint Sophie.

After the deceaſe of Alfride King of Northumberland (from whom it was digreſſed) ſucceeded his Son Oſwulfus, reigning eleven years, after whom reigned Kenreder two years, and next Oſcrius after him eleven years.

Anno 705.

Oſwulfus, Kenredus, Oſcrius Kings of Northumberland. The Kingdom of Britain deſcribed. Iſle of Ieta, or Ima King of Weſt-Saxons. Polychron. lib. 5. cap 21.

In the time and reign of theſe four Kings of Northumberland, King Ina or Inas reigned in Weſt-Sax, who ſucceeding after Cadwallader, the laſt King of Britains, began his Reign about the year of our Lord, 689. and reigned with great valiantneſs over the Weſt-Saxons the term of 37 years. Concerning whoſe Acts and Wars maintained againſt the Kentiſh-Saxons and other Kings, becauſe I have not to intermeddle withall, I refer the Reader to other Chroniclers.

About the ſixth year of the Reign of this Ina, or Ive, Polychronicon and others make mention of one Cuthlacus, whom they call S. Cutblake a Confeſſor, who about the four and twentieth year of his age, renouncing the Pomp of the World, profeſſed himſelf a Monk in the Abbey of Repingdon, and the third year after went to Crowland, where he led the life of an Anchorite. In the which Ile and place of his burying was builded a fair Abbey, called afterward for the great reſort and gentle entertainment of Strangers, Crowland the courteous. But why this Cuthlake ſhould be ſainted for his doings, I ſee no great cauſe: as neither do I think the fabulous Miracles reported of him to be true: as where the vulgar people are made to believe, that he incloſed the Devil in a boyling-Pot, and cauſed wicked Spirits to erect up houſes, with ſuch other Fables and lying Miracles. Among which lying Miracles alſo may be reckoned that which the ſtories mention in the eleventh year of the Reign of Iva, to be done of one Brithwold or Brithelme, who, being dead a long ſeaſon, was reſtored to life again, and told many wonders of ſtrange things that he had ſeen, cauſing thereby great Alms and deeds of Charity to be done of the people: and ſo he, diſpoling of his goods given in three parts, went to the Abbey of Malmes, where he continued the reſt of his life.

Moreover, about the ſixteenth year of the ſaid Iva, Ethelbred King of Mercia, after he had there reigned thirty years, was made a Monk, and after Abbot of Bardney.

King Ethelred made Abbot of Bardney.

Adelmus.

And about the eighteenth year of the Reign of Ive, died the worthy and learned Biſhop Adelmus, firſt Abbot of Malmeſbury, afterwards Biſhop of Schirborne, of whom William Malmeſbury writeth plenteouſly with great commendation, and that not unworthily, as I ſuppoſe: eſpecially for the noble praiſe of Learning and Vertue in him above the reſt of that time (next after Beda) as the great number of Books and Epiſtles, with Poems by him ſet forth, will declare. Although concerning the Miracles which the ſaid Author aſcribeth to him; as firſt in cauling an Infant of nine days old to ſpeak at Rome, to declare Pope Sergius, which was then ſuſpected the Father of the ſaid Child; alſo in hanging his Caſule upon the Sunbeams: Item, in making whole the Altar-ſtone of marble brought from Rome: Item, in drawing a length one of the Timber pieces, which went to the building of the Temple in Malmesbury: Item, in ſaving the Mariners at Dover, &c. As concerning theſe and ſuch other Miracles, which William Malmeſbury to him attributeth, I cannot conſent to him therein: but think rather the ſame to be Monkiſh devices, forged upon their Patrons to maintain the dignity of their houſes. And as the Author was deceived (no doubt) in believing ſuch Fables himſelf, ſo may he likewiſe deceive us through the dexterity of his ſtile and fine handling of the matter; but that further experience hath taught the World now adays more wiſdom, in not believing ſuch practiſes. This Adelmus was Biſhop of Schirborne, which See after was united to the See of Winton. In which Church of Winchester the like Miracles alſo are to be read of Biſhop Adelwold and S. Swithine, whom they have canonized likewiſe for a Saint.

Moreover, near about the five and twentieth of Ive, by the Report of Beda, Saint John of Beverly, which was then Biſhop of York, died, and was buried at the Porch of the Minſter of Deirwood or Beverley. In the which Porch it is recorded in ſome Chronicles, that as the ſaid John upon a time was praying, being in the Porch of Saint Michael in York, the Holy Ghoſt in the ſimilitude of a Dove fate before him upon the Altar in brightneſs ſhining above the Sun. This brightneſs being ſeen of others, firſt cometh one of his Deacons running unto the Porch, who beholding the Biſhop there ſtanding in his Prayers, and all the place replenished with the Holy Ghoſt, was ſtricken with the light thereof, having all his face burnt, as it were, with hot burning fire. Notwithſtanding the Biſhop by and by cured the face of his Deacon again, charging them (as the ſtory ſaith) not to publiſh what he had ſeen during his life time, &c. Which tale ſeemeth as true as that we read about the ſame time done of S. Egwine, in Polychron, Abbot of Eſſham and Biſhop of Worceſter (then called Wilts) who upon a time when he had fettered both his feet in Irons fait locked for certain ſins done in his youth, and had caſt the Key thereof into the Sea, afterward a Fiſh brought the Key again into the Ship, as he was ſailing homeward from Rome.

Another lyke fable of S. Egwine.

Ranulphus in Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 23.

But to leave theſe Monkiſh Phantaſies, and return to the right courſe again of the ſtory: In the time of this foreſaid Ive, began firſt the right Obſervation of Eaſter-day to be kept of the Picts and of the Britains. In the obſervation of which day (as is largely ſet forth in Beda and Polychronicon, lib. 5. cap. 17. & 22.) three things are neceſſary to be, obſerved: Firſt, the full Moon of the firſt month, that is, of the month of March. Secondly, the Dominical letter. Thirdly, the Equinoctial day, which Equinoctial was wont to be counted in the Eaſt Church, and eſpecially among the Egyptians, to be about the ſeventeenth day of March. So that the full Moon on the Equinoctial day, or after the Equinoctial day being obſerved, the next Dominical day following that full Moon, is to be taken for Eaſter-day. Wherein are diligently to be noted two things: Firſt, the fulneſs of the Moon muſt be perfectly full, ſo that it be the beginning of the third week of the Moon, which is the fourteenth or fifteenth day of the Moon. Secondly, it is to be noted, that the ſaid perfect fulneſs of the Moon, beginning the third week, muſt happen either in the very evening of the Equinoctial day, or after the Equinoctial day: for elſe if it happen either on the Equinoctial day before the evening, or before the Equinoctial day, then it belongeth to the laſt month of the laſt year, and not to the firſt month of the firſt year, and ſo ſerveth not to be obſerved.

This rite and uſage in keeping Eaſter-day being received in the Latine Church, began now to take place among the Picts and Britains, through the buſie travel of Theodorus Cuthlacus, but namely of Elbert the holy Monk, as they term him, and of Colfrid Abbot of Sirwin in Northumberland, which wrote to Naracanus, or Naitonus the King of Picts, concerning the ſame: who alſo among other things writeth of the ſhaven Crowns of Prieſts, ſaying, that it was as neceſſary for the vow of a Monk, the degree of a Prieſt, to have a ſhaven Crown for reſtraint of their luſt; as for any Chriſtian man to bleſs him againſt Spirits, when they come upon him, Beda lib. 5. Why Prieſts Crown were ſhaven Beda de geſt. lib. 5.

Of the ſhaving of Prieſts, out of the fifth Book of Beda, the 21. Chapter.

Concerning the ſhaving of Prieſts (whereof you writ alſo unto me) I exhort you that it be decently obſerved according to the Chriſtian Faith. We are not ignorant that the Apoſtles were not all ſhaven after one manner, neither doth the Catholick Church at this day agree in one uniform manner of ſhaving, as they do in Faith, Hope and Charity. Let us conſider the former time of the Patriarchs, and we ſhall find that Job (an example of Patience) even in the very point of his Afflictions, did ſhave his head: and he proveth alſo, that in the time of his Proſperity, he uſed to let his hair grow. And Joſeph an excellent excellent Doctor and Executor of Chastity, Humility, Piety, and other Vertues, when he was delivered out of prison and servitude, was shaven: whereby it appeareth, that whilst he abode in prison he was unshaven. Behold both those, being men of God, did use an order in the habit of body one contrary to the other, whose Consciences notwithstanding within did well agree in the like Grace of Vertues. But to speak truly and freely, the difference of shaving hurteth not such as have a pure Faith in the Lord, and sincere Charity towards their Neighbour: especially for that there was never any Controversie amongst the Catholick Fathers about the diversity thereof, as there hath been of the difference of the Celebration of Easter and of Faith. But of all these shavings that we find, either in the Church or else-where, there is none in mine opinion so much to be followed and imbraced, as that which he used on his head, to whom the Lord said, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church, and the Gates of Hell shall not prevail against it, and I will give thee the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. And contrariwise there is no shaving so much to be abhorred and detested, as that which he used, to whom the same S. Peter said, Thy money be with thee to thy destruction, because thou thinkest to possess the Gift of God by thy money, therefore thy part and lot is not in this word. Neither ought we to be shaven on the crown only, because S. Peter was so shaven, but because Peter was so shaven in remembrance of the Lords Passion: therefore we that desire by the same Passion to be saved, must wear the sign of the same Passion with him upon the top of our head, which is the highest part of our body. For as every Church, that is made a Church by the death of the Saviour, doth use to bear the sign of the holy Cross in the front, that it may the better by the defect of that Banner, be kept from the invasions of evil Spirits; and by the often admonition thereof is taught to crucifie the flesh with the concupiscence of the same: in like manner it behoveth such as have the vows of Monks, and degrees of the Clergy, to bind themselves with a visible bit of continency for the Lords sake. And as the Lord have a Crown of Thornes on his head in his Passion, whereby he took and carried away from us the thorns and pricks of our sins: so must every one of us by shaving our heads, patiently bear, and willingly suffer the mocks and scorns of the world for his sake, that we may receive the Crown of eternal Life, which God hath promised to all that love him, and shall by shaving their corporal crowns, bear the Adversity, and contemn the Prosperity of this World. But the shaving which Simon Magus used, what faithful man doth not detest, together with his Magical Art? The which at the first appearance hath a shew of a shaven crown, but if you mark his neck, you shall find it cut tailed in such wise, as you will say, it is rather meet to be used of the Simonists, than of the Christians. And such (of foolish men) be thought worthy of the Glory of the eternal Crown; whereas indeed for their ill living, they are worthy not only to be deprived of the same, but also of eternal Salvation. I speak not this against them that use this kind of shaving, and live Catholickly in Faith and good Works, but surely I believe there be divers of them be very holy and godly men; amongst the which is Adamnan, the Abbot and worthy Priest of the Columbians: who when he came Ambassador from his Country unto King Alfrid, desired greatly to see our Monastery: where he declared a wonderful Wisdom, Humility, and Religion both in his manners and words. Amongst other talk, I asked him, Why he that did believe to come to the Crown of Life that should never have end, did use contrary to his belief a definite Image of a Crown on his head? And if you seek (quoth I) the Fellowship on his head? And if you seek (quoth I) the Fellowship of S. Peter, why do you use the fashion of his Crown whom S. Peter did accurse, and not of his rather with whom you desire to live eternally? Adamnan answered, saying, You know right well Brother, though I use Saying. more manner of shaving, after the custom of my Country, yet do I detest, and with all my heart abhor his Infidelity. I desire notwithstanding to imitate the Footsteps of the holy Apostle as far forth as my power will extend. Then said I, I believe it is so: but then it is apparent you imitate those things which the Apostle Peter did from the bottom of your heart, if you use the same upon your face that you know he did; for I suppose your Wisdom

Diversity of Rites hurteth not the Church.

See how theefs shavelings would father their having upon Peter, which is neither found in Scripture, nor any approved Historys, but only in painted cloathes.

Why Prelats and Monks be shaven in the crown.

The shaving of the crown what it reprehendeth.

How doth the sight of the cross defend Churches from evil spirits, when it cannot keep them from evil Priests?

If shaving of the crown doth teach men patience in suffering, how cometh it that we see more wolfish and lireful than their shaven generations of Monkish vigere? Simon Magus shavers, in his faith.

understandeth that it is right descent to differ in the trimming your face or shaving, from his, whom in your heart you abhor. And contrariwise, as you desire to imitate the doings of him whom you desire to have a * Mediator between God and you, so it is meet you imitate the manner of his apparel and shaving. Thus much said I to Adamnan, who seemed then well to like our Churches: insomuch that he returning into Scotland, reformed many of his Churches there after our Celebration, albeit he could not do so amongst the Monks, with whom he had special Authority. He endeavoured also to have reformed their manner of shaving if he had been able. And now (O King) I exhort your Majesty to labour together with your people, over whom the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords hath made you Governor, to imitate likewise in all these points the Catholick and Apostolical Churches. So shall it come to pas, that in the end of this your Temporal Kingdom, the most blessed Prince of the Apostles shall open you the Gates of the heavenly Kingdom; together with the other Elect of God. The Grace of the eternal King preserve you most dearly beloved Son in Christ.

* There is but one Mediator between God and man, Christ Jesus.

When this Letter was read before King Naiton with other of his learned men, and diligently translated into his proper Language, he seemed to rejoyce very much at the Exhortation thereof, insomuch as riting up from among his Noblemen, he kneeled on the ground, and gave God thanks that he had deserved to receive so worthy a Present out of England, and so caused it forthwith by publick Proclamation to be written out, learned, and observed throughout all the Provinces of the Picts, defacing the Errors that had been used there by the space of 704 years. For all the Ministers of the Altar and all Monks were shaven on the Crown, and all the people rejoyced for the new Discipline of the most blessed Prince of the Apostle S. Peter, which they had received.

¶ By this Monkish Letter above prefixed, void of all Scripture, of all probation and truth of History, thou maist note, gentle Reader, how this vain tradition of shaven Crowns hath come up, and upon how light and trifling occasion: which in very deed was none other but certain mocking phantasies of Monks of that time, fully grounded upon the example of Peter, when by no old Monument of any ancient Record they can ever prove, either Peter or Simon Magus to have been shaven. Moreover, in the said Letter also is to be noted, how the Scottish Clergy at that season, did wear no such Priestly crowns as our English Churchmen then did.

A note to admonish the Reader.

But to cut off this matter of shaving, more worthy to be laughed at, than to be storied; let us now again return where as we left at King Ive, of whom William Malmesbury and Fabian in his Chronicle do record, that when the foresaid Ive had ruled the West-Saxons by the term of thirty seven years, by the importunate perswasion and subtil policy of his wife Ethelburga, he was allured to go to Rome, there to be made a Monk. Which Ethelburga after she had a long time laboured him to leave the World, and could not bring about her purpose, upon a season, when the King and she had rested them in a fair Palace richly hanged, and were upon the morrow thence departed; she by her commandment, caused the Palace to be replenished with all kind of filth and dung, and Hogs and vile Beasts therein to be laid, as well in the Chambers, as other Houses of Office; and in their own Chamber where they did lie, there was a Sow laid with her young Pigs. And when she knew that this Palace was thus deformed, being a certain space out of the Town, she besought the King to visit the said Palace. And when she had brought him thereunto, she said to him, *I pray you my Lord, behold now this house, where are now the rich Tapets and Clothes of Gold and Silk, and other rich Apparel and Clothes of Gold and Silk, and other rich Arparel and Clothes of Gold and Silk, and other rich Apparel and Clothes of Gold and Silk, and other rich Apparel and Clothes of Gold and Silk, and other rich Ap as is before declared. The faid Egbert alſo erected a noble Library in York, whoſe Example I wiſh other Biſhops would follow.

An. 747. Ex Matth. lib. de geſtis pontif. Anglo. Cuthberto Archiepiſcopo Cantuar.

About the beginning of the Reign of this Egbert, was Cuthbert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who collected a great Synod of Biſhops and Prelates, in the year of our Lord, 747. in the month of September, near to the place called Clouſho. In the which Synod aſſembled theſe Decrees were Enacted.

1. Firſt, That Biſhops ſhould be more diligent in feeing to their Office, and in admoniſhing the people of their faults.

2. That they ſhould live in a peaceable mind together, notwithſtanding they were in place diſſevered aſunder.

3. That every Biſhop once a year ſhould go about all the Pariſhes of his Diocels.

4. That the ſaid Biſhops every one in his Diocels ſhould moniſh their Abbots and Monks to live regularly: and that Prelates ſhould not oppreſs their Inferiors, but love them.

5. That they ſhould teach the Monaſteries which the ſecular men had invaded, and could not then be taken from them, to live regularly.

6. That none ſhould be admitted to Orders, before his life ſhould be examined.

7. That in Monaſteries the reading of holy Scripture ſhould be more frequented.

8. That Prieſts ſhould be no Diſpoſers of Secular buſineſs.

9. That they ſhould take no money for baptiſing Infants.

10. That they ſhould both learn and teach the Lords Prayer and Creed in the Engliſh-Tongue.

11. That all ſhould joyn together in their Miniſtery after one uniform Rite and Manner.

12. That in a modeſt Voice they ſhould ſing in the Church.

13. That all Holy and Feſtival days ſhould be celebrated at one time together.

14. That the Sabbath-day be reverendly obſerved and kept.

15. That the ſeven Hours Canonical every day be obſerved.

The Rogation days had not then that ſuperſtition in them which they had afterward.

16. That the Rogation-days, both the greater and leſſer ſhould not be omitted.

17. That the Feaſt of S. Gregory and S. Auſtin our Patron ſhould not be omitted.

18. That the Faſt of the four times ſhould be kept and obſerved.

19. That Monks and Nuns ſhould go regularly apparelled.

20. That Biſhops ſhould ſee theſe Decrees not to be neglected.

21. That the Church-men ſhould not give themſelves unto drunkenneſs.

22. That the Communion ſhould not be neglected of the Church-men.

23. Item, that the ſame alſo ſhould be obſerved of Lay-men, as time required.

24. That Lay-men firſt ſhould be well tried before they entred into Monkery.

25. That Alms be not neglected.

26. That Biſhops ſhould ſee theſe Decrees to be notified to the people.

27. They diſputed of the profit of Alms.

28. They diſputed of the profit of ſinging Pſalms.

29. That the Congregation ſhould be conſtituted, after the ability of their Goods.

30. That Monks ſhould not dwell among Lay-men.

31. That publick Prayer ſhould be made for Kings and Princes.

Boniface an Engliſh man Archbiſhop of Mentz.

Theſe Decrees and Ordinances being thus among the Biſhops concluded, Cuthbert the Archbiſhop ſendeth the Copy thereof to Boniface, otherwiſe named Winfride, an Engliſh man born, was then Archbiſhop of Mentz, and after made a Martyr, as the Popiſh ſtories term him.

Ethelbald King of Mercia land.

This Boniface being, as is ſaid, Archbiſhop of Mentz in the time of this foreſaid Synod, wrote a Letter to Ethelbald King of Merceland: which Ethelbald was alſo preſent in the ſame Synod, of whom Beda maketh mention in his Hiſtory, calling him proud Ethelbold, and the greateſt of the Saxon Kings in his time. Firſt this Ethelbald, after the departing of Celulfe into his Monkery, invaded and ſpoiled the Country of Northumberland. Moreover, he exerciſed mortal and horrible War a long ſpace with Cadred, otherwiſe of ſome named Cuthbert, King of Weſt-Saxons: Furthermore, he with other Saxon Kings ſo impugned the Britains, that from that time they never durſt provoke the Saxons any more. At length the ſaid Cudred, refuſing the intolerable Exactions of proud Ethelbald, doth incounter with him in battel: where notwithſtanding the great Power that Ethelbald had to him adjoyned, of the Mercians, of the Eaſt-Angles, and of the Cantuarites; yet the ſaid Cudred through Gods Power, and the means of a certain valiant Warrior, called Edelbirn, a Conſul, overthrew the pride of Ethelbald, after a ſore and terrible conflict. Which Ethelbald notwithſtanding repairing his Power again the next year after, renewed battel with the foreſaid Cudred; in the which battel Ethelbald (after he had reigned one and forty years in Mercia) was ſlain by one Beornered, who after reigned in that Dition but a ſmall time. For Offa, Nephew to the ſaid Ethelbald, expelled the ſaid Beornered, and ſucceeded King in that Province of Mercia, where he reigned nine and thirty years, of whom more followeth hereafter (the Lord Jeſus ſpeeding therein our purpoſe) to be declared, as place and time ſhall require. In the mean ſeaſon, not to forget the Letter before mentioned of Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, ſent unto this Ethelbald; I thought the ſame not unworthy here to be inſerted (at the leaſt the effect thereof) not ſo much for the Authors ſake, as for that ſome good matter, peradventure, may be picked thereout for other Princes to behold and conſider.

Edelbirn a ſtrong and valiant warriour. Pride overthrown.

The Copy and Tenor of the Letter of Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, and Martyr of God (an Engliſh man) ſent to Ethelbald, King of Mercia, freely and yet charitably admoniſhing him of his Adulterous life, and Oppreſſion of Churches.

Regi & filio chariſſimo, & in Chriſti amore cæteris regibus Anglorum præferendo Ethelbaldo, Bonifacius Archiepiſcopus legatus Germanicus Romanæ Eccleſiæ perpetuam in Chriſto charitatis ſalutem. Conſiſtentes coram Deo, qui novit an vere atque ex animo dicam: quando proſperitatem veſtram, & fidem, & bona opera audimus, lætamur: quando autem aliquid adverſum vel in eventu bellorum, vel de periculo animarum, de vobis cognoſcimus, triſtamur. Audivimus enim quod Eleemoſynis intentus, furta & rapinas prohibes, & pacem diligis, & defenſor viduarum & pauperum es, & inde gratias Deo agimus. Quod vero legitimum matrimonium ſpernis, ſi pro caſtitate facetes, eſſet laudabile: ſed quia in luxu & adulterio & cum ſanctimonialibus voluptatis, eſt vituperabile & damnabile. Nam & famam gloriæ veſtræ coram Deo & hominibus confundit, & inter Idolatras conſtituit, quia Templum Dei violaſti. Quapropter fili chariſſime panitere, & memorare oportet, quam turpe ſit, ut tu qui multis gentibus, dono Dei dominaris, ad injuriam ejus ſis libidinis ſervus. Audivimus præterea quod opimates pene omnis gentis Merciorum tuo exemplo legitimas uxores deſerant, & adulteras & Sanctimoniales conſuprent. Quod quam ſit peregrinum ab honeſtate, docent vos alienæ gentis inſtitutio. Nam in antiqua Saxonia ubi nulla eſt Chriſti cognitio, ſi virgo in materna domo, vel maritata, ſub conjuge fuerit adultera, manu propria ſtrangulatam cremant, & ſupra foſſam ſepulta corruptorem ſuſpendunt, aut cingulo tenui (veſtibus abſciſſis) flagellant eam caſtæ matronæ & cultellis pungunt; & de villa in villam miſſæ occurrunt novæ flagellatrices, donec interimant. Inſuper & Vinuli, quod eſt fœdiſſimum genus hominum, hunc habent morem, ut mulier viro mortuo ſe in rogo crematis pariter arſura præcipiet. Si ergo gentiles Deum ignorantes, tantum zelum caſtitatis habent, quid tibi convenit fili chariſſime, qui Chriſtianus & Rex es? Parce ergo animæ tuæ: parce multitudini populi tui pereuntis exemplo tuo: de quorum animabus redditurus es rationem. Attende & illud, quod ſi gens Anglorum (ſicut in Francia, & Italia, & ab ipſis Pagauis nobis improperatur) ſpretæ legitimis matrimoniis per adulteria deficit, naſciturque ſit ex ea commixtione gens ignava & Dei contemptrix, quæ perditis moribus patriam poſſundet: ſicut Præterea nunciatum eſt nobis, quod multa privilegia Eccleſiarum & Monaſteriorum auferent, ad hoc audendum duces tuos exemplo provoces. Sed recogita quæſo quam terribilem vindictam Deus in Anteriores Reges exercuit, ejuſdem culpæ conſcios, quam in te arguimus. Nam Celredum prædeceſſorum tuum ſtupratorem Sanctimonialium, & Eccleſiaſticorum privilegiorum fraftorem ſplendide cum ſuis comitibus equalantem ſpiritus malignus arripuit: & ſine confeſſione & viatico, cum diabolo ſermocinanti, & gem Dei deteſtanti animam extorſit. Ofredum quoque regem Deiorum & Bernicorum, earundem culparum reum, ita effrænatum regem egit, ut regnum & juventem ætatem contemptibilis morte amitteret. Carolus quoque princeps Francorum, Monaſteriorum multorum everſor, & Eccleſiaſticarum pecuniarum in uſus proprios commutator, longa torſione, & verenda morte conſumptus eſt. Et mox infra: Quapropter fili chariſſime, paternis & obnixis precibus deprecamur, ut non deſpicias conſilium patrum tuorum, qui pro Dei amore celſitudinem tuam appellare ſatagunt. Nihil enim boni regi ſalubrius, quam ſi talia commiſſa cum arguuntur, libenter emendentur, quia per Salomonem dicitur: Qui diligit diſciplinam, diligit ſapientiam. Ideo, fili chariſſime, offendentes conſilium, juſtum, conteſtamur & obſecramus per viventem Deum, & per filium ejus Jeſum Chriſtum, & per ſpiritum ſanctum, ut recorderis quam fugitiva ſit vita præſens, & quam brevis & momentanea delectatio ſtuprcæ carnis: & quam ignominioſum ſit ut brevis vitæ homo mala exempla in perpetuum poſteris relinquat. Incipe ergo melioribus viram componere, & præteritos errores juventutis corrigere, ut hic coram hominibus laudem habeas & in futuro æterna gloria gaudeas. Valere celſitudinem tuam, & in bonis moribus proficere optamus.

The corrupt life of Nuns noted.

In this Epiſtle here is to be ſeen and noted, firſt the corruption and great diſorder of life which alway from time to time hath been found in theſe Religious Houſes of Nuns, whoſe profeſſed Vow of co-acted Chaſtity hath yet never been good to the Church, nor profitable to the Common-wealth, and leaſt of all to themſelves. Of ſuch young and wanton Widows S. Paul in his time complaineth, 1 Tim. 5. which would take upon them the wilful Profeſſion of ſingle life, which they were not able to perform, but falling into damnable luxury, deſerved worthily to be reprehended. How much better had it been for theſe laſcivious Nuns not to have refuſed the ſafe yoke of Chriſtian Matrimony, than to intangle themſelves in this their ſuperſtitious Vow of perpetual Maidenhood, which neither was required of them, nor they were able to keep?

Secondly, No leſs are they alſo to be reprehended, which maintained theſe ſuperſtitious Orders of unprofitable Nuns and of other Religions. In the number of whom was this foreſaid Boniface, otherwiſe called Winfride, who, although in this Epiſtle he doth juſtly reprehend the vicious Enormities both of ſecular and of religious Perſons; yet he himſelf is not without the ſame or rather greater reprehenſion, for that he gave the occaſion thereof in maintaining ſuch ſuperſtitious Orders of ſuch laſcivious Nuns and other Religions, and refraining the ſame from lawful Marriage. For ſo we find of him in ſtories that he was a great ſetter up and upholder of ſuch blind Superſtition, and of all Popery. Who being admitted by Pope Gregory the ſecond, Archbiſhop of Magunce, and indued with full Authority legantine over the Germans, brought divers Countries there under the Popes Obedience, held many great Councils, ordained Biſhops, builded Monaſteries, canonized Saints, commanded Relicks to be worſhipped, permitted religious Fathers to carry about Nuns with them a preaching. Amongſt all other he founded the great Monaſtery of Fluda in Germany of Engliſh Monks, into the which no women might enter but only Lieba and Tecla, two Engliſh Nuns. Item, by the Authority of the ſaid Archbiſhop Boniface, which he received from Pope Zachary, Childericus, King of France, was depoſed from the Right of his Crown, and Pipinus, betrayer of his Maſter, was confirmed, or rather intruded in. From this Boniface proceeded that deteſtable Doctrine which now ſtandeth regiſtred in the Popes Decrees, Diſt. 40. cap. Si Papa. Which in a certain Epiſtle of his is this, that in caſe the Pope were of moſt filthy living, and forgetful or negligent of himſelf, and of the whole Chriſtianity, in ſuch ſort, that he led innumerable Souls with him to Hell: yet ought there no man to rebuke him in ſo doing, for he hath (ſaith he) power to judge all men, and ought of no man to be judged again.

In the time of this Archbiſhop, Pope Gregory the ſecond, and alſo Pope Conſtantine the firſt, wrought great Maſſe-worſhipping againſt the Greek Emperors Philippicus and Leo, and others for the maintaining of Images to be ſet up in Churches. Of whom Philippicus loſt both his Empire, and alſo his eyes: Leo for the ſame cauſe likewiſe againſt him was Excommunicate of Gregory the third. This Gregory the third (ſo far as I can conjecture) was he that firſt wrote the four Books of Dialogues in Greek, falſly bearing the name of Gregory the firſt, which Books afterward, called the Dialogues of Gregory, were tranſlated out of Greek into Latine. Item, the ſaid Gregory the third, firſt brought into the Maſs-Canon the Clauſe for Relicks, beginning Quorum ſolemnitates hodie in conſpectu, &c. Item, brought into the ſame ſacrifice for ſaid Canon the Memorial, the Offering and Sacrifice for the dead, the Deed: like as Zachary brought in the Prieſts Veſture and Ornaments, and as the foreſaid Conſtantinus alſo was the firſt that gave his feet to be kiſſed of the Emperors. But to turn again into the courſe of our Engliſh ſtory.

Images in Churches diſcovered by Emperors, maintained by Popes. Philippicus for holding againſt images loſt his Empire and his eyes. The Author of the Book called the Dialogues of Gregory. Memorial of reliefs, offering and ſacrifice for the dead, brought in to the Maſs-Canon. The Popes firſt kiſſed of the Emperors.

In the time of this Egbert, King of Northumberland, Sigebert or Sigbert reigned in Weſt-Saxony, a man of ſo cruel tyranny to his Subjects (turning the Laws and Cuſtoms of his fore-Fathers after his own Will and Pleaſure) that when he was ſomewhat ſharply advertiſed by one of his Nobles, an Earl called Combranus, to change his manners, and to behave himſelf more prudently toward his people; he therefore maliciouſly cauſed him to be put to cruel death. Wherupon the ſaid King Sigebert continuing his cruel Conditions, by his Subjects conſpiring againſt him, was put from his kingly Dignity, and brought into ſuch deſolation, that wandering alone in a Wood without comfort, was there ſlain, even by the Swineherd of the ſaid Earl, whom before he had ſo wrongfully murthered, as partly is above touched. Whereby is to be ſeen the cruel tyranny of Princes never to proſper well, without the juſt revenge both of God and man.

Sigebert King of Weſt-Saxons. Cruel tyranny with like cruelty requited. Kenulphus King of Weſt-Saxons. An. 748.

This Sigebert being ſlain, in his place ſucceeded Kenulphus, in the year of our Lord, 748. who with the agreement of the Weſt-Saxons, was one of the chief doers againſt Sigebert his Maſter. This Kenulphus kept ſtrongly his Lordſhip againſt Offa, and againſt the power of all his Enemies, till at length after that he had reigned, as Fabian ſaith, one and thirty years, he reforting to a Paramour which he kept at Merton, was there beſet, and likewiſe ſlain by the train and means of a certain kinſman of the foreſaid Sigebert, named Clito or Cliton, in revengement of King Sigebert's death.

Murther revenged with murther.

Moreoever, in the Reign of the foreſaid Egbert, King of Northumberland, and in the eighth year of Kenulphus, King of Weſt-Saxons; Offa, after he had ſlain the Tyrant Beorredus, which before had ſlain Ethelbald, King of Mercia, and Uncle to this foreſaid Offa, reigned King of that Province.

Offa King of Mercia.

Of this Offa are told many notable Deeds; which becauſe they concern rather Political Affairs, and do not greatly appertain to the purpoſe of this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, I omit here to recite; As his Wars and Victories againſt Egbert, King of the Northumbers, as alſo againſt Ethelred King of Eaſt-Angles. Item, againſt Egbert, King of Kent, otherwiſe called Wren, whom (as Fabian ſaith) he took Priſoner, and led bound with him to Mercia. Malmeſbury witneſſeth otherwiſe this to be done not by Offa, but by Kenulphus, as Chriſt willing, hereafter ſhall appear. After theſe Victories, Offa had ſuch diſpleaſure unto the Citizens of Canterbury, that he removed the Archbiſhops See, and Lands of Lambrith Archbiſhop of Canterbury (by the agreement of Pope Adrian) unto Litchfield. He alſo chaſed the Britains or Welſhmen into Wales, and made a famous Ditch between Wales and the utter bounds of Mercia, or middle of England, which was called Offa's ditch, and builded there a Church, which long time after was called Offa's kirke. This

An untruth noted in the ſtory of Malmeſbury.

The primacy of Canterbury removed to Litchfield. Lambrith Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Offa

Offa also married one of his Daughters to Brightricus that was a King of West-Saxons. And for that in his time was variance between him and the French-men, insomuch that the passage of Merchants was forbidden; therefore he sent Alcuinus a learned man unto Charles the Great, then King of France, to commune the means of peace: which Charles had after that the said Alcuinus in great favour and estimation, and afterwards made him Abbot of Turonia in France.

This Alcuinus is commended for his learning next to Aristotle and Birds above all Saxons.

About the later time of the Reign of Offa, King of Mercia, Ethelbert being then King of East-Angles (a learned and a right godly Prince) came to the Court of Offa, provoked by the counsel of his Nobles to sue for the marriage of his Daughter, well accompanied like a Prince with his men about him. Whereupon the Queen conceiving a false suspition, and fearing that which was never minded, that Ethelbert with his Company, under the pretence and made matter of marriage, was come to work some violence against her Husband, and the Kingdom of Mercia; so the perswaded with King Offa and certain of her Council that night, that the next day following, Offa caused him to be trained into his Palace alone from his Company, by one called Grimbertus: who took him and Company, and there struck off his head, which forthwith was presented to the King and Queen. And thus with he then presented to the King and Queen. And thus the Innocent King Etheldred was wrongfully murthered, about the year of our Lord, 793. but not without a just Revenge at Gods hands. For, as the story recordeth, the foresaid Queen, worker of this Villany, lived not three months after, and in her death was so tormented, that she was fain to bite and rent her Tongue in pieces with her own teeth. Offa understanding at length the Innocency of this King, and the hainous cruelty of his Fact, gave the tenth part of his goods to holy Church; and to the Church of Hereford, in the remembrance of this Ethelbert, he bestowed great Lands. Moreover, he builded the Abbay of S. Albans, with certain other Monasteries besides. And so afterward he went up to Rome for his Penance, where he gave to the Church of S. Peter a peny through every house in his Dominion, which was called commonly Romefloat, or Peter-pence, paid to the Church of S. Peter: and there at length was transformed from a King to a Monk, about the year of our Lord, 749. with Kenredus King of Northumberland above-mentioned, although some stories deny that he was a Monk.

Ethelbert King of Estanglies wrongfully murthered by Offa. The vain suspition and wicked counsel of a woman.

Ex Hist. Hermanni & Matthew Parisiens. Cruel murther revenged.

Offa and Kenredus of Kings made of Monks at Rome.

After Offa King of Mercia, when he had reigned nine and thirty years, succeeded his Son Egfretus, who reigned but four months, of whom thus writeth the foresaid Alcuinus, Non arbitror quod nobilissimus juvenis Egfretus propter peccata sua mortuus sit: sed quia pater suus, pro confirmatione Regni ejus multum sanguinem effudit, &c. that is, This Noble young man died not so much for offences of his own, as for that his Father had spilled much blood to confirm him in his Kingdom.

Egfretus King of Mercia. Alcuinus[?] heres patricius. The Fathers fault punished in the Child.

Next to which Egfretus succeeded Kenulphus in the said Kingdom of Mercia, which Kenulphus keeping and retaining the hatred of Offa his Predecessor against the Cantuarits, made War upon them, where he took Egbert their King, otherwise called Wren, whom he bound and led Prisoner to Mercia. Notwithstanding, shortly after being mollified with Princely Clemency in the Town of Winchcombe, where he had builded the same time a Church, upon the day when he should dedicate the same in the presence of thirteen Bishops, and of Cuthert, whom he had placed in the same Kingdom of Canterbury before, and ten Dukes, and many other great Estates, King Kenulphus brought the said Egbert King of Kent, out of Prison into the Church, where he inlarged him out of Imprisonment, and restored him to his place again. At the light whereof, not only Cuthert the foresaid King rejoyced, but also all the Estates and people being there present, made such an Exclamation of joy and gladness, that the Church (and not only the Church, but also the Streets) rang withall. At which time such bountifulness of Gifts and Jewels was then bestowed, that from the highest estate to the lowest, none departed without something given, according as to every degree was thought meet. Although Fabian reserveth this story to King Offa, yet caules there be why I assent rather unto Malmesbury and to Polychronicon, which attribute the same to Kenulphus the Second King of Mercia after Offa.

Egbert King of Kent taken prisoner. A Princely example of clemency in a noble King. The Church of Winchcombe builded by King Kenulphus. Egbert King of Kent released out of prison.

A place of Fabian doubted.

A little before in speaking of certain Bishops of Rome, mention was made of Pope Constantine the first, Pope Gregory the second, Pope Gregory the third, and of Pope Zachary, which deposed Childerick, and set up Pipinus the French King, &c. Next after this Zachary in order, followed Pope Stephan the second, to whom the foresaid Pipinus, to gratifie again the See of Rome for this their benefit shewed to him, gave and contributed to the said See of Rome, the Exarchat or Princedome of Ravenna, the Kingdom of the Lombards, and many other great Possessions of Italy, with all the Cities thereto adjoyning unto the borders of Venice. And this donation of Pipin, no doubt, if the truth were rightly tried, should be found to be the same, which hitherto falsly hath been thought to be the donation of Constantine. For else how could it be that the Exarchat of Ravenna could belong all this while to the Emperors of Constantinople, if Constantine before had given it and all Italy from the Empire of the See of Rome?

Pope Stephan the first. Anno 1444.

The donation of Pipin to the See of Rome taken to be the donation of Constantine.

To this Pipinus, as witnesseth Polychronicon, was sent first into France, the invention of the Organs out of Grecia, by Constantine, Emperor of Constantinople, in the year of our Lord, 757.

Ex Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 19.

Next to this Stephan the second, succeeded Paul the first, who following his Predecessors, thundered out great Excommunication against Constantinus the Emperor of Constantinople, for abrogating and plucking down Images set up in Temples. Notwithstanding this Constantine neglecting the Popes vain Curses, persevered in his blessed purpose, in destroying Idolatry till the end of his life. Then came to be Pope, Constantinus the second, a Lay-man, and Brother to Desiderius the King of Lombardy; for the which cause he was thortly deposed, and thrust into a Monastery, having his eyes put out.

Pope Paul the first. Images again violently set up by Popes.

A Layman Pope, who was deposed and had his eyes put out.

In whose stead succeeded Stephan the third, who Ordained after, That no Lay-man should be Pope: condemning moreover the Council of Constantinople the seventh for Heretical, because in that Council the worshipping of Images was reproved and condemned. Contrary to the which Council, this Pope not only maintained the filthy Idolatry of Images in Christian Temples, but also advanced their Veneration, commanding them most ethnically to be incensed, &c. At this time Carolus Magnus, called Charles the Great, a little before mentioned, began to Reign, by whom this Pope caused Desiderius the Lombard King to be deprived.

Note well the practise of Prelates in planting their Popish Mass.

Pope Stephan the third. Images again violently set up by Popes.

Then in this Race of Popes, after this Stephan the third, cometh Adrianus the first, who likewise following the steps of his Fathers the Popes, added and attributed to the Veneration of Images more than all the other had done before, writing a Book for the adoration and utility proceeding of them, commanding them to be taken for Laymens Kalendars, holding moreover a Synod at Rome against Felix, and all others that spake against the setting up of such Stocks and Images. And as Paul the first before him made much of the body of Petronilla S. Peters Daughter: so this Adrian clothed the body of S. Peter all in silver, and covered the Altar of S. Paul with a Pall of gold. This Pope Adrian was he whom we declared in the former part of this Treatise, to ratifie and confirm by Revelation the Order of S. Gregories above the Order of S. Ambrose Mass: for unto this time, which was about the year of our Lord, 780. the Lyturgy of S. Ambrose was more used in the Italian Churches. The story whereof, because it is regifted in Durandus, Naucleru, and Jacobus de Voragine. I thought here to infert the same to this especial purpose, for the Reader to understand the time when this usual Mass of the Papists began first to be Universal and Uniform, and generally in Churches to be received. Thus it followed in the story by the foresaid Authors set forth. Jacobus de Voragine, in the life of Pope Gregory the first, telleth a Tale concerning this matter.

The Idol of the Sun taken down by Pope Adrian, which a Pope had set up before.

Pope Adrian the first. Anno 780.

In times past (saith he) when the Service which Ambrose made, was more frequented and used in Churches, than was the Service which Gregory had appointed, the Bishop of Rome, then called Adrian, gathered a Council together: in the which it was Ordained, That Gregories Service should be observed and kept universally. Which determination of the Council, Charles the Emperor did diligently put in Execution, while he ran about by divers Provinces,
